Camilla's answer was a spritz of a rug expressing a doubt too subtle words. "What does that mean?"

"Nought Margaret, and the face of a dangerously handsome Italian at a flash before her, and the second the form of the officer whose features she had not yet seen, but, who was so hauntingly like Jerome. "With all their brightness these mornings are chilly," she said as she rose, with a little shiver, to close the window. Then repeating mentally her old formula of patience, "Time, silence, occupation, and God," she took up her pen again.

"I must beg for a little help, my dear. Under some sort of mental aberration I promised to send home a paper on the women of Italy. I must write this very day."

"What can I do to help you?" asked Camilla. "I'd be delighted but, you know, my queen —"

"Why, you can let me talk my thoughts: and you give me your criticisms. Suppose I begin with the outer. They are beautiful."

"When they are young," said Camilla, with a little frown. "Our old women are not handsome, as yours are. Their faces lack character."

"I might air my notions about the fatal mistake of caring for personal charms," said Margaret. "Beauty, physical beauty is short lived; its care is wasteful of health, heart and soul. Though perhaps I had better speak first of the beauty of this land."

PATIENT WITH THE LIVING.

SWEET friend, when thou and I are gone
Beyond earth's weary labor,
When small shall be our need of grace
From comrade and from neighbor,
Passed all the strife, the toil, the care,
And done with all the sighing,
What tender ruth shall we have gained
Alas, by simply dying!

Then lips too chary of their praise,
Will tell our merits over,
And eyes too swift our faults to see,
Shall no defect discover.
Then hands that would not lift a stone
Where stones were thick to cumber
Our steep hill-path, will scatter flowers,

Sweet friend, perchance both thou and I,
Ere love is past forgiving,
Should take the earnest lesson home—
Be patient with the living,
To-day's repressed rebuke may save
Our blinding tears to-morrow;
Then patience—e'en when keenest edge
May whet a nameless sorrow.

'Tis easy to be gentle when Death's silence shames our clamor,
And easy to discern the best
Through memory's mystic glamour;
But wise it were for thee and me,
Ere love is past forgiving,
To take the tender lesson home—
Be patient with the living.

A GENERAL SAVES A DRUMMER-BOY.

REV. M. T. MYERS relates the following: "When a French army was crossing the Alps to the assistance of Napoleon in Italy, an avalanche carried a drummer-boy almost 1,000 feet into the yawning gorge below. The general seized a rope and threw it around his waist. His veterans besought him with tears not to venture into the depths of the chasm. 'Wipe your tears and seize the rope,' said the general, and in thirty minutes he placed the boy upon the road safe and sound amid the plaudits of the whole army. Energy and courage such as this on the part of all those who profess the Christian name would place a ransomed world at the feet of Christ before the opening of the twentieth century."

A MISSIONARY CENTRE.

MR. GRATTAN GUINNESS' Harley House in Bow Road, London, is a busy missionary centre. About 120 young evangelists are all the time studying and training in connection with it, and going out from it at the rate of one every week. Just now its three colleges are all full, and an additional house is taken for the women students of medicine. Practical training for usefulness in the foreign field is quite as essential as teaching and study, and much more troublesome. It implies a sphere in which to practice, and involves thus the maintenance of Home Missions on a considerable scale, including not only very numerous Gospel-meetings in many centres, schools and classes of all kinds, but medical and maternity missions, dispensing and nursing, and much familiar intercourse with the working classes in East London, including some of the very poor and needy. Then there are returning and departing missionaries, coming and going, invalids requiring nursing, volunteers seeking interviews, and a word-wide correspondence needing daily attention, and making constant claims on time and sympathy, as well as on resources all too slender to meet them. Missions are emphatically the work of the Church, especially in these days. But when to the intrinsic difficulties of the task is added that of very insufficient supplies, the pressure becomes trying, and the work cannot be so well done. Dr. Harry Guinness is going for a six or eight-months' visit to the Congo.

A SAILOR GIVES HIS LIFE FOR ANOTHER.

ONE winter day a vessel was caught in a storm off the north coast of Scotland. The gale was fearful, but every effort was made to keep the vessel afloat, and they might have succeeded, but she sprang a leak, and soon it was evident she was past settling down. They tried to launch their boats, but found they had all been disabled by the storm, and when at last the vessel sank, it carried the greater part of its crew with it. Two men rose to the surface after escaping from the vortex of the sinking ship, and both almost at the same time perceived a piece of wood, and made towards it. It was large enough to have supported one on the top of it, but only one; the two had therefore to remain in the water, practically supporting themselves on the wood. For long hours they stayed thus. The storm was abated, but their strength was almost gone. They felt they could not hold out much longer. Their hands were benumbed and their limbs stiff. At length the younger turned to the older, and said, "Jim, you have a wife and family depending on you, while I am alone in the world. Only one of us can be saved, and it is better it should be you. When I am gone get on the top of the wood, and God grant that you may soon be picked up." His friend tried to dissuade him, but with a "God bless you," he loosened his grasp and sank from sight. So that hero died, and his death was not in vain, for following the advice of his deliverer, the other man drew himself upon the wood, and in a few hours was rescued.

A LADY'S DYING ACT OF PRAISE.

A LADY lay dying in Paris. Many friends surrounded her bed to watch her peaceful end, for she was a Christian. As she lay quiet and still one of the watchers noticed her lips move, and bending down she caught the word "Bring," that was all she could utter. At once they brought grapes, wine, water, everything they could imagine that she could want, but it was none of these, and still her lips moved forming the word "Bring," until at last, just as she was passing away, she burst forth, "Bring forth the Royal Diadem, and crown him Lord of all." Her last thought was for the honor of her heavenly King and Saviour. If all Christian workers were filled with that thought through life, what a consistent Christian life they would live!

God permitted polygamy. Yes; just as he permits to-day murder and theft and arson and all kinds of crime. He permits these things as you well know, but he does not sanction them. Who would dare to say he sanctions them? Because the Presidents of the United States have permitted polygamy in Utah, you are not, therefore, to conclude that they patronized it, that they approved it when, on the contrary, they denounced it. But you say: "Didn't David and Solomon favor polygamy?" yes, and did they not get well punished for it? Read the lives of those two men, and you will come to the conclusion that all the attributes of God's nature were against their behavior. David suffered for his crimes in the caverns of Adullam and Massada, in the wilderness of Mahanaim, in the woe of Ziklag. How did Solomon get along with polygamy? Read his warnings, in Proverbs, read his self-disgust in Ecclesiastes. He throws up his hands in loathing, and cries out: "Vanity of Vanities, all is vanity." His seven hundred wives nearly pestered the life out of him. Solomon got well paid for his crimes. I repeat that all the mighty men of the Scriptures were aloof from polygamy, save as they were pounded and flailed, and cut to pieces for their insult to holy marriage. If the Bible is the friend of polygamy why is it that in all the lands where the Bible predominates, polygamy is forbidden, and in the lands where there is no Bible, it is favored. Polygamy all over China, all over India, all over Africa, all over Persia, all over heathendom, save as the missionaries have done their work: while polygamy does not exist in England and the United States, except in defiance of law. The Bible abroad, God honored monogamy. The Bible not abroad, God abhorred polygamy.

Another false charge which Infidelity has made against the Bible is that it is antagonistic to woman, that it enjoins her degradation and belittles her mission. Under this impression many women have been overcome of this Plague of Infidelity. Is the Bible the enemy of woman? Come into the picture gallery, the Louvre, the Luxembourg of the Bible, and see which pictures are the more honored. Here is Eve, a perfect woman, as perfect a woman as could be made by a perfect God. Here is Deborah, with her womanly arm hurling a host into the battle. Here is Miriam, leading the Israelitish orchestra on the banks of the Red Sea. Here is motherly Hannah, with her own loving hand replenishing the wardrobe of her son Samuel, the prophet. Here is Ruth, putting to shame all the modern slang about mothers-in-law as she turns her back on her home and her country, and faces wild beasts and exile and death, that she may be with Naomi, her husband's mother. Who has more worshippers to-day than any being that ever lived on earth, except Jesus Christ? Mary. For what purpose did Christ perform his first miracle upon earth? To relieve the embarrassment of a womanly housekeeper at the falling short of a beverage. Why did Christ break up the silence of the tomb, and tear off the shroud and rip up the rocks? It was to stop the bereavement of the two Bethany sisters. For whose comfort was Christ most anxious in the hour of dying ex-cruciation? For a woman, an old woman, a wrinkle-faced woman, a woman who in other days had held him in her arms, his first friend, his last friend, as it is very apt to be, his mother. All the pathos of the ages compressed into one utterance, "Behold thy mother."

If the Bible is so antagonistic to woman, how do you account for the difference in woman's condition in China and Central Africa, and her condition in England and America? There is no difference except that which the Bible makes. In lands where there is no Bible, she is hitched like a beast of burden to the ploughs, she carries the hod, she submits to indescribable indignities. She must be kept in a private apartment and if she come forth she must be carefully hooded and religiously veiled as though it were a shame to be a woman. Do you not know that the very first thing the Bible does when it comes into a new country is to strike off the shackles of woman's serfdom? Oh! woman, where are your chains to-day? Hold up both your arms and let us see your handcuffs. Oh, we see the handcuffs; they are bracelets of gold bestowed by husbandly, or fatherly, or brotherly, or sisterly, or loverly affection. Unloosen the warm robe from your neck, O woman, and let us see the yoke of your bondage. Oh, I find the yoke a carcenet of silver, or a string of cornelians, or a cluster of pearls that must gall you very much. How bad you must all have it!

Since you put the Bible on your stand in the sitting-room, has the Bible been to you, O woman, a curse or a blessing? Why is it that a woman when she is troubled will go to her worst enemy, the Bible? Why do you not go for comfort to some of the great infidel books, Spinoza's Ethics or Hume's Natural History of Religion, or Paine's Age of Reason, or Dedro's Dramas, or any one of the two hundred and sixty volumes of Voltaire? No, the silly, deluded woman persists in hanging about the Bible verses, "Let not your heart be troubled," "All things work together for good," "Weeping may endure for a night," "I am the resurrection," "Peace, be still."

Furthermore: rather than invite I resist this Plague of Infidelity because it has wrought no positive good for the world, and is always a hindrance. I ask you to mention the names of the merciful and the educational institutions which infidelity founded and is supporting, and has supported all the way through; institutions pronounced against God and the Christian religion, and yet pronounced in behalf of suffering humanity. What are the names of them? Certainly not the United States Christian Commission; or the Sanitary Commission, for Christian George H. Stuart was the president of the one, and Christian Henry W. Bellows was the president of the other. Where are the asylums and merciful institutions founded by infidelity, and supported by infidelity, pronounced against God and the Bible, and yet doing work for the alleviation of suffering? Infidelity is so very loud in its braggadocio it must have some to mention. Certainly, if you come to speak of educational institutions it is not Yale, it is not Harvard, it is not Princeton, it is not Middletown, it is not Cambridge or Oxford, it is not any institution from which a diploma would not be a disgrace. Do you point to the German universities as exceptions? I have to tell you that all the German universities to-day are under positive Christian influences, except the University of Heidelberg, where the ruffianly students cut and maul and mangle and murder each other as a matter of pride instead of infamy. Do you mention Girard College, Philadelphia, as an exception, that college established by the will of Mr. Girard which forbade religious instruction, and the entrance of clergymen within its gates. My reply is that I lived for seven years near that college and knew many of its professors to be Christian instructors, and no better Christian influences are to be found in any college than in Girard College.

There stands Christianity. There stands Infidelity. Compare what they have done. Compare their resources. There is Christianity, a prayer on her lip; a benediction on her brow; both hands full of help for all who want help; the mother of thousands of colleges; the mother of thousands of asylums for the oppressed, the blind, the sick, the lame, the, imbecile; the mother of missions for the bringing back of the outcast; the mother of thousands of reformatory institutions for the saving of the lost; the mother of innumerable Sabbath Schools bringing millions of children under a drill to prepare them for respectability and usefulness, to say nothing of the great future. That is Christianity.

Here is Infidelity; no prayer on her lips, no benediction on her brow, both hands clenched—what for? To fight Christianity. That is the entire business. The complete mission of Infidelity to fight Christianity. Where are her schools, her colleges, her asylums of mercy? Let me throw you down a whole ream of foolscap paper that you may fill all of it with the names of her beneficent institutions, the colleges and the asylums, the institutions of mercy and of learning, founded by Infidelity, and supported alone by Infidelity, pronounced against God and the Christian religion and yet in favor of making the world better.

"Oh," you say, "a ream of paper is too much for the names of those institutions." Well, then, I throw you a quire of paper. Fill it all up now. I will wait until you get all the names down. "Oh," you say, "that is too much." Well, then, suppose you count them on your ten fingers. "Oh," you say, "not quite so much as that." Well, then, count them on the fingers of one hand. "Oh," you say, "we don't want quite so much room as that." Suppose, then, you halt and count on one finger the name of any institution founded by Infidelity, supported entirely by Infidelity, pronounced against God and the Christian religion, yet toiling to make the world better. Not one! Not one!

Infidelity scrapes no lint for the wounded, bakes no bread for the hungry, shakes up no pillow for the sick, rouses no comfort for the bereft, gilds no grave for the dead. While Christ, our Christ, our wounded Christ, our risen Christ, the Christ of this old-fashioned Bible—blessed be his glorious name forever! our Christ stands this hour pointing to the hospital, or to the asylum, saying: "I was sick and ye gave me a couch, I was lame and ye gave me a crutch, I was blind and ye physicianed my eyesight, I was orphaned and ye mothered my soul, I was lost on the mountains and ye brought me home; inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these, ye did it to me."

But I thank God that this plague of infidelity will be stayed. Many of those who hear me now by the Holy Ghost upon their hearts will cease to be scoffers and will become disciples, and the day will arrive when all nations will accept the Scriptures. The book is going to keep right on until the consuming fires of the last day are kindled. That will be the first time we can afford to do without the Bible. What will be the use of the Book of Genesis, descriptive of how the world was made, when the world is destroyed? What will be the use of his photograph when we have met him in glory? What will be the use of the Book of Revelation, standing as you will with your foot on the glassy sea, and your hand on the ringing harp, and your forehead chapleted with eternal coronation, amid the amethystine and twelve-gated glories of heaven? The emerald dashing its green against the beryl, and the beryl dashing its blue against the sapphire, and the sapphire throwing its light on the jacinth, and the jacinth dashing its fire against the chrysoprassus, and you and I standing in the glories of ten thousand sunsets.

SONG AS A MEANS OF GRACE.

ANOTHER CHAPTER FROM THE PERSONAL EXPERIENCES OF HARRISON, THE REVIVALIST.

Songs that Touch the Souls of the Hearers—What Class of Songs Should a Revivalist Use?—The Song Jubilant, the Song Mournful, the Song Soothing and the Strain that Incites the Singer to Higher Faith.

BY REV. THOMAS HARRISON.

I HAVE been frequently asked what class of songs are of the greatest practical value at revivals. My experience leads me to say that the most helpful is the jubilant song, which awakens the emotions and arouses the enthusiasm of the singers. When a gathering is apathetic, there is no strain that will awaken the emotions of the audience quicker than :

We'll shout his praise in glory,
So will I! so will I!
And we'll all sing Hallelujah,
In Heaven by-and-by.

When a song of this character has been started, it breaks down the barriers of indifference and secures the sympathy of the audience. Then, when the sympathies have been awakened, I would have them sing an air that would take them back to the time of their conversion :

At the Cross, at the Cross where I first saw light,
And the burden of sin rolled away;
It was there by faith I recovered my sight,
And now I'm happy night and day.

This would recall to their minds their adoption and early experience in the fold, and would enkindle a new flame of love and devotion in their hearts toward their Saviour.

In solos I place little confidence, and cannot regard them as of real importance in revival music. They tend to divert the attention from the service and fix it upon one person and one voice. I believe that all present should participate in the singing. Even in a revival that is to last but one night, I should insist on this; for inevitably there will be many there who may never be there again. A hymn that all can sing is the hymn that suits each one the best.

There are some revivalists who prefer to take a solo singer along with them, wherever they do their work. Such singing may arouse the interest; but I think it does not aid in awakening or conviction. A solo may be an excellent thing to have sung during the collection.

The best congregational singing I ever heard was when I was with the Rev. Dr. Talmage, ten years ago. There were five thousand with one voice following the great organ, and singing :

Bringing in the sheaves,
Bringing in the sheaves;
We shall come rejoicing
Bringing in the sheaves.

That, I remember, was his favorite hymn. The tone, volume and effect were magnificent.

I think perhaps one of the best choirs I ever listened to was at a recent revival I conducted in New Haven. They understood music and were well trained by Mr. Willis, their leader, before I arrived, and besides, I found them all conversant with my hymns. As the result of this preparation, they sang splendidly!

It is very seldom that I interrupt my sermon to start a hymn; yet sometimes I pause, and request that a single verse that may be in accord with the sermon, be sung. I am dependent very largely on song to accomplish the result aimed at, and sometimes two-thirds of the evening are devoted to it. In singing, I study the adaptability of the words and the music, and select those hymns which seem to me to be specially fitted for that special occasion. Frequently I have them repeat the exercise many, many times, thus deepening the conviction and relieving the burden. One of the hymns specially adapted to such emergencies is:

I will believe; I do believe,
That Jesus died for me;
That on the Cross he shed his blood,
From sin to set me free.

A hymn I have found most helpful to seekers has been :

But drops of grief will ne'er repay,
The debt of love I owe;
Here, Lord, I give myself away—
'Tis all that I can do.

For seekers, this has been the most successful and helpful hymn I have ever known.

Most of the ministers with whom I have labored have their favorite hymn. Bishop Wiley's was :

Down at the Cross where my Saviour died;
Down where for cleansing for sin I cried;
There to my heart was the blood applied—
Glory to his name!

Sometimes the choice is characteristic of the temperament of the preacher. Rev. Dr. Musgrave's favorite is :

Have you been to Jesus for the cleansing power?
Are you washed in the blood of Lamb?
Are you fully trusting in his grace this hour?
Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?

Similarly, the hymn that best suits Dr. Talmage's enthusiastic temperament is, as I have already stated : "Bringing in the sheaves."

There are times when the power of Gospel song is peculiarly manifested, and this has been the case in several of the great revivals in which I have been a humble worker. About four years ago I went to Boston and began a series of revival services in Dr. Ela's Church, known as the Bromfield Street Church, in that city. The Reverend Doctor had invited me to spend one Sabbath with him. The work at once broke out in earnest, and the services continued for seventeen weeks, during which time the conservative Hub was shaken by the Spirit. During these weeks, hundreds were brought to Christ, including many prominent business men, among whom I now recall Mr. Rich of Trinity Church, Charlestown (a suburb of Boston), Mr. Morrill and others. They came forward to the altar and pledged their allegiance to Christ. We held meetings also at Charlestown, and these, with those held in Boston, occupied seventeen weeks, increasing in interest and developing in power with every meeting. My only regret is that it should have been closed all too soon. At all these services, song was a potent factor in awakening the hearts of the audiences.

Still another city where God's Spirit wrought powerfully among the multitudes and where songs of Christian jubilation sustained the enthusiasm, was Providence, R. I. As you know, there are two capitals to little Rhode Island, one being Newport, the other Providence. I went to the latter to spend three weeks, and remained thirteen weeks, my principal work being in the old Chestnut Street M. E. Church. The work was slow at first, but deepened daily, widened every week, and extended monthly, until hundreds rose and called the meetings precious! Among those who took a deep interest was Mr. Tarbell, the Superintendent of State Schools, and Mr. Smith, a teacher in the Classical School. The agitation spread, and we were compelled to hold services morning, afternoon and night, the morning meetings being held as early as six o'clock. At these early gatherings many mechanics and numbers of business men attended, the former dropping in on their way to work. At the evening meetings, the churches were thronged, the singing was wonderfully effective, and this was more particularly the case as the revival drew to a close.

A hymn will often conquer an obstinate man. There are some that will take one's memory back to childhood and bring tears to the eyes. Such hymns will be able to touch the spirit of most men. I have known hymns that had the effect of raising men from their seats and sending them forward as seekers. This was brought about by the singing rather than the sermon. The Bible truth in the hymns sends conviction to the heart.

AN AFRICAN EMANCIPATOR.

KHAMA, THE CHRISTIAN KING OF THE BAMANGWATO, WHO FREED HIS SLAVES.

A Remarkable Illustration of the Power of Christianity—How the Warfare Against Slavery Progresses—It has Disappeared from a Large Part of the Dark Continent.

CHRISTIANITY'S war on slavery belongs almost exclusively to the present century. Step by step, the dark places of the earth have been sought out and illumined by a Gospel that assures freedom to all mankind. One by one, the outworks have been carried and the principal strongholds stormed. Inland are many tribes by whom it has been totally abolished as the result of missionary teachings and spiritual enlightenment. But in the Soudan, around the great lakes, and along the margin of the Sahara, from Lake Tchad to the Atlantic, it still holds sway.

One of the most notable of African Christian potentates, whose rule God has blessed to his people, is King Khama, of the tribe of the Bamangwato, in Bechuanaland, whose portrait appears on the first page of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. This monarch is about sixty years old, tall, erect, and young looking. Khama's father, Sekhoma, was the chief of a tribe at Shoshong, in Bechuanaland, which was frequently subjected to raids by the warlike Matabele nation. With his four brothers, Khama was baptized in 1865, and their father, Sekhoma, being a heathen, sought to kill them. Three of the brothers, frightened by his threats, returned to heathenism. Ultimately the old chief abandoned his murderous designs, but he seized every opportunity to persecute them.

Khama's strength of character and Christian resolution were soon to be tested. Many years before, his father Sekhoma had usurped the chiefship of the Bamangwato, driving his brother Macheng, the reigning chief, from the country. Sekhoma now invited Macheng to return, on condition that he should put to death the Christian sons of Sekhoma, whom the latter had been unable to subdue. Macheng accepted the terms and assumed the rulership. In a speech at the public welcome to Macheng, Khama sternly rebuked the man who came to rule with murder in his heart. Macheng spared the young men, and after his death, Khama was chosen by the people as king or chief, the terms being synonymous among many African tribes.

When he was invested with power, Khama at once showed his progressive Christian character. One of his earliest acts was the freeing of the slaves and the nomad subject tribes, to all of whom he gave seed-corn and cattle, and encouraged them in pastoral pursuits.

He built the town of Palapye, in the Cwamong mountains, the former capital Shoshong, having become uninhabitable through scarcity of water. The new town covers some twenty square miles; it has broad avenues, bridle and foot-paths and the dwellings are all of red clay, well-built and thatched, each having a plot of land contiguous. He has also encouraged the building of many churches and he is the staunch friend of the missionaries. Moreover, the wife of this Christian king is herself a Christian and an active worker in the church.

In strong contrast to this happy condition of affairs in Bechuanaland, is the picture presented on the first page of a trading caravan near Benguela on the west American coast. The caravan is composed of Biheans and Balundos, among whom the missionaries of the American Board have been laboring with considerable success, during the last ten years. In the trading caravan are a number of slaves, who may be distinguished in the illustration by their abject posture.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

Evidence From a Coffin—A Father's Long Search for a Daughter—A Family Quarrel—A Marriage in a Prison—A Skillful Counterfeit Bill—Inspection of Immigrants.

AN Exhumed Bible was presented as evidence in a law-court in Boston, Mass., last week. The Transcript of that city states that the claimants to a large fortune, part of which is some valuable real estate in Alabama, have found long missing evidence, substantiating their title, in a grave. The evidence needed was a family record proving their relationship to a millionaire who died in Boston more than twenty years ago. They obtained permission from the court to open the grave of a member of the family who died in 1866, and when that was done they found a Bible which was serving as a pillow under the head of the corpse. On the fly-leaf were entries of births, marriages and deaths which show their relationship to the deceased millionaire. It is likely to prove a valuable book to them, and if they do not confine their attention to the fly-leaf, but study other parts of the volume, they will find that its value is not limited to their present purpose. It will tell them how they may become heirs of God. (Rev. 21 : 7.)

The Mysterious Perturbation of a Ship's Compass is reported in a scientific journal. It appears that the surveying ship Penguin recently anchored off the northwest coast of Australia. It was noticed that the compass was deflected fifty-five degrees, and had "a dip" of eighty-three degrees. After the ship left the anchorage and proceeded on her voyage, the disturbance ceased. At two miles from the point the variation was quite normal. The captain spent a day in investigating the phenomenon. He passed two or three times over the point where he had anchored, and found that whenever the ship crossed it, the compass was disturbed as before, and recovered when at a distance of two miles in any direction. This satisfied him that the centre of the submarine disturbance was limited to a circle of less than two miles in diameter. He is convinced that the deflections were caused by the presence of magnetic minerals at the sea bottom. The journal reporting his observation says: "Great as is the gain to the navigator to be thus warned of a formidable danger in certain places, it lays upon him, the imperative duty of being always on his guard against such sources of disaster elsewhere, and of promptly reporting any new magnetic disturbance, as he would a rock or shoal." Similar vigilance is necessary on the part of every voyager through life. In certain scenes and among certain environments the conscience is apt to be under influences which impair its usefulness as a guide. (Titus 1 : 15.)

A Twenty-five Years' Search for a Lost daughter has been the sole occupation of a distressed father in New York. The reporter of a daily journal noticed last week a shabbily-dressed old man cowering for warmth near the stove of a Bowery lodging-house. He looked so poor and so weary that the reporter asked him what his trouble was. The man replied that he was seventy-six years old, but he was engaged in a search which he must still pursue, for he could not rest until it was successful. In 1866 he lost his daughter, then fifteen years old. He sought her all over the city and followed clues to other places. After a time, as he did not succeed in finding her, he disposed of his business and gave all his time to the quest. He could not bear to give her up and continued looking for the girl ten years. One cold winter night he caught sight of her in dissolute company in the Bowery. He called to her, but she ran away and he could not overtake her, and her companions jeered him. That sight of her renewed his energy and he redoubled his efforts. Fifteen years have passed since then, but he has never seen her since. His reason became impaired, but he holds fast to his one pursuit. He is quite harmless and those who know him pitying his misery, feed him and occasionally give him a cast-off garment. The keeper of the lodging-house lets him sleep there free in the morning, for the old man wanders about the streets the greater part of the night. He thinks still he may see his daughter any day and his long search will be rewarded. He is the only person who has that hope. Yet if the daughter still lives, and were to know how patiently and persistently her father has sought her perhaps she would return to him. But it might not be so: our Heavenly Father has entreated many of his wandering children to return to him for a longer period than that, and they know of it yet they will not return. (Hosea 7 : 10.)

Ladders have to be Used to Reach the Bed-rooms of a house in Connecticut, owing to a family quarrel. Some years ago a farmer living at North Haven died, leaving his house and farm jointly to his two sons for use during their lives. His money and personal property were left in the same way. The testator did not leave anything to them absolutely but only the use and income. The principal and the land were to go to their children when his sons died, and if either died without issue the children of the other brother were to have the whole. As only one of the brothers had children the other was jealous and sought, by adopting a child, to prevent his brother's children inheriting the estate. This scheme led to litigation and frequent disputes. Both brothers lived in the old house, the childless one occupying the whole of the second story. The other brother's family had to pass through the second story to reach their bed-rooms which were on the third story. When the quarrel arose they found their way cut off, the occupier of the second story having boarded up the passage through his domain. Pending an appeal to the courts, the family has to use ladders, reared outside the house, to reach its sleeping apartments. The situation seems somewhat ridiculous but it is a type of a very sad condition which is widespread. Many families find it difficult to get rest in life because of the exacting nature of their employers who pay them so little for their work that scarcely can they earn enough to support them by toiling day and night. The churl in Connecticut is not the only man who ignores the duties of brotherhood. (James 5 : 4.)

A Marriage was Solemnized in the Chenango (N. Y.), County jail recently. Some months ago a young man settled in Susquehanna, where he found employment as a blacksmith in the Erie Railroad's shops. He became acquainted with a beautiful girl who was living with her parents at Bainbridge. The acquaintance ripened into love, and as the girl's parents heard an excellent account of the young man's industry and ability in his business, they consented to accept him as a son-in-law. The young man began to prepare a home for his bride and they were to have been married shortly, when an embarrassing event occurred. The prospective bridegroom had occasion to make a visit to Oxford and while there visited the saloons and fell into the company of dishonest people. He could not remember exactly what occurred, but when he became sober he found himself in prison. The police had arrested the whole gang on a charge of larceny and he was taken with them. He stoutly declared his innocence, but the case went against him at the trial and he was sentenced to a term of imprisonment. The girl to whom he was engaged was much distressed by her lover's plight, but she refused to believe him guilty. Other people pitied her for her credulity, but the more difficult she found it to convince them the more earnest she grew in his defence. She declared that she would surely marry him in spite of his disgrace and finally resolved to marry him at once, the she might give a convincing proof of her faith in his innocence. Her parents were won over and they went with her to the prison in which her lover was confined. The sheriff yielded to their plan and a minister was sent for, who officiated at the ceremony. After spending an hour together the bridegroom went back to his cell and the bride returned home with her parents. Many of the bride's friends consider her conduct extremely imprudent but even they admire her fidelity to her lover in his trouble. An infinitely greater proof of love is that which the Saviour gives to sinners. Though there is no question of their guilt, he loves them still, and all who believe on him he takes into union with himself. (Rom. 5 : 7, 8.)

A Dangerous Counterfeit Two-Dollar Silver certificate is in circulation. Heretofore all counterfeits of our paper currency have been readily detected by experienced persons, through the failure of the counterfeiters to exactly imitate the genuine note in all its peculiarities. In this case, however, to the naked eye the counterfeit seems perfect. The vignette of Hancock is as fine as the original, and the lettering and lathe work are an exact copy of the Treasury note. In fact, the only difference is that in the upper left hand and lower right hand corner of the genuine note, on the figure 2, is engraved in characters so minute that they are not legible, except under a magnifying glass, the word "two," repeated three times. In the counterfeit the word "two" is similarly engraved the same number of times, but in two cases the counterfeiter has made the letters read "owt." Many of these counterfeits have passed undetected the sharp eyes of bank-tellers and have not been found out till they reached the Treasury. Counterfeit Christianity is similarly difficult of detection. Ministers and Christian workers are often deceived by designing persons who want to gain the worldly advantages that a profession of religion gives, but though they may pass the ordeal of the Church, detection is certain when they come to stand at the bar of him whose eye looketh on the heart. (Ezek. 33 : 31.)

Increased Vigilance in the Inspection of Immigrants is now demanded by the Washington government. So many afflicted persons who become a public charge have come here in past years, that it is necessary to watch every ship-load of immigrants carefully. Diseased persons, semi-idiot, the halt, the lame and the blind are now carefully excluded. It is to find these that Dr. Guiteras and his assistants in New York, go out on the stone pier nearly every day in the year and watch the immigrants as they descend the gang plank from the immigrant barges. Decrepit men or women, whose labored gait generally gives them away, are always detained for further examination. An immigrant with a glass eye is invariably held—not to pay duty on his eye, but to allow the doctors to make a careful examination of his real eye to see if it is likely to last. Several immigrants with glass eyes have been sent back since the Federal Government took charge of immigration at this port, because the sight of their remaining eyes was so poor that their ability to support themselves was a question of only a few months. The deaf and dumb are not detected at the gang-plank. They are found out by the registry clerks, who always ask questions requiring verbal responses. The excluded persons being sent back at the expense of the company to which the ship bringing them belongs, the captains are now more careful to see that no aged steerage passengers are brought, nor any who are not physically and mentally sound. Probably these stringent regulations cause severe disappointment to many who would like to come here. It may be hoped that all such will be led to seek the Saviour, so that when they die, they will be welcomed into that land from which none are excluded who come through Christ. (Luke 14 : 21.)

JONAH SENT TO NINEVEH.

S. S. LESSON FOR APRIL 19, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
JONAH I: 1-17. GOLDEN TEXT, JONAH 3: 2.

The Command to the Prophet—Why he Hesitated to Obey—His Concern for His Reputation as a Prophet—His Attempt to Avoid Service—The Providential Storm—Jonah's Indifference—His Confession—The Sailors Reluctant to Sacrifice Him—The Storm Calmed.

OW the word of the Lord came unto Jonah, the son of Amittai." Such is the abrupt introduction of a prophet in the chronicles of God, which shall not pass away, though "heaven and earth shall pass away." God lives in eternity; he records in his Book of truth just that in a man's life which bears upon eternity. His birth, his parentage; the incidents which may illustrate his natural character, such as appear in man-written biographies, are wanting in the Book of God. But that page which tells of the purposes of God in which he may have been an instrument, finds place in God's holy record.

"Arise, go to Nineveh, that great city, and cry against it; for their wickedness is come up before me." Jonah had no difficulty in understanding his commission. He had no doubt as to the leading of God; he had been familiar with such leadings for many years, but it did not accord with his plans for himself. "Jonah rose up to flee unto Tarshish from the presence of the Lord." What! he knew God's will, and would not do it? Yes; it was even so. Jonah

Loved Popularity;

he loved to have people say: "What Jonah foretells is sure to come to pass." He knew God as "a gracious God, and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and he could not face the possibility of being found a false prophet. If he declared that Nineveh should be destroyed, and then God in mercy spared the city, how galling it would be if the little street arabs should run after him saying, "Eh, Jonah; it wasn't right this time; who said Nineveh was to be destroyed?" His pride and self-love could not stand such a humiliation. So Jonah sought to run away from God! It was a difficult task which he undertook. A wiser man than he had discovered the futility of attempting to hide away from God. "Whither shall I go from thy Spirit, or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell; behold, thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me." (Ps. 139: 7, 10.)

Jonah took ship to Tarshish, with the purpose of getting away from God. Oh, the tenderness of God with his rebellious children! He did not think it too much to send a tempest in the sea, for the sake of that one stubborn child of his, that one rebellious prophet! Never say things happen by chance, or come in the course of nature. Behind chance and behind nature, there lies

A First Cause.

Because God has something to say and something to do, the storm, the pestilence, the famine, the season of cold or of heat are permitted in this world of ours. "The mariners were afraid;" they saw the gravity of the situation. They first cried to their false gods, and then cast the cargo overboard. Only one man was callous; the man who knew the only true God was the only man who did not pray in this hour of danger! The heathen sailors were anxious for their own lives and those of the passengers; but Jonah, a believer who had got wrong with God, was indifferent to his own danger and that of others, and he went to sleep! What kind of witness was such a man of that God who "so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son" to die for and to save them? The attention of the captain was called to this selfish man, and he came and aroused him with the words, "What meanest thou, O sleeper? Arise and call upon thy God, if so be that God will think upon us that we perish not." The heathen believe in an over-ruling providence, the sailors cast lots that they might discover for whose cause this evil was upon them. Things were coming to a crisis. God was pursuing Jonah, the lot fell upon him, and at once his name, address, occupation, etc., were taken down. A man who seeks to hide from God must fall under man's inspection. And Jonah was not afraid to own, which made the sea and the dry land." But what kind of witness was this man of Jehovah? "I fear Jehovah," and I run away from Jehovah. The fleeing prophet had told the crew the object of his journey. These heathen men were accustomed to gods which they could manage very easily; they could make them, ornament them, burn them, change, and do much as they liked with them. But this man had an unseen God, whose power they were feeling at that very moment, a God who moved sea and land to conquer his rebellious child—this was something new. If God's own child was so careless about the souls of these poor heathen, God was not: he would find means to arouse them, in spite of the unfaithfulness of Jonah. "What shall we do unto thee," they asked, "that the sea may be calm unto us?" "Take me up and cast me into the sea; so shall the sea be calm unto you, for I know that for my sake this great tempest is upon you." It was more and more incomprehensible to these heathen mariners. Here was a man seeking to withstand his God who had all power; he recognizes his hand in all that happens; and he does not prize the knowledge of such a God. So far from recommending his God, Jonah was possessed of a selfishness and callousness which made the very heathen despise him! Are there not many Jonahs in our midst, who dishonor rather than recommend God?

"I Fear Jehovah,

The poor sailors did their best to bring the ship to land, but no sailor can land without God's permission, and he willed it not. Then these heathen that innocent blood might not be laid upon them, and they cast Jonah into the sea, "and the sea ceased from her raging." Impossible not to recognize the hand of God. All that crew were precious in God's sight, because one of his children, though rebellious, had been amongst them! He would save them, but no thanks to Jonah, who might have been his instrument but for his despicable selfishness. God's voice in the stilled waters conquered the poor heathen men, while his voice in offering Jonah the privilege of being his messenger to a mighty city was disregarded! The men feared the Lord, exceedingly, and offered a sacrifice to the Lord, and made vows. The whole crew turned to the Lord, although the only preacher amongst them was suspended! God will find a way to save souls, even though his chosen instruments may fail him. He has said to others besides Esther, "If thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, then shall there enlargement and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place." (Esther 4: 14.) God is not limited by his instruments; he could work without any of us.

But God had not forgotten his rebellious child. He who had stirred up the tempest to withstand Jonah would not abandon him now: "The Lord had prepared a great fish to swallow up Jonah. And Jonah was in the belly of the fish three days and three nights." Agnostics and other creatures who are in the habit of criticising their Creator regard it as the height of absurdity to believe in the story of Jonah. If Jesus Christ believed it, and quoted the history as a type of his own resurrection (Matt. 12: 39, 40), who need be ashamed of such belief.

In this strange oratory, Jonah met with God. His life was preserved by a miracle as great as that which sustained Moses, Elijah, and the Lord himself, during their respective fasts of forty days. Jonah cried unto the Lord and testified, "He heard me; out of the belly of hell (or the grave) cried I, and thou heardest my voice." His experiences had been those of utter despair. Yet he always recognized the hand of God. "Thou," not the sailors, "hadst cast me into the deep. . . . all thy billows and thy waves passed over me. Then I said, I am cast out of thy sight; yet I will look again toward thy holy temple." Probably the disobedient prophet was so full of his own side of the question, and of the injury it would be to all the work he might do for his God in the future if his prophecies did not come true, that until a pressure was brought to bear upon him physically, and a real danger of drowning and then of being suffocated had extracted his cry of despair; he had never entertained the idea that he was in the wrong, but looked upon himself as a very ill-used man! It is strange how blind we all are to the real truth about ourselves, until God opens our eyes. Although still in his strange prison, he had asked, and obtained of his God a new lease of life, and was so conscious of God's dealing with him, that he spoke of it as though he were already released. It took a great deal to conquer Jonah at this time, but God at last accomplished it, and he said, "When my soul fainted within me, I remembered the Lord; and my prayer came in unto thee, into thine holy temple." Jonah was so far conquered that even in his present circumstances

He Could Praise

his God! "I will sacrifice unto thee with the voice of thanksgiving; I will pay that I have vowed. Salvation is of the Lord." This is always the crucial point. Can we in the midst of the trial, just when and where the pressure is the greatest, look up and praise God? If so, just then and just there comes deliverance. "The Lord spake unto the fish, and it vomited out Jonah upon the dry land."

A MYSTERIOUS MANDATE.

A CORRESPONDENT in North Carolina writes us that talking recently with a lady of strong faith and sterling piety on the ways of God in Providence, her friend related the following incident from her own experience:

"You are aware," she said, "that I am now in reduced circumstances. My husband at one time was engaged in a lucrative mercantile business, and, although of prudent habits, his benevolence led him to endorse largely for one who had won his confidence as a Christian brother, but afterwards proved to be a designing knave. This resulted in his failure, when, with scrupulous integrity, everything was given up to his creditors. A season of unusual severity and general business depression then prevailed. My husband's most diligent efforts to secure employment were unsuccessful. Finally the little stock of provisions we possessed rapidly diminished, and we saw no way to obtain more, since we could not conscientiously incur a debt with no prospect of payment. I carried the case to him who says, 'Call upon me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me.'

"Gathering my little ones about me, I fell upon my knees, and, in an agony of prayer, besought the Lord for help. One, two, three hours passed. It was now four o'clock in the afternoon and my little children, who had tasted no food since early morning, began to cry for bread. Impelled by some strange and irresistible influence I could not understand, I went into the dining-room, and putting the last handful of coal into the stove, placed the tea-kettle filled with water thereon; then calling my little ones together, we again knelt and pleaded again with God for succor. Soon a heavenly tranquillity filled my soul, and in full assurance of faith, expecting deliverance, while still upon my knees in prayer, there was a ring at the door-bell. I arose, under the full conviction that relief was at hand, opened the door, when a servant handed me a sealed envelope saying as she hurried down the steps, 'I was told not to wait for an answer.' Eagerly tearing open the envelope, a great throb of gratitude went up to God when I saw a ten-dollar bank-note neatly folded between the sheet. A choking sensation clutched my throat, a mist gathered before my eyes, and it was some minutes before I could read this remarkable letter:

"My dear friend: Enclosed please find and accept this small favor. I must explain to you why I send it. This afternoon about four o'clock, while I lay upon a sick bed tossing with pain, suddenly a voice seemed to say to me, 'Send ten dollars to Mrs. W., she is in want!' I was astonished. I could not believe you needed help. I tried to banish the thought and go to sleep. But the voice said again with painful distinctness, even more impressively than before, 'Send ten dollars to Mrs. W., she is in want.' I scorned the idea as weak and silly—a mere phantasy of a sick brain. I tried to get rid of it, but could not; the more I fought it the stronger and more solemn the impression grew, until to get peace, and with feelings akin to awe, I bade the servant hand me my writing-desk, that I might pen you this feeble note and send you the enclosed sum. As I obey this imperative whisper, I feel such rest, and a singular peace following compliance with its dictates, that I almost believe it to be supernatural. I never knew the like before. Assuring you that I am acting under the strange influence of some mighty power, I ask that you will use the enclosed as seems best, and may an All-wise God abundantly bless you and yours, is the prayer of your

THE DECISIVE DECADE: 1891--1901.

BY REV. GEORGE BROWNE, (Presbyterian Minister.)

We are undoubtedly on the eve of great and startling events as indicated by certain signs political, social, and prophetic. The whole of Europe is under arms, and its immense standing armies are out of all proportion to the population of the different countries to which they belong. Everything is being done to prepare for such a conflict as has never been known in the world before, and, as was remarked in one of the daily papers, so great and sanguinary is it to be, that the greatest conflicts we have ever read of will be as child's play compared with it. This precisely corresponds with our present predicted position at the close of the sixth vial in Revelation 16:12-16 upon the verge of "The war of the great day of God Almighty." It is true that we hear of stringent measures for preserving peace while underneath all pacific protests are lying bayonets ready for the fray. The nations are crying peace when there is no peace for there is no real cessation of the jealousies and animosity of the European powers.

Statesmen say the peace of Europe is assured; be it so. But just before the great war of 1870 broke out between Germany and France, which was much inferior to

The Forthcoming Struggle, the political outlook was just as peaceful as at present, and yet hostilities broke out as a thunderbolt from a clear sky. Every far-sighted man must see that unless the Powers reduce their overgrown military armaments, war with all its horrors cannot long be averted. And the coming war will form the confederacy of the ten kingdoms symbolized by the ten-horned wild beast in Daniel 7:24, before 1893, and about that year we may expect the Antichrist predicted as Daniel's Little Horn and as St. Paul's Man of Sin in II. Thessalonians 2, to be revealed for the first time as a Monarch over a little Eastern State, and in due time to run his predestined career as the world's Monarch for three and a half years from 1897 until the end of this age in Passover Week, 1901.

But it will be asked, how can the end of this age be demonstrated to be on the 22nd day of the Jewish month of Nisan, in 1901? Here we are at the outset confronted by the oft repeated objection, "Of that day and hour knoweth no man, not even the angels, neither the Son." This text was spoken by Christ in the present tense, and simply implied that at that time no one knew the day and hour of Christ's Second Advent, but Christ did not say "No man shall know," but only "No man knoweth." And there is no declaration in the Bible that men should not at a later period be able to discover from Scripture prophecies the time of the Second Advent of Christ.

We must, moreover, remember that when our Lord was subsequently about to leave his disciples and ascend into heaven, he used the very

Significant Words:

"It is good for you that I go away, for if I go not away the Holy Spirit will not come. I will send him to you from the Father, and he will lead you into all truth." This gives us clearly to understand that we may know these things now. We may know it from the book of Revelation, given by Christ to St. John in Patmos sixty years after he had said, "Of that day and hour knoweth no man."

We have first of all the general fact that we are living close to the terminating extremity—the clay-iron-toes—of Nebuchadnezzar's prophetic human image symbolizing the four great Gentile empires in Daniel 2, and we are situated in the instep of the feet, just before the formation by great European commotions, of the ten toes or ten confederate kings and kingdoms within the Roman world of the Cæsars.

Then, further, we have the 2,300 years in Daniel 8:14, which were to commence simultaneously with the sixty-nine weeks of years in Daniel 9:25, at the going forth of the command to restore and build Jerusalem in the month Nisan of Artaxerxes' 20th year, B.C. 445, according to Nehemiah 2:1, and were to end with the inchoate cleansing of the sanctuary of the Holy Land, which came to pass precisely at the end of the 2,300 years on the 22nd day of Nisan, 1856, when, by the signing of the Crimean War Treaty of peace, political and religious freedom was legally conceded to the Jews and Christians in Palestine.

Then in Daniel 12:11, 12, we are told that the latter 1,290 years of these 2,300 years were to be the period of the conjoint Papal and Moslem abomination of desolation, namely, from A. D. 566 to Nisan 22, 1856; and still further that "Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the end of the 1,335 years" which are the extension of the 1,290 years by the addition of 45 years, so that the time of full Blessedness at the descent of Christ at Jerusalem will be on Nisan 22 (the last day of Passover Week) in 1901 precisely 45 years after Nisan 22, 1856, that is to say, on April 11, 1901.

We thus find that

Four Great Events

were foretold in connection with Daniel's three chronological periods of sixty-nine weeks and 2,300 years, and the additional 45 years (the latter portion of the 1,335) in Dan. 9:25, and 8:14, and 12:11, 12, and that three of these great events have all come to pass exactly as predicted, and therefore, as reasonable persons, we justly expect that the fourth of these events will come to pass precisely as predicted, namely, the end of this age and the incoming of full blessedness at the descent of Christ at Jerusalem on April 11 (the last day of Passover Week), 1901. "Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the end of the 1,335 years." (Dan. 12:12.)

God gave these prophecies to Daniel about 535 B. C., ninety years before the first of these four great events was accomplished, namely, the going forth of the command to restore and build Jerusalem in Passover month, Nisan 445 years before Christ, as stated in Daniel 9:26-6 and Nehemiah 2. Then exactly at the end of the first period of sixty-nine weeks or 483 years from Nisan 445 B. C. there took place the second great event, namely, Messiah being cut off or made a covenant in Passover week, Nisan, A. D. 39. And exactly at the end of the second period of 2,300 years from Nisan B. C. 445, there took place the third great event, the signing of the Crimean War Treaty of Peace on Nisan 22, 1856, from whence there remains the third period of 45 years (the overlapping of the 1,335 years beyond the last 1,290 of the 2,300 years) which will end with the fourth great event, the personal descent of Christ at Jerusalem on April 11, 1901.

This, however, will be the concluding stage of Christ's Second Advent when he comes on earth as a Judge, as described in Zechariah 14:—in contradistinction to the introductory stage of his advent when he will come only "into the air" as a Bridegroom to raise deceased saints from their graves and to translate 144,000 expectant Christians to the glory of his presence without dying, as foretold in I. Thess. 4:16, 17, and Rev. 12:5 and 14:1-5. This coming of Christ to translate living Christians to heaven, we expect on Thursday, March 5, 1896, precisely five years from to-day, (March 5, 1891,) and for this reason we are here assembled in order to observe this as a Commemoration Day or Anniversary in advance, of the ascension of 144,000 Christians who shall be translated to heaven like Enoch and Elijah.

March 5, 1896, is shown to be the day of this Translation, by Daniel's famous sixty-nine weeks which in their future fulfilment as weeks of days reach from November 8, 1894, "unto Messiah the Prince's" second coming to be made a covenant to his people on March 5, 1896, just as in their past fulfilment as weeks of years they reached from Passover Week B. C. 445 "unto Messiah the Prince's" first coming to be made a covenant to his people in Passover Week A. D. 39.

These Sixty-Nine Weeks

in Daniel 9:25-6 have been strenuously maintained by Rev. Dr. Todd, Rev. Joseph Tyso, Rev. R. Govett, and others to be sixty-nine weeks of literal days reaching to the second coming of Christ, although they have also had one fulfilment as sixty-nine weeks of years reaching to the first coming of Christ.

Just as the sixty-nine weeks of years commenced with a command to rebuild Jerusalem B. C. 445 at the beginning of the 2,345 years before the end of this age on April 11, 1901, so the sixty-nine weeks of days must commence with another command to rebuild Jerusalem on November 8, 1894, at the beginning of the 2,345 days before the end of this age on April 11, 1901. Hence we shall have a very distinct forewarning on November 8, 1894, by a command going forth on that day to rebuild Jerusalem and we cannot help knowing that sixty-nine weeks of days subsequently, there will be the coming of Messiah the Prince "in the air."

We have seen in the last few days in connection with the German Empress Frederick's visit to Paris, what an unfriendly feeling exists among many of the French against Germany, and it only needs a little spark to bring about a European conflagration. Some people say that it is incredible that within so short a time as the next ten years all the concluding events of this age can transpire. But let us remember how within a month or two the Franco-Prussian War of 1870 was practically settled by the battle of Sedan. And last year Dom Pedro, Emperor of Brazil, was in a few days deposed from his throne by an almost bloodless revolution and exiled.

So even if the predestined European war does not break out before the early part of 1892, there may be time for the transformation of the twenty or more present States within the Roman earth into the Ten-kingdomed Confederacy of Daniel 7:24 before 1893, and in Passover Week 1894 the Napoleonic Little Horn, then King of Syria, may be in a position to make his seven years' Covenant reaching to 'the End in Passover Week 1901.

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" EVANGELIST.*JAMES H. CANNON, "THE GOSPEL SINGER" AND HIS NOBLE WORK FOR CHRIST.How a Bold Sinner was Converted and Became the Means of Bringing Hundreds to the Saviour—His Evangelical Work in Many Cities—A Golden Opportunity.(See Portrait.)

RACE abounding, celebrated by John Bunyan as the power which transformed him and his life, has worked the same miracle on many since his day, and is still the only power we know of which can so operate on the human soul.

Let heart-broken parents, grieving over the perversity of sons, fully set on the course that leads to ruin and death, say what other power there is that can save a soul from destruction. Punishment, kindness, entreaty, command,—all influences fail; the young man's own efforts, promises and good resolutions prove futile and all seems lost. Yet, let the grace of God touch the heart and the transformation is made. Saul the persecutor becomes Paul the Apostle; Augustine, the abandoned libertine becomes the saintly writer and preacher, and John Bunyan, the swearing tinker, the heroic prisoner for Christ's sake and the glorious dreamer of beatific visions. That grace is still in operation, achieving similar wondrous changes under our own observation, differing not in kind, however much they may differ in degree. One such instance is that of the evangelist whose portrait we give here, a man who was once a willing servant of Satan, but is now laboring so successfully for the Saviour that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has decided to extend the sphere of his usefulness.

James Henry Cannon was born in Painfield, N. J., Dec. 27, 1855, of Catholic parents. His father was a tailor. It cannot be said that pious influences surrounded his childhood, for he was permitted to run pretty much at large with other boys of the neighborhood, and he grew up a wild lad. He was a leader in juvenile mischief, and with other youths frequented the railroad depot a good deal, where he became the most expert of the band in jumping on and off the moving coal trains. One day he miscalculated and fell between the wheels, where his right arm was crushed so badly that it had to be amputated. At thirteen he left his home and went to Communipaw, N. J., where he became a newsboy, selling papers at the Stock Yards. Mr. S. H. Smith, the kindly superintendent, saw the boy, and believing that a better nature lay hidden beneath the rough exterior, engaged him as messenger for the Stock Yard Company.

Young Cannon performed his new duties satisfactorily, but otherwise his conduct remained unchanged. He associated with wicked young men, and gave little heed to the well-meant advice of his friends. He had at this time no thought of religion, and was the wickedest and most profane of a circle of boon companions, whose delight it was to mock at sacred things. When he was fifteen years old, a great change came over his life, which is thus described in his own vigorous language:

"There were five of us, and I was the leader in all their deviltries—the champion in their exploits of evil. One Sunday we went to the Methodist Church, on Communipaw Avenue, where revival services were being held. We had made up our minds, outside of the church, to go forward to the altar for fun, and to make a mockery of the holy ordinance; but when the invitation was given, instead of advancing to the altar, the last of our band turned and went out. All the rest of us followed him. Without observing it, I had left my hat in the church and, as it was snowing outside, I was obliged to pluck up courage, return and get it. Presently we got over our hesitation and made up our minds to go forward again the next night—purely out of the love of evil, and with the purpose of disturbing the congregation. We failed to realize what a frightful sacrilege we were about to commit.

"I will never forget that night—it was the eighth of March, 1870. We all went up to the altar, but instead of mockery, prayers came to our lips. It was the Spirit of God that took hold of us, and as we knelt there, we felt the enormity of our sins and repented deeply. They had a praying band there that night, led by Mr. James Carpenter, who is now with Mr. Crittenden, the founder of the Florence Mission. And how they did pray! Earnest and tearful appeals to the throne for pardon were followed—so my companions assured me—by divine forgiveness. All five of us professed conversion, and the five who had come to scoff at the Lord's altar departed with hearts full of praise for his goodness. We were a wild set of young men before that, myself the worst of the lot. Circumstances separated us afterward, and two of my old companions of these days are now dead. Since that meeting, I have continued to serve the Lord, and I find him the best of Masters. His service is a perpetual delight."

In March, 1890, Mr. Cannon began his public career as an evangelist. Of his old companions two had backslidden into sin and had met violent deaths. One was instantly killed by the railroad cars at Communipaw and the other was fatally kicked in the head by a horse. The two others were lost sight of. Strangely enough, it was in the same little Methodist Chapel in Communipaw, where he had twice come to scoff at God, that Mr. Cannon first preached. He had studied meanwhile and being naturally a fluent and graceful orator, had greatly improved his abilities. He had secured a license to exhort and he accepted an invitation to occupy the pulpit in the little chapel. He conducted services there for ten years, preaching Sundays and frequently week days as well. Then he became associated with the Wesley Evangelists, a band of young and earnest workers for Christ, organized about fifteen years ago, and he has been their leader ever since.

Mr. Cannon's experiences as an evangelist have taken him to many cities, and everywhere his ministrations have been signally blessed of God. Twice a week, Tuesdays and Fridays, he leads the service at the Florence Mission in New York. At Elizabethport, N. J., where he conducted a revival, in the Fulton Street Methodist Church, of which Rev. Dr. La Rue was pastor, hundreds were brought to the Saviour. The meetings were especially blessed to many of the railroad men there. Many conversions followed his work at White Plains, N. Y., where he assisted the Rev. Geo. H. Gregory; at Rev. S. H. Smith's South Third Methodist Church, Brooklyn; the Emory Church, Jersey City, Rev. Dr. Van Horne, pastor; the Central Methodist Church, Brooklyn, Rev. Dr. Partington, pastor; the First Place Methodist Church, Brooklyn, Rev. Dr. Thompson, pastor, and more lately, St. Luke's M. E. Church, Brooklyn, Rev. Dr. Aston, pastor. He has labored in hundreds of other churches of various denominations in the same earnest and effective way. He has recently conducted a most glorious revival at Oyster Bay, Long Island, N. Y., which continued three weeks, in the church of which Rev. W. A. Dickson is pastor. Mr. Cannon is aided in his evangelistic work by his accomplished wife, who is a fine musician and an ardent Christian.

For the future, Mr. Cannon's work in the revival field will be exclusively directed by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD which has inspired much of his labors in the past. It is the purpose of this journal to send this able, energetic and devoted servant of the Master wherever its readers deem his services to be specially required, and wherever his voice can be lifted up in exhortation, prayer and song for the advancement of the Gospel cause. Churches in and around New York City can thus have the assistance of an evangelist whose past labors in the Lord's vineyard have brought salvation to many hundreds of souls, without incurring any expense whatever beyond the mere cost of travel. We have been prompted to do this by the increasing demand for practical aid in evangelical work, more particularly from quarters where the congregations were poor. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will gladly respond to calls of this character and will co-operate with churches desiring Mr. Cannon to pay them a visit for a longer or shorter period. Letters from churches desiring the services of Mr. Cannon, may be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

N Eccentric Disposition of the body of a well-known citizen of New York, has formed the subject of much comment in the city. The citizen himself arranged the programme before his death, and exacted a promise from his friends that it should be faithfully and exactly carried out. In fulfilment of his injunctions, his body was cremated. Then the ashes were divided into four equal parts, which were placed in the charge of four of his friends. These accompanied by the members of a club to which they and the deceased belonged, crossed the bay to the Statue of Liberty. There they made merry with champagne, as the deceased had directed. Thus fortified, the four friends who bore the ashes, ascended the staircase inside the statue. At the top, each took his place at one of the points of the compass and, reciting a formula composed by their dead friend, scattered his ashes to the four winds. This done, they descended, partook of more wine, and returned. Why the citizen desired to have his remains disposed of in that way, we are not told. It may be hoped that his wish was a mere eccentricity and not a sign of a belief that the strange ceremony was the end of him, or of his admission that he was one of "the ungodly who are like the chaff which the wind driveth away." (Ps. 1: 4.)

The Discovery of a New Metal is Announced by an ironworker of Boston, Mass. He states that during a recent visit to the Rocky Mountains he found specimens of an ore which he had never before seen. He collected a considerable quantity and brought it home. Assayers in Boston, Chicago and Cincinnati, to whom he submitted it, told him that they could not tell him the name of the mineral. Experimenting with it, he found that when it and iron were reduced to a molten condition, they combined readily. The product of the alloy was a homogeneous metal of very fine pores, capable of higher finish than before. In the treatment of iron with only one per cent. of this new ore, the former's tensile strength was increased from ten to twenty-five per cent. If the discovery is genuine it will be very important, for the value of iron would be vastly increased if it could be made more ductile without impairing its strength. An effort is being made to produce the same result with Christian character by similar means. The result is not a success. Though the mixture of a little worldliness with religion may increase the polish and pliability of the character, it disintegrates it and destroys its strength, (Rom. 12: 2.)

CURRENT EVENTS.

Relations With Italy Temporarily Disturbed—Why Baron Fava was Recalled—Fatal Riot in the Coke Regions—Millionaires Indicted—Earl Granville Dead.

The Country was Surprised when, on April 1st, it was announced that Baron Fava, the Italian Minister at Washington, had been recalled by his government, in consequence of the failure of the United States to satisfy the demands of Italy for reparation and indemnity in connection with the recent lynching of King Humbert's subjects by the citizen's militia in New Orleans. In any other country than this, the recall of a Minister could be equivalent to a declaration of war. The letter of recall is said to have been in the Baron's possession nine days before he presented it to the Department of State, he and Mr. Blaine, meanwhile, holding daily conferences with a view of adjusting the difficulty and satisfying the Italian Premier, Marquis Rudini, who had been quoted as declaring that if America did not perceive that she was in the wrong, a rupture would be inevitable. In his letter of withdrawal, Baron Fava notified Secretary Blaine that the step was taken because this government had admitted its impotence to compel the punishment of the lynchers and its unwillingness to consider the subject of indemnity. In his reply, addressed to the Marquis Imperiali, Baron Fava's temporary successor, Secretary Blaine denied that the United States had refused to consider indemnity, and explained that Baron Fava had unintentionally led Marquis Rudini's Ministry into a misconstruction of our Constitution. For a time, public feeling ran high over the strained relations, and there was much wild war talk; but at no time did the authorities at Washington regard the situation as serious. It now turns out, happily, that the recall of Minister Fava was merely a diplomatic incident, and that Premier Rudini has accepted the assurances of a proper adjustment of the matter. Both here and in England it is hinted that the recall was a piece of stage politics by the new Italian Cabinet, which is aiming to catch the popular applause. A portrait of Baron Fava, the Dean of the Diplomatic Corps in Washington, is published above, together with that of Mr. W. S. Parkerson, the leader of the New Orleans disturbance. In the event of real complications with King Humbert's government on this question, Mr. Parkerson, who is a modest young lawyer, would become a very important personage indeed.

Chilian Advices Indicate no Subsidence of hostilities. The insurgent ironclad Blanco Encalado, and the sloop-of-war O'Higgins, had a sharp naval encounter lately with the government tug-boat Florence, and a torpedo boat, and destroyed both. The battle was a night attack outside the harbor of Valparaiso. Afterward, the insurgent vessels attacked the forts and a shell went clear through the O'Higgins, killing nine men and disabling her for further action. Both insurgent vessels withdrew out of range of the forts. President Balmaceda's triumph in the recent elections may result in his withdrawal on the condition that he be allowed the privilege of naming his successor.

The Striking Coke Miners in the Connellsville region, near Pittsburgh, Pa., indulged in a serious riot on March 31. At Connellsville, Jintown and Leith, the strikers were advised by a few incendiary spirits to raid the plant of the coke-burning corporations and drive off the new workmen. They assembled for this purpose, led by fifteen women, and after driving off the workmen, defied the officers and stoned the deputies. On the morning of April 2, the slaves and Hungarians assembled in hundreds near Mount Pleasant, and armed with clubs and pistols, set out to destroy the plant of the Morewood Mine belonging to the H. C. Fricke Coke Co. Sixty-five deputies, armed with Winchester rifles, guarded the works and fired a volley at the rioters, killing ten and wounding forty. The excitement throughout the coke region is general. Governor Pattison has ordered out the militia to prevent a recurrence of the riots.

England has met with a Serious Disaster in India in the massacre of a large body of native Indian troops in Manipur, a mountainous district, southeast of Assam. There had been troubles in the district for some time and the tribesmen had assumed a hostile attitude. Chief Commissioner Quinton, F. St. G. Grimwood, the British Political Agent, his wife, and several officials are supposed to have been killed in the general slaughter. A body of troops sent from Shillong, a distant station, to relieve Manipur, shared a similar fate, being ambushed in a mountain pass and killed almost to a man. Reinforcements are now being hurried forward to punish the Manipur hostiles and prevent any general outbreak.

When the Faithful Subjects of the King of Siam assembled a few days ago at Bangkok, the ancient capital, to witness the ceremonies attending the coming of age of the Crown Prince, Somedetch Phra Papama, they were treated to a spectacle more brilliant probably than anything ever witnessed in that country. All the nobles of the Malay Peninsula, the rajahs, chiefs and governors, were present to witness the cutting of the young prince's hair—a sacred rite only performed on coming of age. The prince was dressed in silver embroidered robes, studded with diamonds. A procession was formed, headed by a hundred girls, beginning with the tallest and ending with mere babes, and all in costume. On reaching the pagoda, the king with a scissors of gold, clipped four locks from his son's head; the prince then came forth clad in white and wearing a small black helmet and was presented with the ancient crown and sword of the Siamese monarchs. The festival was kept up for seven days. A portrait of the young Crown Prince is given above.

The "Grippe," whose Reappearance was noted in these columns two weeks ago, has since spread with amazing rapidity and is now epidemic in many cities. In Chicago it has multiplied the death-rate alarmingly—the average daily mortality from all cases reaching 160—and all the undertakers are kept busy. In New York it has crippled many business houses and threatens to compel the closing of the public schools. It is estimated that at least 6000 teachers and children are prostrated.

Twelve Men of Great Wealth and Prominence—several of them well-known millionaires—were indicted by the Grand Jury of New York City, a few days ago. They were the officers and directors of the New Haven Railroad, and they were held indirectly blamable for the death of the six persons who perished through a collision in the Fourth Avenue Tunnel in New York City, on February 20. Among them were Chauncey M. Depew, Nathaniel Wheeler, William Rockefeller and the President, Charles P. Clark. All gave bail, of course; but the indictment will furnish a new precedent for action by Grand Juries in similar cases elsewhere, as it charged them, as directors and as individuals, with operating a corporation which used the stove unlawfully in its cars.

Last Week "The Christian Herald" contained a reference to the proposed African exploration tour of Mrs. French-Sheldon, who is now on her way from Zanzibar to the interior, accompanied only by a native escort. Today we present an illustration, showing the peculiar basket-work car or palanquin in which the lady will make the trip. It was built expressly for her in England and is exceedingly light and graceful, and combines the facilities of boudoir, library and palace car. The result of Mrs. French's experiment in facing the perils of Central Africa practically alone, will be watched with interest.

One of the Foremost Peers in England, Earl Granville, died on March 31 of kidney troubles. He was born in 1811 and after an early manhood passed in the diplomatic service, he became a pillar of the Whig or Liberal Party. From 1840 till the year of his death, he held a succession of high offices, being at different times President of the Council and, on one occasion at least, having been summoned by the Queen to form a Ministry. This, however, he was unable to do and Palmerston, who had been temporarily out of power, returned to the Premiership. Granville assumed the leadership of the Liberals in 1875, and continued for five years as its recognized head in the House of Lords. He was dignified rather than brilliant, a magnificent scholar and a fine speaker.

One of the Most Active of Christian Workers is Mrs. Ballington Booth, wife of the chief of the American Branch of the Salvation Army. April 1st was a red-letter night at the Women's Training Garrison of the Army in New York, when forty new soldiers were sworn in amid very exciting scenes. The recruits were of all ages, both sexes, and both white and colored, and all went through the ordeal enthusiastically. Then Mrs. Booth (whose portrait is given in this column), gave a "long talk," in which she boldly attacked the critics of the Salvation Army, who found fault with it because of its noise. At the close of her remarks, the new troops surrounded the colors and were sworn in. The ceremony was witnessed by many outsiders.

Among the Notable Old World Events during the week are the defeat of Parnell in the Sligo election and the decision of Germany to be represented at the Chicago World's Fair. There is a prospect of a general strike of miners in France. Gen. Booth of the Salvation Army and Prof. Tyndall are both quite ill. Australia has adopted the title "Commonwealth of Australia" for her federated colonies. The week has been one of continued storms in Northern Europe, the snowfall being phenomenal.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editor, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

A POOR MAN'S CRY.

A NEW SERMON, PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

How to Attract Tramps—The Lord Keeping Open House for Sinners—I. The Nature of Prayer—The God-given Basket—Prayer a Personal Matter—Frequently a Cry—A Natural and Simple Utterance—God Hears It—II. The Character of the Man—Poor and Troubled—III. The Usefulness of Testimony—A Lawyer Convinced.

"This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles." Psalm 34:6.

On the morning of last Lord's-day we labored to bring sinners to their God; and the Lord graciously made the Word effectual. We gave voice to the invitation to return and we entreated men to take with them words and turn unto the Lord. On this occasion I want to speak of what happens to those who do return to God; because many have newly been brought, through mighty grace. For this joyful reason, I think we will go a step further, and talk of the happiness of those who have come back to their Father, have confessed sin, have accepted the great sacrifice, and have found peace with God. It is my heart's desire that those sheep who have come into the fold may be the means of inducing others to enter. You know how one sheep leads another; and perhaps when some come to Christ, many will follow. When one of our Professional Beggars knocks at a door, and gets well received, he is very apt to send another. I have heard that tramps make certain marks near the door by way of telling others of the confraternity which are good houses to call at. If you want many beggars at your house, feed one and another of them well, and birds of the same feather will flock to you. Perhaps while I am telling how Christ has received poor needy ones, others may pluck up courage and say, "We will go also." If they try it, they may be sure of receiving the same generous welcome as others have done; for our Lord keeps open house for coming sinners. He has distinctly said, "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." That does not refer merely to those who have come, but to those who are coming; and to you, dear hearers, who will come at this hour. Jesus bids every hungry and thirsty soul come to him at once, and be satisfied from his fulness. Our text tells how they have sped who have cried to God. "This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles."

What Prayer Is.

I. The first lesson we shall learn, this morning, is upon the nature and the excellence of prayer: "This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, and saved him."

Prayer is appointed to convey The blessings God ordains to give.

He gives us prayer as a basket, and then he pours the blessings of his grace into it. We shall learn from the text much about prayer. Evidently it is a dealing with the Lord. "This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him." He cried to the Lord that the Lord might hear him. His prayer was not intended for men, nor was it mainly meant to be a relief to his own mind; it was intended for the ear of God, and it went where it was intended to go. I am afraid that many public prayers are a performance to please the congregation; and when they are mixed with music, it is hoped that they will influence men of taste. Even private prayer is not always directed to God as it should be. I have heard ignorant people sometimes use the expression, "The minister came and prayed to me." That is a great mistake. We do not pray to you; we pray to God. We pray for you, but not to you. Yet I am afraid that the blunder reveals a mournfully dark state of mind as to what prayer is and does. I fear that many prayers are meant for the ears of men, or have no meaning at all beyond being regarded as a sort of incantation which may mysteriously benefit the utterer.

Believe me, to repeat good words is a small matter: to go over the best composed forms of devotion will be useless, except the heart rises into real dealing with God. You must speak with God, and plead with him. I often question those who come to join the Church in this fashion: "You say there is a great difference in you: is there a difference in your prayers?" I very frequently get such an answer as this: "Yes, sir; I now pray to God. I hope that he hears me. I know that he is near, and I speak to him; whereas before I did not seem to care whether God was there or not. I said my prayer by rote, and not like speaking to anybody."

Its Various Shapes.

From this psalm we learn that prayer takes various shapes. Notice, in the fourth verse, David writes, "I sought the Lord, and he heard me." Seeking is prayer. When you cannot get to God, when you feel as if you had lost sight of him, and could not find him, your seeking is prayer. "I sought the Lord, and he heard me"; he heard me seeking him; heard me feeling after him in the dark; heard me running up and down if haply I might find him. To search after the Lord is prayer such as God hears. If your prayer is no better than a seeking after one you cannot as yet find, the Lord will hear it. In the next verse David puts it, "They looked unto him." Then a looking unto God is a prayer. Often the very best prayer is a look towards God—a look which says, "Lord, I believe thee: I trust thee; be pleased to show thyself to me."

But frequently, according to our text, prayer is best described as a cry. What means this? "This poor man cried." This poor man did not make a grand oration; he took to crying. He was short; it was only a cry. In great pain a man will cry out; he cannot help it, even if he would. A cry is short, but it is not sweet. It is intense, and painful, and it

Cannot be Silenced.

We cry because we must cry. A certain poor man cried, "God be merciful to me a sinner." That is not a long collect, but it collects a great deal of meaning into a few words. That was a short cry, "Lord, save, or I perish"; and that other, "Lord, help me." "Save, Lord," is a notable cry, and so is "Lord, remember me." Many prevailing prayers are like cries because they are brief, sharp, and uncontrollable. A cry is not only brief, but bitter. A cry is a sorrowful thing; it is the language of pain. A cry has in it much meaning, and no music. You cannot set a cry to music. The sound grates on the ear, it rasps the heart, it startles, and it grieves the minds of those who hear it. Cries are not for musicians, but for mourners.

A cry is a simple thing. The first thing a new-born child does is to cry; and he usually does plenty of it for years after. You do not need to teach children to cry: it is the cry of nature in distress. All children can cry; even those who are without their reasoning faculties can cry. Yea, even the beast and the bird can cry. If prayer be a cry, it is clear that it is one of the simplest acts of the mind. Oh, my hearer, whatever thou needest, pray for it in the way which thy awakened heart suggests to thee. God loves natural expressions when we come before him. A cry is as

Sincere as it is Simple.

But now note, further, concerning the nature and excellence of prayer, that prayer is heard in heaven. "This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him." I do not think that we shall ever pray in downright earnest unless we believe that God hears. I have been told that prayer is an excellent devotional exercise, highly satisfying and useful, but that there its result ends; for we cannot imagine that the Infinite Mind can be moved by the cries of men. Do not believe so gross a falsehood, or you will soon cease to pray. No man will pray for the mere love of the act, when he has arrived at the opinion that there is no good in it so far as God is concerned,

Once more, prayer has this excellence: that it wins answers from God. "The Lord heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles." The Lord does in very deed answer prayer. I read yesterday certain notes taken by an interviewer, who called on me some years ago. He reports that he said to me, "Then you have not modified your views in any way as to the efficacy of prayer?" In his description he says—"Mr. Spurgeon laughed, and replied, 'Only in my faith growing far stronger and

Firmier Than Ever.

It is not a matter of faith with me, but of knowledge and every-day experience. I am constantly witnessing the most unmistakable instances of answers to prayer. My whole life is made up of them. To me they are so familiar as to cease to excite my surprise; but to many they would seem marvellous, no doubt. Why, I could no more doubt the efficacy of prayer than I could disbelieve in the law of gravitation. The one is as much a fact as the other, constantly verified every day of my life." The interviewer reported me correctly, and I would repeat the testimony. I could speak with even deeper confidence to-day. More than forty years I have tried my Master's promise at the mercy-seat, and I have never yet met with a repulse from him. In the name of Jesus I have asked and received; save only when I have asked amiss. It is true I have had to wait, because my time was ill-judged, and God's time was far better; but delays are not denials. But, my hearers, if you need evidence on this point, try it yourselves. Remember the Lord has said, "Call upon me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me." Here is a fair test. Make an honest experiment concerning it.

II. Let us move on, and note secondly,

The Character of the Man who prayed: "this poor man cried." Who was he? He was a poor man; how terribly poor I cannot tell you. There are plenty of poor men about. If you advertised for a poor man in London, you might soon find more than you could count in twelve months: the supply is unlimited, although the distinction is by no means highly coveted. No man chooses to be poor. David, on the occasion which suggested his psalm, was so poor that he had to beg bread of the Lord's priests; and though he was a soldier he had to borrow a sword from their treasures. He had no house, no home; no calling, no income, no country, no safety for his life. Does God hear poor men? Ay, that he does, the poorest of the poor, the poor in spirit. He hears those who are so poor that even hope has dropped out of their box; and that is the last thing to go.

This poor man was also a troubled man, for the text speaks of "all his troubles"—a great "all," I warrant you. He did not know what to do; he could not see his way in he was surrounded with difficulties, and with an iron net, and he could not hope for a deliverer. He was a troubled man, and because he was a troubled man he cried. People wondered what he cried about, but they would not have done so had they known his inward griefs. His old companions thought he had gone out of his mind: they said religion had turned his brain, and they kept out of his way. This poor man cried, and no man noticed him because he was so poor and so wretched; but "the Lord heard him." He does not turn away from the doleful and desolate: he takes delight in coming and binding up their wounds.

But yet he was a hopeful man. There must have been some hope in him, though he could not perceive it; for people do not cry for help unless they have some hope that they will be heard. Despair is dumb: where there is a cry of prayer there is a crumb of hope. A cry is signal of distress, and people will not hoist a rag on a pole unless they have a little hope that a passing vessel may spy it out, and come to their rescue. There is not only hope for a man, but hope in a man as long as he can pray.

as long as he can cry. If you do but long, and seek, and sigh after God, you are one of those poor men whom I have tried to describe, and good will come to you.

I can see that poor man now. I used to know him, for he was born in my native town, and he went to the school where I was a scholar. He was hardly a man, but only a youth; and then used to sleep with him, or rather to lie awake at nights with him, and hear him groan. He has prayed in my hearing many a time, and very poor praying it was; but he meant what he said. I have been with him in the fields, and he used to tell me that he was such a vile creature that he feared that he must be cast into hell forever; he was afraid that he should never be able to believe in Jesus. I knew him when he gave himself up for lost. I know him now. I see him whenever I use the looking-glass, and I must say on his behalf this morning—This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles."

A Comprehensive Word.

I would have you notice the character of the blessing. "The Lord heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles." He gave him salvation from the whole of his troubles. His sins were his great troubles; the Lord saved him out of them all through the atoning sacrifice. The effects of sin were another set of grievous troubles to him; the Lord saved him out of them all by the renewal of the Holy Ghost. He had fallen into a perilous position by his own fault, and troubles came upon him thick and heavy; but in answer to prayer the Lord made way of escape for him, out of them all, and led him into peace. He had troubles without end within, troubles in the family and in the world, and he felt ready to perish because of them; but the Lord delivered him out of them all. We see that all shame was removed in the same way: "They looked unto him and were lightened, and their faces were not ashamed." Happy men; for the shame of their sin is gone! They were no longer distressed about the past, and no longer under apprehension of wrath in the future: "he saved them out of all their fears."

you will look further on you will also find that the Lord saved them out of all their fears (verse 9): "There is no want to them at fear him"; "they that wait upon the Lord shall not want any good thing." Oh, to be saved from the pinch of dire necessity within the soul—saved from all fear, all shame, all trouble, and then from all want! This is a word of salvation! But this is not all; for this poor man was saved from all dangers (verse 20): "He keepeth all his bones: not one of them is broken." He saved him out of all real peril. And, lastly, he saved him from all apprehension of desertion.—"None of them that trust in him shall be desolate." The salvation that God gives in answer to prayers is a perfect one; and he gives it freely, gives it in answer to a poor man's cry, without money or merit. How complete is God's deliverance!

And, once more, think that this all came through a cry. A cry is all that the poor man sought. He did not go through a long performance; he did not perform a laborious set of ceremonies—"This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him." What can be simpler? Oh, you think you want a priest, do you?—a priest whom a bishop has laid his hands? Or you deem that you must go to a holy place, a pile of stones put together in architectural form. What folly is all this!

You have but to Cry.

and the Lord will hear you. There is one priest even the Lord Jesus. There is but one holiness—his glorious person. There is but one holy time, and that is to-day. When the Spirit of God works a cry in the heart of the poor man, that cry climbs up to heaven by the way of Jacob's ladder, and at the same instant mercy comes down by the same ladder. Our Lord Jesus Christ is that ladder which joins earth and heaven together; so that our prayers go to heaven, and God's mercy comes down to us on earth. Oh, that men would be content with the blessedly simple apparatus of grace.

III. I must be brief on my last head; but it is a very important one. Consider the #### Need of Personal Testimony.

Give your testimony cheerfully. "This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him." Do not say it as if it were a line from "the agony column;" but write it as a verse of a psalm—of such a psalm as this, which begins with "I will bless the Lord at all times: his praise shall continually be in my mouth." This witness, dear friends, while it was very strong to those who are like ourselves, will be increased in force as one and another shall join us. One person says "I cried to the Lord, and he heard me." "But," says an objector, "that is a special case." Up rises a second witness, and says, "This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him." "Well, that is only two; and two instances may not prove a rule." Then, up rises a third, a fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and in each case it is the same story—"This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him." Surely he must be hardened in unbelief who refuses to believe so many witnesses. I remember a sceptic, who attended a class-meeting where the subject was similar to our theme of this morning. He heard about a dozen tell what the Lord had done for them; and he said, as he sat there, "If I had a case in court, I should like to have these good people for witnesses. I know them all, they are my neighbors, they are simple-minded people, straightforward and honest, and I know I could carry any case if I had them on my side."—Then he very candidly argued that what they all agreed upon was true. He believed them in other matters, and he could not doubt them in this, which was to them the most important of all. He tried religion for himself, and the Lord heard him; and very soon he was at the class-meeting, adding his witness to theirs.

The Story of a Lawyer,

If I were to put the question at this moment to my present audience, what would be the result? Our friend Mr. Stott said just now in prayer that we were a very promiscuous company this dark morning. I agree with him. Still I will try it. You that have had answers to prayers say, "Ay." (The response came like a thunder-clap.) I am sure there are none of us who have ever tried the power of prayer who would have to say "No." If I were to put the contrary, there would be no answer. All who are accustomed to pray will vote with the ayes. Go home, then, with the words of our text in your hearts and on your tongues—"This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles." Amen.

DR. PENTECOST IN INDIA.

THIS evangelist continues to meet with much acceptance in his evangelistic labors in Calcutta. He has not confined his efforts to one section of the community. A Calcutta paper, dated February 17, tells of his having given addresses in drawing-rooms in the residential suburb of Barrackpore; of meetings for soldiers in the Barrack Theatre; of a large and fashionable luncheon party in a park where Dr. Pentecost gave an address to the guests; of meetings for the employees of the jute mills at Samnugger: for native gentlemen at Serampore; and for a mixed audience at the Missionary College there.

Returning to Calcutta, Dr. Pentecost spoke on the Sunday afternoon to a large assembly of native Christian Bengalees. He urged that the evangelisation of India must ultimately be undertaken by Indians themselves; and counselled unity, as well as a spirit of independence, among the native churches. Arrangements were made for a series of other addresses to native Christians.

The evangelist's closing series of addresses in Calcutta began on February 16, when Lord Lansdowne, the Viceroy, with a party from Government House, was present as an interested and sympathetic listener.

Napoleon in Adversity.*

HE leave-taking at Fontainebleau, the Courtyard of the White Horse, the Emperor, the grenadiers of the Old Guard, form a wonderful drama, set in a wonderful stage, and with what brilliant characters! This dramatic scene was taken by Beranger for the subject of one of his most famous songs—Les Deux Grenadiers,—which represents two soldiers talking together at the last midnight before Napoleon's departure.

In the early morning of April 20, all the inhabitants of Fontainebleau had gathered to witness the memorable scene, crowding to the railing around the Courtyard of the White Horse, where it was to take place. In this courtyard the Old Guard was drawn up. At noon the carriages had driven up to the foot of the Horseshoe Staircase, and General Bertrand had gone in to tell Napoleon that everything was ready. Napoleon came out of his room into the Gallery of Francis I. There were assembled the few surviving relics of his once brilliant court. He replied to their tears by a grasp of the hand, a glance, and without saying a word, passed through the gallery and vestibule, and walked down the Horseshoe Staircase with a firm, swift step. As Lamartine says: "The troops expressed a more solemn and religious feeling than cheers could express,—the honor, namely, of their fidelity, even in the darkest days, and the setting of the glory now about to sink behind the forest trees, behind the waves of the Mediterranean. They envied those of their companions to whom fortune had accorded exile in his island with their emperor." The Allies had permitted him to take with him but a single battalion, which was to be all he needed for conquering his throne. The men of the Old Guard had been asked how many would like to follow him, and all, without exception, offered themselves. Only four hundred were chosen. They were not in the courtyard, but were already on their way. Napoleon was at the foot of the staircase; the drums beat a salute. Why were they not draped in mourning? This was, in truth, the funeral of the Emperor, of the Empire, of the army. Their noise alone broke the silence. The soldiers were silent and gloomy. Napoleon made a sign that he wished to speak to them. The drums stopped beating; all seemed to hold their breath.

The Emperor's Farewell.

"Soldiers of the Old Guard," the Emperor began, "I say good by to you. For twenty years I have ever found you on the path to honor and to glory. In these last days, as in those of our prosperity, you have never ceased to be models of bravery and fidelity. With men like you our cause was not lost; but if it had no end, the war would have been a civil one, and France would have been only more unhappy. Hence I sacrificed my interests to those of my country, and I leave. Do you, my friends, continue to serve France. Its happiness will be my only thought—the sole object of my prayers. Do not mourn my lot. If I have consented to outlive myself, it is in order yet to serve your glory. I wish to record the great deeds we have done together." Here Napoleon's voice broke. He gave way to his emotion for a moment, and then went on: "Good by, good by, my children. I should like to press you all to my heart. Let me at least kiss your flag!" At these words, General Petit, a man as modest as he was brave, seized the flag, and stepped forward. Napoleon embraced the General and kissed the eagle of the standard.

Then nothing was to be heard for a few minutes but half-suppressed sobs, and the old grenadiers were seen wiping the tears from their weather-beaten faces. Napoleon, who was deeply affected, controlled himself by a mighty effort, raised his head, and in a firmer voice called out: "Good by, once more, good by, my old companions. Let this last kiss pass into your hearts!" Then he tore himself away from those about him, and covering his face with his hands, sprang into his carriage, which at once started on the first stage of his exile.

THE LATE DR. JOHN E. COOKMAN.

(See portrait.)

THE news that Dr. John E. Cookman is dead will cause many of our readers deep sorrow. So earnest, so enlightened a servant of the Master the Church and the world can ill spare. In the pulpit, on the platform, and in his pastoral visitation among the homes of the poor, his words touched the heart as those of few men do. They came from the heart and went to the heart. All who heard him realized that they were in the presence of one who lived very near to God. Christian men and women, as they listened, were stimulated to strive to reach the higher plane in which the fulness of the light of God's countenance shines, and where they receive grace for daily life. The world, hearing him, was astonished at the joy and happiness which gleamed from his eye and lent melody to his tongue. Such words as his told of delights which the world cannot give, neither can it take away; and they attracted those to Christ who had supposed that Christianity meant gloom and sadness. Then, too, in an age of sceptical criticism, such a man as Dr. Cookman was like a standard-bearer. He believed with all his soul, and he stood out manfully to tell to all whom his voice could reach how he had tested the promises for himself, and how not one thing had failed of all that God had pledged himself to give to those who trusted in him. It was a grand, a noble work that he did, and to him surely Christ has uttered the words it is the Christian's highest hope to hear: "Well done good and faithful servant. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

John Emory Cookman was born in Carlisle, Pa., in 1838. He studied at the Methodist Episcopal Seminary at Concord, N. H., and after receiving ordination, he labored at Lenox, Mass., at Tremont Street, Boston, Mass., at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and in several churches in New York and Brooklyn. About two years ago he was led to sever his connection with the Methodist Church, but he did not abandon his ministerial work. He joined the Protestant Episcopal Church, in which he had many friends and of which his saintly mother had been a member. Dr. Cookman had the same message to deliver from its pulpits, and right earnestly he gave it utterance. In the fall of last year his fragile frame began to fail under his exhausting labors, but no serious alarm was felt by his friends until a month ago. His days were then evidently numbered. He gradually grew weaker, and on Easter Sunday, March 29, he entered into glory. His funeral took place from Grace Church, New York, on April 2d, when Bishop Potter pronounced a eulogy over his remains.

A CHANGED HOUSEHOLD.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for April 19. "Preach unto it the preaching that I bid thee." Jonah 3: 2.

(See illustration.)

"Do not be angry, mamma; but I feel so excited and feverish this evening; I should like very much to go to my room and remain there."

"Nonsense, child! This party has been got up especially for you; and what would your friends say if you should not be present to entertain them?"

"Well, mamma, I am not equal to the task—for it is a task—of entertaining them. So, please, let them understand that some other time I may be glad to meet them all."

There was much comment and gossip on the absence of Florrie in the home of the rich planter, who had thrown open his hospitable house for the entertainment of his daughter's friends on the evening of June 21, 1859. In those days it was not an unusual occurrence to give a splendid party on the banks of the Mississippi. But Mr. Pierson's house was famed far and wide for the elegance and taste invariably displayed on such occasions; and every one of the youthful guests gathered together on this occasion had promised themselves what they called "a real good time." The absence of Florrie, however, was distinctly felt by every one present; and many were the conjectures as to the cause.

Three months previous to the date of our story, a young lady had been engaged by Mr.

Florrie Brings the Bible to her Mother.

Pierson as a governess for his daughter. She was a stranger in those parts, and to some extent seemed determined to remain a stranger. She said very little about herself, and discouraged every attempt to pry into the history of her past life.

There was nothing to find fault with in her as a governess. Her education was perfect; her temper always even, and her manners unexceptionable. There was also a charm about her which made her a favorite wherever she appeared; and no one had ever had so much influence over the sensitive mind of the planter's daughter—young Florrie Pierson.

Perhaps Miss Robertson might have been able to explain the cause of Florrie's absence on this occasion; but she said nothing.

The entertainments given at the Pierson mansion always ended in the same way—promiscuous dancing until a very early hour in the morning. On this particular occasion, the mirth was somewhat restrained, for the double reason that Florrie was not present, and that Miss Robertson took no part in the amusement.

On the following day Florrie seemed even more active and in better spirits than usual, and was evidently anxious for a conversation with her mother, whom she loved more than all else in the world.

"Why did you not remain with your friends last night, Florrie? They were much grieved at your absence; and some of them thought you might have put in an appearance for a short time, even if you did feel somewhat indisposed. Besides, Miss Robertson also cast a damper upon their mirth, by taking no part in it. It is strange she is usually so good, and so anxious to make everybody happy."

"Darling mamma, I want to speak to you of a subject that is very near my heart. Miss Robertson gave me a book some time ago; and has been my joy and happiness every hour since it came into my possession. How much I should like you to take it and get from it the same happiness, and the same ideas I have got. So saying she ran to her room and presently returned with a small, beautifully bound copy of the Word of God, and handed it to her mother. "But my child, this is not a proper book for you to read: our Church does not allow to read it." "O, mamma, the Church cannot surely gainsay God: and God himself, in the person of his Son, commands us to search the Scriptures." The child's simple words sank deep into the mother's heart; and in a short time she was engaged as she had never been before, drinking in the heavenly draught of g ine knowledge she had been deprived of so many many years. Miss Robertson called upon her at this moment, and found her bathed in tears. They soon came to a mutual understanding; and the good governess explained how she had told Florrie of the sinfulness of worldly pleasures, and of the only genuine happiness to be found in the possession of the Lord Jesus. The fond mother was delighted to know that her daughter had made so happy a discovery at such an early age and resolved from that very moment to shake off the yoke of the world, and to live for God alone. Her husband could not understand the change that had come over his wife and daughter: but in a short time he too was brought to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Christ Jesus. He saw how happy they were, questioned them as to the cause of their happiness, and for answer the precious "Book" was put into his hands. He searched diligently, and found according to the promise. That house on the banks of the Mississippi, which was formerly the scene of worldly entertainments, and of so-called social pleasures, thenceforth witnessed the real joys and happiness of the children of the Lord. Hymns of praise and of thanksgiving took the place of the worldly music; and the poor of the neighborhood thanked God every day of their lives that the strange young governess had in her own obscure way preached unto that family the preaching that the Lord made her.

THE LATE DR. SAMUEL T. SPEAR.

(See Portrait.)

THE veteran Presbyterian minister and author whose portrait appears on this page, died suddenly at his home in Brooklyn, N. Y., on April 8th. He was seventy-nine years of age. For some two years past he has been in failing health. They have been years of sadness and sorrow; for he was mourning the death of his wife and son, who passed away almost simultaneously. The end, however, came without warning. He had risen and breakfasted at his regular hour and seemed to be no worse in health than he had been; but about ten o'clock he complained of alarming weakness. Medical aid was at once summoned but he sank so rapidly that death ensued before any remedies could be administered.

He was a native of Ballston Spa, N. Y. He chose the medical profession for a career and studied in the College of Physicians and Surgeons, of New York, from which he obtained an M.D. diploma. He did not practice, but at once commenced the study of theology under Dr. Beman, of Troy, N. Y. He was ordained in 1835, and accepted the pastorate of the Second Presbyterian Church, of Lansingburgh, N. Y. In 1843, he removed to Brooklyn where he became pastor of the South Presbyterian Church. He occupied this position until 1879, when he resigned and devoted himself to editorial work in the Independent. He also wrote several works among which were Bible Heroes, Church and State, and The Federal Judiciary. He was a man of profound learning and a keen logical reasoner. Dr. Spear made a very close study of ecclesiastical law and became an authority on the subject. Nearly all his writings for the religious press were on that topic. The funeral was held on April 3, in the Westminster

ROMA.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

Written expressly for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

BY JENNIE FOWLER WILLING.

A Bit of Old Rome.

MARGARET'S pen raced over the paper a few minutes, as she resolutely pursued her task of composing an article on the women of Italy. "I suppose I ought to begin," she said, looking up from her work, "with the women of old Rome. After all, there were some noble specimens among them. Livia, the wife of Augustus, ruled the empire through him for fifty years."

"And there was our magnificent Vittoria Colonna. Don't you remember the pure, high love that Michelangelo had for her? Her death almost unsettled his reason. Why does not my Italy produce such women now?"

"I think there are three reasons," replied Margaret, "civil, religious, and social. The religion of the old Church has lost its hold on the men; and the women are kept tricky and superstitious, so that the priests can manage affairs through them. In order to that they are treated always as inferior, and held back from confidence in their own ability. Treat people as idiots, and you idiotize them."

"I have heard my father and Mazzini say," threw in Camilla, earnestly, "that it was impossible for us to come to our best while our women were made untrustworthy by being untrusted. Their scheme of human duties included women as well as men. My father became disgusted with the priesthood because at the confessional he had to deal with women more than men, and it was made his duty to frown them out of all liberal thought. They would not give their money, and their scheming to the Church unless they were kept superstitious."

"He must have had a hard time breaking away from it all," said Margaret, laying down her pen, and leaning back in her chair.

"Indeed he had," was the reply. "He was a long time coming to it. You know a priest is trained so carefully to that one occupation that it is very difficult for him ever to learn anything else. There is nothing for him but starvation outside of the priesthood. But for that, hundreds of them would leave it at once. When one does, I know he has a brave, strong soul."

"Did your father know your mother before he left the priesthood?" asked Margaret.

"Oh, yes; he heard her first confession. She was a sweet, little, fatherless girl. He was much older than she. He told me the whole story that night in the poor, little room in London, after we had folded her white hands, and kissed her eyelids down. She was not used to privations, but she was always patient. I don't know what we would have done those days, if your uncle John had not found us, and got us pupils. I had to learn to take care of the money, for neither of them ever knew, he, brought up a priest, and she the daughter of a Marchese. She was very happy to go and be with our Lord, she said; and that night, as soon as we could talk, father told me how he loved her from the hour of that first confession; and how he fought his own heart, and kept himself perfectly honorable toward her and all the world." The face of the Italian girl grew dark, and she shook her head sadly, while she added, "all priests are not so. It is easy to hide the truth from one's self, and drift on the tide of a great passion. My father never once betrayed his love by word or look, till they met in exile and poverty."

Margaret put her arms around her friend, and brushed away the tears that were slipping over Camilla's face.

"Wasn't your mother a Guiccioli, my dear?" she asked, after awhile.

"Yes; her home was in Tuscany. Her estate was in one of the valleys that you pass through in going from Florence to Bologna, a bit of Paradise. It was confiscated when my mother's brother joined Garibaldi. He was one of the 'thousand.'"

Margaret made a note of that and said in her heart, "Some day my little Camilla shall have her vineyards back."

"We forget the paper," said Camilla, smiling through her tears.

Margaret took up her pen again. "I think I have enough, if I work it into shape," she said. "I want to emphasize the fact that the women make the home: and the home is the unit of the State: so their advancement in independence of thought and action is of prime importance to the country as well as to the Church. As long as the priests hold their power over the women the pope may laugh in his sleeve. It is only a question of time. Soon or later they will bring the land back under his sway."

"But they shall not! They shall not!" cried Camilla. "We will work. We will pray. We will give our life's life, and God will help us."

"And that right early," responded Margaret by way of amen.

The gathering of materials for the paper had taken so much time that it was too late to go out that forenoon. Gordon looking as radiant as native dignity would permit, declined the invitation to stay to luncheon. Indeed he really must go to his mother at once. He hoped that Mrs. Gordon might be able to come around, and look in upon Miss Pelham that afternoon.

Mrs. Gordon came immediately after luncheon. After kissing Carolyn warmly, she shook hands with the other young ladies as cordially as the most delighted woman in Rome might be expected to do.

"Really," she whispered to Margaret while she adjusted her cap before the glass. "It is all quite settled. Waiting to hear from her guardian, is the merest formality, you know." She insisted that the young ladies should go out if they wished, and leave Carolyn with her and Goldthorpe. They would be only too happy to stay with the dear child.

"To the Campodoglio," was the order when the three young ladies were seated in their cab.

"We're getting shockingly demoralized," said Margaret with mock distress. "The idea of our starting out at this time of day!"

"Ve haf had ze great affair on hand," laughed Marie.

"Yes: but to think of our indolence! We ought to walk. Here I am, intending to reform the pedestrian habits of my country-women when I get home; and to think of my own grievous derelictions! We Americans are without occupation unless we are reforming something. I have three things in view for our women instead of the aristocratic nonsense that turns their poor heads when they come across the sea."

"And what are they, my queen?"

"Light breakfasts, simple dress, and much walking," was the reply. "Never did woman hold such a sceptre as she wields in America. She must understand her day and generation, and fit herself for her work. 'There girls,' pointing up at an arch, 'what do you suppose that is? We'll have to get along without Carolyn, since that vandal has captured her. How are we ever going to find anything out?"

"I can tell you a little about this, Roma," said Camilla brightly. "You know it was once my home. That arch over the street was a part of a secret passage. The Generals of the Franciscan Order had their headquarters in the Church of Ara-Coeli more than six hundred years. This secret passage was for their escape to the Palazzo Venezia in times of danger."

"A good ways back," said Margaret, musingly. "Two hundred and fifty years before the Renaissance. Art was in its grave clothes, America undiscovered, the world supposed to be flat and stationary, the chief priests of the church, right here in its centre, building secret passages for escape from each other's daggers and swords."

"Do you remember, my queen," asked Camilla, "that American on the platform in Genoa, whom we heard say that it was no great thing for Columbus to discover America; it was so big, he couldn't miss it? It seems, by the same rule, that the reformers of the sixteenth century had an easy task. Europe was so full of the sins of the church."

"If I'm not mistaken," said Margaret, as they passed the steps leading to the church of Ara-Coeli, "Italy to-day is piled full of that same kindling wood; and all that is needed for a magnificent conflagration, is a strong, daring hand to fling the torch."

"I wish I had studied zi English books as hard a zi count vished me to," said Marie, "I would not be so boztered to know all zi fine zings zot you vise people do say."

They got down from their cab on the Piazzo del Campodoglio. "Zi vork of zi great Michaelangelo," said Marie, as they looked around. "Ze great genius of zem all."

"Yes," assented Margaret. "Everything that he touched has the simplicity and strength that one finds in Beethoven."

"Like the sky on a clear, strong day," said Camilla. "His spirit is always broad, open, and good. Beethoven, the Hebrew, had a deep, fervent nature like our Italians."

"Ah, my dear, my dear," laughingly protested Margaret, "you must not be bigoted in your patriotism."

Camilla caught her friend's hand to her lips. "Maybe I do blow too shrill a blast on my bugle; but nobody has had a word for my poor Italians all these centuries. My beautiful country! It must bud and blossom as the rose—through Christ," and she flashed the telegram of a new hope into Margaret's eyes.

"I want to take you to see a couple of old friends of mine;" and Camilla led the way across the portico to the right, into the court, where, under an inner porch, were standing the statues of Julius and Augustus Cæsar, one on either side of the door. "I used almost to pray to those old heathens when I was a child. I was so afraid that the better day would never dawn on our nation, the odds were so against us. I used to wish with all my soul that Julius would step down from his pedestal, and go forth to rally his legions with a voice of thunder, rousing Italy from the dust of ages."

garet, covering her sympathy with Camilla's enthusiasm by a little laugh, "I used to curl up in a big arm-chair in the library, and wrestle with the conjugation of that same Julius Cæsar's big verbs. When I was able to read his Commentaries, without turning to the dictionary every other word, I was quite carried away with his magnificence, as most people are. But when I came to know Christ, I found that they who seize everything for themselves are the diameter of the universe below those who give all for the good of others."

The next undertaking was the two hundred and sixty-one steps, to the top of the Campodoglio tower, and a fine view of the city they had, the vision sweeping away toward the Alban and Sabine Hills, the Appenines with snow on their summits lying in the softened haze of remoteness.

"Where else in the world could you find mapped out so much history, ancient and modern?" asked Margaret, as again on the piazza, they turned toward the Capitoline Museum. They glanced at the Statue of Marporio, the river god that used to stand near the Pasquino, and as the political satirists wrote, hold conversation with him about the follies of the clerical rulers: the old pasquinades of centuries.

"It was strange that the popes could never discover who posted the satires on Pasquino's statue," remarked Camilla. "Many a sharp idea did he put into the people's heads. If the overthrow of the pope's temporal power hadn't given the people a chance to speak their minds, no doubt the lampoons would be going on yet: though the old authorities brought Marforio over here to break them up."

"Sall ve not go into ze church of Ara-Coeli, vile ve are here?" asked Marie.

They went down the Capitoline steps, past the little patch of garden with the palm and century plants, its pansies blinking in the March sunshine, and by the lairs of the she-wolf, kept in memory of the nurse of Romulus and Remus.

"These stairs," said Margaret as they turned toward the steps that led up to the old church, were placed here nearly two hundred and fifty years before our new America was thought of. Tiberius Gracchus was knocked down the flight that was here before them, and killed. Up at the top there, is where the old Franciscans used to pull the poor people's eeth."

"I used to come here on Christmas days to listen to the children," said Camilla, as they entered the church, there was always a manger cradle on one side, and on the other a platform from which the little maidens declaimed."

"That's the way this old church takes care of the children," said Margaret. "Don't you remember those little tots that we saw in Santa Maria Maggiori? I mean the two that came in by themselves and knelt or the priest to touch them with his wand in blessing, and the wee one that begged for the holy water to cross herself with."

"Zis church stands vere ze temple of ze Capitoline Jupiter stood for a zousand years, does it not?" asked Marie.

"Yes," replied Margaret. "And here is the chapel of the Holy Bambino."

"Vat is zat? My fazzer never let me read zose stories. He says zey have no dignity."

"This little wooden image of the baby Christ used to be a great miracle-worker," said Camilla. "It was taken to visit more sick people than any doctor in Rome; and when its carriage went by everybody had to kneel down. They wouldn't do it now, though," with a little shrug.

"The priests pretend that they daren't take it out because a woman stole it, by putting another doll in its clothes, when it had been left in her sick-room."

"If it could work such miracles, vy did it not take better care of itself?" asked Marie. "Is it not always ze funny vay to mix up ze leetle baby and ze great Christ?"

A couple of Italian ladies drifted into the party. A priest, after due courtesying and prayers, and necessary turning of keys and pulling of ropes, brought out the Bambino. Its garments were covered with precious stones. Its crown was brilliant with jewels; and diamond rings were sewed on its dress. The Italian ladies stepped back to give the strangers the first kiss of its toe.

"They don't kiss it," said the priest, impatiently. But he was mistaken. Marie pressed her lips reverently upon the toe of the doll. Margaret glanced at Camilla; and their hearts were lifted to God that their friend might see her idolatry.

After kissing the image, Marie turned quickly away. An explanation of the second commandment that she had heard Margaret give their washerwoman, flashed through her mind, like long-hidden sunlight through clouds. She turned her eyes full upon Margaret's face. "I'll never break ze commandment of God again," she said, wiping her lips, as if the memory of the kiss burned them. "No matter vezzer ze priest tell me, or ze priest tell me not, I will never do it again."

HUMBLE SHEAVES.

I KNELT at the feet of the Master,
Who knew how my heart burned with love,
But I said: "Let me work in Thy service,
And so my devotion I'll prove."

And I looked on the far, waving harvest;
Saw the need of more laborers there,
And I said: "Let me haste to the reaping,
And my sheaves shall be golden and fair."

But He said: "Nay! my child there are others
Far stronger my reapers to be;
Stay thou still in thy place, and be watching
To do some small service for me."

Then I looked on the green sloping hillsides,
Where the vineyards in terraces lay,
And the sunshine, so balm and so golden,
Made joyous the long harvest day.

And I said: "Let me go to the vineyards,
Where the clusters hang purple and sweet;
I will gather the largest and finest,
And bring all my spoils to Thy feet."

But He said: "Nay! my child there are others
To gather the fruit of the vine;
Stay thou still in thy place and be quiet,
Nor thus at thy station repine."

Then I looked down the beautiful valley,
Where the lilies grew stately and fair,
And the roses blushed scarlet and crimson,
And scented the earth and the air:

And I said: "Let me gather the flowers—
Those flowers so fair and so sweet;
I will bring them in all their bright beauty,
And lay them with love at Thy feet."

But he said: "Nay! my child; let the flowers
Bloom on in their fragrance and grace;
They are not for thy fingers to gather.
Stay, stay thou content in thy place."

'Twas a dream! But the meaning remaineth;
And now in the byways and lanes
I search for the clover and daisies,
And glean for the scattering grains.

My sheaves will be scanty and humble—
All others more stately and good;
But what joy, if at nightfall the Master Shall say, "She hath done what she could."

—Lillian Grey.

SAVAGES SUBDUED BY A HYMN.

REV. E. P. SCOTT, while laboring as a missionary in India, saw on the street one of the strangest-looking heathen his eyes had ever lit upon. On inquiry, he found that he was a representative of one of the inland tribes that lived away in the mountain districts, and which came down once a year to trade. Upon further investigation he found that the Gospel had never been preached to them, and that it was very hazardous to venture among them because of their murderous propensities. He was stirred with earnest desires to break unto them the bread of life. He went to his lodging-place, fell on his knees, and pleaded for Divine direction. Arising from his knees, he packed his valise, took his violin, with which he was accustomed to sing, and his staff, and started in the direction of the Macedonian cry.

As he bade his fellow-missionaries farewell, they said, "We shall never see you again. It is madness for you to go." But he said, "I must preach Jesus to them."

For two days he travelled without scarcely meeting a human being, until at last he found himself in the mountains and suddenly surrounded by a crowd of savages. Every spear was instantly pointed at his heart. He expected that every moment would be his last. Not knowing of any other resource he tried the power of singing the name of Jesus to them. Drawing forth his violin he began with closed eyes to sing and play—

All hail the power of Jesus' name!
Let angels prostrate fall;
Bring forth the royal diadem,
And crown him Lord of all.

Being afraid to open his eyes, he sang on till the third verse, and while singing the stanza,

Let every kindred, every tribe,
On this terrestrial ball,
To him all majesty ascribe,
And crown him Lord of all,

he opened his eyes to see what they were going to do, when lo! the spears had dropped from their hands, and the tears were falling from their eyes.

They afterward invited him to their homes. He spent two-and-a-half years among them. His labors were so richly rewarded that when he was compelled to leave them because of impaired health and return to this country, they followed him for thirty miles. "O missionary!" they said, "come back to us again! There are tribes beyond that never heard the Gospel." He could not resist their entreaties. After visiting America, he went back again to continue his labors till he sank into the grave among them. Who would face such dangers, but a soldier of the Cross? Missionaries are often the bravest men on earth. Such invincible courage blended with the love of Jesus, will yet conquer the world.

COUNTING THE STARS.

THE REV. M. GUY PEARSE writes: "I was going home one winter's evening with my little maiden at my side, when she looked up into the sky and said, 'Father, I am going to count the stars.' 'Very well,' I said, 'do.' And soon I heard her whispering to herself: 'Two hundred and twenty-one, two hundred and twenty-two, two hundred and twenty-three,' and then she stopped and sighed, 'Oh, dear! I had no idea they were so many!' Like that little maiden, I have often tried to count my mercies, but right soon have I had to cry, 'I had no idea they were so many!'"

THE PLAGUE OF CRIME.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON PREACHED AT "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" SERVICE IN THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, NEW YORK, LAST SUNDAY EVENING, APRIL 12, 1891.

"All the waters that were in the river were turned to blood." Exodus 7: 20.

AMONG all the Egyptian plagues none could have been worse than this. The Nile is the wealth of Egypt. Its fish the food. Its waters the irrigation of garden and fields. Its condition decides the prosperity or the doom of the empire. What happens to the Nile happens to all Egypt. And now in the text that great river is incarnadined. It is a red gash across an empire. In poetic license we speak of wars which turn the rivers into blood. But my text is not a poetic license. It was a fact, a great crimson appalling condition, described. The Nile rolling deep of blood. Can you imagine a more awful plague?

The modern plague which nearest corresponds with that is the plague of crime in all our cities. It halts not for bloodshed. It shrinks from no carnage. It bruises, and cuts, and strikes down, and destroys. It revels in the blood of body and soul, this plague of crime rampant for ages, and never bolder or more rampant than now.

The annual police reports of these cities as I examine them are to me more suggestive than Dante's Inferno, and all Christian people as well as reformers need to waken to a present and tremendous duty. If you want this "Plague of Crime" to stop, there are several kinds of persons you need to consider. First, the public criminals. You ought not to be surprised that these people make up a large portion in many communities. The vast majority of the criminals who take ship from Europe come into our own port. In 1869, of the forty-nine thousand people who were incarcerated in the prisons of the country, thirty-two thousand were of foreign birth. Many of them were the very desperadoes of society, oozing into the slums of our cities, waiting for an opportunity to riot and steal and debauch, joining the large gang of American thugs and cut-throats. There are in this cluster of cities—New York, Jersey City, and Brooklyn—four thousand people whose entire business in life is to commit crime. That is as much their business as jurisprudence or medicine or merchandise is your business. To it they bring all their energies of body, mind, and soul, and they look upon the intervals which they spend in prison as so much unfortunate loss of time, just as you look upon an attack of influenza or rheumatism which fastens you in the house for a few days. It is their lifetime business to pick pockets, and blow up safes, and shoplift, and ply the panel game, and they have as much pride of skill in their business as you have in yours when you upset the argument of an opposing counsel, or cure a gunshot fracture which other surgeons have given up, or foresee a turn in the market as you buy goods just before they go up twenty per cent. It is their business to commit crime, and I do not suppose that once in a year the thought of the immorality strikes them.

Ten million dollars worth of property stolen in this cluster of cities in one year. You cannot, as good citizens, be independent of that fact. It will touch your pocket, since I have to give you the fact that these three cities pay about eight million dollars worth of taxes a year to arraign, try, and support the criminal population. You help to pay the board of every criminal, from the sneak-thief that snatches a spool of cotton, up to some man who swamps a bank. More than that, it touches your heart in the moral depression of the community. You might as well think to stand in a closely confined room where there are fifty people and yet not breathe the vitiated air, as to stand in a community where there is such a great multitude of the depraved without being somewhat contaminated. What is the fire that burns your store down compared with the conflagration which consumes your morals? What is the theft of the gold and silver from your money safe compared with the theft of your children's virtue?

We are all ready to arraign criminals. We shout at the top of our voice, "Stop thief!" and when the police get on the track we come out, hatless and in our slippers, and assist in the arrest. We come around the bawling ruffian and hustle him off to justice, and when he gets in prison, what do we do for him? With great gusto we put on the handcuffs and the hoppers; but what preparation are we making for the day when the handcuffs and the hoppers come off? Society seems to say to these criminals, "Villain, go in there and rot," when it ought to say, "You are an offender against the law, but we mean to give you an opportunity to repent; we mean to help you. Here are Bibles and tracts and Christian influences. Christ died for you. Look, and live."

ELIZABETH FRY AND THE NEWGATE PRISONERS.

They are harder in heart and more infuriated when they come out of jail than when they went in. Many of the people who go to prison go again and again and again. Some years ago of fifteen hundred prisoners who during the year had been in Sing Sing, four hundred had been there before. In a house of correction in the country, where during a certain reach of time there had been five thousand people, more than three thousand had been there before. So, in one case the prison, and in the other case the house of correction, left them just as bad as they were before. The secretary of one of the benevolent societies of New York saw a lad fifteen years of age who had spent three years of his life in prison, and he said to the lad, "What have they done for you to make you better?" "Well," replied the lad, "the first time I was brought up before the judge he said, 'You ought to be ashamed of yourself.' And then I committed a crime again, and I was brought up before the same judge, and he said, 'You rascal!' And after a while I committed some other crime, and I was brought before the same judge, and he said, 'You ought to be hanged.' That is all they had done for him in the way of reformation and salvation. "Oh," you say, "these people are incorrigible." I suppose there are hundreds of persons this day lying in the prison bunks who would leap up at the prospect of reformation, if society would allow them a way into decency and respectability. "Oh," you say, "I have no patience with these rogues." I ask you in reply, how much better would you have been under the same circumstances? Suppose your mother had been a blasphemer and your father a sinner, and you had started life with a body stuffed with evil proclivities, and you had spent much of your time in a cellar amid obscenities and cursing, and if at ten years of age you had been compelled to go out and steal, battered and banged at night if you came in without any spoils, and suppose your early manhood and womanhood had been covered with rags and filth, and decent society had turned its back upon you, and left you to consort with vagabonds and whar rats—how much better would you have been I have no sympathy with that executive clemency which would let crime run loose, or which would sit in the gallery of a court-room weeping because some hard-hearted wretch brought to justice; but I do say that the safety and life of the community demand more potent influences in behalf of public offenders.

In some of the city prisons the air is like that of the Black Hole of Calcutta. I have visited prisons where, as the air swept through the wicket, it almost knocked me down. No sunlight. Young men who had committed the first crime crowded in among old offenders. I saw in one prison a woman, with a child almost blind, who had been arrested for the crime of poverty, who was waiting until the slow leg could take her to the almshouse, where she rightfully belonged; but she was thrust in there with her child amid the most abandoned wretches of the town. Many of the offenders in that prison sleeping on the floor, with nothing but a vermin-covered blanket over them. Those people crowded and wan and wasted a half suffocated and infuriated. I said to the men, "How do you stand it here?" "God knows," said one man, "we have to stand it. Oh, they will pay you when they get out. When they burned down one house they will burn three. They will strike deeper the assassin's knife. They are this minute plotting worse burglaries. Some of the city jails are the best places I know of to manufacture foot-pads, vagabonds, and cut-throats. In the insufferable stench and sickening surroundings of such places there is nothing but disease for body, idiocy for the mind, and death for soul. Stifled air and darkness and vermin never turned a thief into an honest man.

We want men like John Howard and William Blackstone, and women like Elizabeth Fry, to do for the prisons of the United States what those people did in other days for prisons of England. I thank God for William Isaac T. Hopper and Dr. Wines and Mr. Hall and scores of others have done in the way of prison reform; but we want something more radical before will come the blessing of him who said: "I was in prison, and ye came unto me."

Again, in your effort to arrest this plague of crime you need to consider untrustworthy officials. "Woe unto thee, O land, when king is a child, and thy princes drink in the morning." It is a great calamity to a city when bad men get into public authority. Why was that in New York there was such unparalleled crime between 1866 and 1871? It was because the judges of police in that city, at that time for the most part, were as corrupt as the vagabonds that came before them for trial. That were the days of high carnival for election frauds, assassination and forgery. We had nds of Rings. There was one man during those years that got one hundred and twenty-eight thousand dollars in one year for serving the public. In a few years it was estimated that there were fifty millions of public treasure plundered. In those times the criminal had only to wink to the judge, or his lawyer would ink for him, and the question was decided for the defendant. Of the eight thousand people arrested in that city in one year, only three thousand were punished. These little matters were "fixed up," while the interests of society were "fixed down."

You now as well as do that one villain who escapes only opens the door for other criminalities. It is no complaint to public authority when we have in all the cities of the country, walking broad, men and women notorious for criminality, unwhipped by justice. They are pointed out you in the street day by day. There you find what are called the "fences," the men who stand between the thief and the honest man, relieving the thief and at a great price handing over the goods to the owner to whom they belong. There you will find those who are called the "skinners," the men who hover round Wall Street, with great sleight of hand in bonds and stocks. There you find the funeral takers, the people who go and sit down and mourn with families and pick their pockets. And there are the "harbor thieves," the shoplifters, the "pickpockets," famous all over the cities. Hundreds of them with their names in the "Rogues' Gallery," yet doing nothing for the last five or ten years but defraud society and escape justice. When these people are unarrested and unpunished, it is putting a high premium upon vice, and saying to the young criminals of this country, "What a safe thing it is to be a great criminal." Let the law swoop upon them. Let it be known in this country that crime will have no quarter, that the detectives are after it, that the police club is being brandished, that the iron door of the prison is being opened, that the judge is ready to call on the case. Too great leniency to criminals is too great severity to society.

Again: In your effort to arrest this plague of crime, you need to consider the idle population. Of course, I do not refer to people who are getting old, or to the sick, or to those who cannot get work; but I tell you to look out for those athletic men and women who will not work. When the French nobleman was asked why he kept busy when he had so large a property, he said, "I keep on engraving so I may not hang myself." I do not care who the man is, you cannot afford to be idle. It is from the idle classes that the criminal classes are made up. A character, like water, gets putrid if it stands still too long. Who can wonder that in this world, where there is so much to be done, that God lets his indignation fall upon a man who chooses idleness? By what law of God is it right that you and I should toil day and day out, until our hands are blistered and our arms ache and our brain gets numb, and then be called upon to support, what in the United States are about two million loafers! They are a very dangerous class. Let the public authorities keep their eyes on them.

Again: Among the uprooting classes I place the oppressed poor. Poverty to a certain extent chastening; but after that, when it drives a man to the wall, and he hears his children cry vain for bread, it sometimes makes him desperate. I think that there are thousands of honest men lacerated into vagabondism. There are men crushed under burdens for which they are not half paid. While there is no excuse for criminality, even in oppression, I state it as a simple fact, that much of the scoundrelism of the community is consequent upon ill-treatment. There are many men and women battered and bruised and stung until the hour of despair has come, and they stand with the ferocity of a wild beast which, pursued until it can run no longer, turns round, foaming and bleeding, to fight the hounds.

There is a vast underground New York and Brooklyn life that is appalling and shameful. It wallows and steams with putrefaction. You go down the stairs, which are wet and decayed with filth, and at the bottom you find the poor victims on the floor, cold, sick, three-fourths dead, slinking into a still darker corner under the gleam of the lantern of the police. There has not been a breath of fresh air in that room for five years, literally. There they are men, women, children; blacks, whites; Mary Magdalen without her repentance, and Lazarus without his God: These are "the dives" into which the pick-pockets and the thieves go, as well as a great many who would like a different life but cannot get it. They are the underlying volcano that hreatens us with a Caraccas earthquake. And there are only two outlets for it: the police court and the Potter's Field. In other words, they must either go to prison or to hell. Oh, you never saw it, you say. You never will see it until on the day when those staggering wretches shall come up in the light of the judgment throne, and while all hearts are being revealed, God will ask you what you did to help them.

There is another layer of poverty and destitution, not so squalid, but almost as helpless. You hear the incessant wailing for bread and clothes and fire. Their eyes are sunken. Their cheek-bones stand out. Their hands are damp with slow consumption. Their flesh is puffed up with dropsies. Their breath is like that of the charnel-house. They hear the roar of the wheels of fashion overhead, and the gay laughter of men and maidens, and wonder why God gave to others so much and to them so little. Some of them thrust into an infidelity like that of the poor German girl who, when told in the midst of her wretchedness that God was good, said: "No, no good God. Just look at me. No good God."

In this cluster of cities, whose cry of want I interpret, there are said to be, as far as I can figure it up from the reports, about three hundred thousand honest poor who are dependent upon individual, city, and State charities. If all their voices could come up at once, it would be a groan that would shake the foundations of the city, and bring all earth and heaven to the rescue. But, for the most part, it suffers unexpressed. It sits in silence, gnashing its teeth, and sucking the blood of its own arteries, waiting for the judgment day. Oh, I should not wonder if on that day it would be found out that some of us had some things that belonged to them; some extra garment which might have made them comfortable in cold days; some bread thrust into the ash-barrel that might have appeased their hunger for a little while; some wasted candle or gas-jet that might have kindled up their darkness; some fresco on the ceiling that would have given them a roof; some jewel which, brought to that orphan girl in time, might have kept her from being crowded off the precipices of an unclean life; some New Testament that would have told them of him who "came to seek and save that which was lost." Oh, this wave of vagrancy and hunger and nakedness that dashes against our front door step! If the roofs of all the houses of destitution could be lifted so we could look down into them just as God looks, whose nerves would be strong enough to stand it? And yet there they are. The fifty thousand sewing-women in these three cities, some of them in hunger and cold, working night after night, until sometimes the blood spurts from nostril and lips. How well their grief was voiced by that despairing woman who stood by her invalid husband and invalid child, and said to the city missionary: "I am down-hearted. Everything's against us; and then there are other things." "What other things?" said the city missionary. "O," she replied, "my sin." "What do you mean by that?" "Well," she said, "I never hear or see anything good. It's work from Monday morning till Saturday night, and then when Sunday comes I can't go out, and I walk the floor, and it makes me tremble to think that I have got to meet God. O sir, it's so hard for us. We have to work so, and then we have so much trouble, and then we are getting along so poorly; and see this wee little thing growing weaker and weaker; and then to think we are not getting nearer to God, but floating away from him. O, sir, I do wish I was ready to die."

I should not wonder if they had a good deal better time than we in the future, to make up for the fact that they had such a bad time here. It would be just like Jesus to say: "Come up and take the highest seats. You suffered with me on earth; now be glorified with me in heaven." O thou weeping One of Bethany! O thou dying One of the cross! Have mercy on the starving, freezing, homeless poor of these great cities!

I have preached this sermon for four or five practical reasons: Because I want you to know who are the uprooting classes of society. Because I want you to be more discriminating in your charities. Because I want your hearts open with generosity, and your hands open with charity. Because I want you to be made the sworn friends of all city evangelisation, and all newsboys' lodging houses, and all Children's Aid Societies, and Dorcas Societies, under the skillful manipulation of wives and mothers and sisters and daughters; let the spare garments of your wardrobes be fitted to the limbs of the wan and shivering. I should not wonder if that hat that you give should come back a jeweled coronet, or if that garment that you hand out from your wardrobe should mysteriously be whitened, and somehow wrought into the Saviour's own robe, so in the last day he would run his hand over it, and say: "I was naked, and ye clothed me." That would be putting your garments to glorious uses.

But more than that, I have preached the sermon because I thought in the contrast you would see how very kindly God had dealt with you, and I thought that thousands of you would go to your comfortable homes, and sit at your well-filled tables, and at the warm registers, and look at the round faces of your children, and that then you would burst into tears at the review of God's goodness to you, and that you would go to your room and lock the door, and kneel down, and say: "O Lord, I have been an ingrate; make me thy child. O Lord, there are so many hungry and unclad and unsheltered today, I thank thee that all my life thou hast taken such good care of me. O Lord, there are so many sick and crippled children to-day, I thank thee mine are well, some of them on earth, some of them in heaven. Thy goodness, O Lord, breaks me down. Take me once and forever. Sprinkled as I was many years ago at the altar, while my mother held me, now I consecrate my soul to thee in a holier baptism of repenting tears.

"I AM DOWN-HEARTED!"

For sinners, Lord, thou cam'st to bleed,
And I'm a sinner vile indeed;
Lord, I believe thy grace is free,
O magnify that grace to me.

SINAI AND CALVARY.

EVANGELIST HARRISON ON WARNING AND ENTREATY AS FACTORS IN REVIVAL WORK.

The Tender Story of the Cross more Potent than the Terrors of the Law—Jonathan Edwards and Elder Knapp on Hell—Some Valuable Practical Hints for the Conduct of Revivals in Churches.

BY REV. THOMAS HARRISON.

IN revival work, it is a question for serious consideration whether the dread or fear of eternal punishment, or the invitation of a loving Saviour to be partakers of eternal happiness with him in heaven, is the most effective factor in influencing the minds of the average audience. Speaking from personal experience, I do not favor the persistent presentation of unending punishment for sin as the method that is most likely to reach the heart. As between Sinai, with its lightnings and its judgments, and Calvary with its sweet forgiveness and all embracing love, the latter is the argument that will more quickly touch the conscience and inspire the soul to gratitude and devotion. Tender love wins more souls than dreadful thunderings.

Persuasion Rather than Compulsion.

I would preach with a view of strengthening the convictions the hearers already experience. It is true, I would preach eternal punishment; but I would not persistently make it a prominent feature of the discourse. The old belief, I think, is the same. Men have the same fear and dread of the consequences of sin that they ever had. The established convictions regarding hell and its torments still prevail. But the preacher who dwells less on them than on the necessity of living a Christian life, and who shows, with all the force and eloquence at his command, the beauties of that life and the eternal reward that follows it, will accomplish more than he who tells men that, if they do not instantly accept, they are going to hell. Calvary's blood will touch more hearts than Sinai's alarms. I have tried them both, and I bear witness that the power of the blood is mightiest. Preach to your church the full Gospel, inviting all to partake of the fullness of God's love and to enter into the blessings of the higher life, and look for a revival harvest that will make mothers glad, homes glad, neighbors glad, and that will kindle the churches into flame because of the conversions, and of the fire of Christian love that is burning in many hearts!

Picture to your congregation the peace that comes into one's life by accepting Christ here; the triumph that will attend the closing of life, and the bliss of an eternity in Heaven. Men and women are restless, terribly burdened and anxious; they want relief. Present Christ as the relief, rather than as the angry Judge. Jonathan Edwards pictured God as holding the sinner over hell, as a boy would a spider over a fire. I would present him with open arms, trying to woo the sinner to himself, rather than as ready to drop him into the flame of everlasting torment. Elder Knapp used to preach hell until you could almost see the doom of the lost and hear the cry of despair! Yet all these terrors have not the potency for the sinner that is possessed by the tender and comforting invitation of the Gospel.

Tact in Dealing with the Awakened.

Sympathy, kindness and earnest patience must characterize the treatment of those who, having taken the Gospel message home to their hearts, arise for prayer. Any effort at compulsion would fail; they have to be led, they cannot be driven. Very often I have found that the elders at the meeting accomplished more than others—more than either the pastor or the evangelist. The people look most to their accustomed elders. It should not be forgotten that when a person rises for prayer, he has by that action committed himself to the Saviour and is already two-thirds won. When I see a person rise for prayer, I like to be his guide myself and to act at once, if there be time enough. But, of course, where hundreds rise, one person cannot do the work. This is the time and the opportunity for good and devout Christians to come forward and assist in doing it.

In isolated cases, it is well to take the individual in hand personally and say: "You have taken one step; now take all." Bring him to the altar by the hand as a seeker. There give him encouragement and have prayer; sing some hymn of faith. Then point the newly-awakened soul to Christ. Let him appreciate the value of practical experience and do not give him false hope. A convert must see things in the true light. There is altogether too much superficial work done. People take penitents for converts, when they are far from being such as yet. They mistake contrition for salvation, when the two are widely apart. At all the meetings, it is my chief anxiety that they should continue to seek until they are sure, beyond peradventure, that they have found Christ.

Preparatory Work.

There should be preparation on the part of a church in advance of a revival. This can only be done by proper consecration and an attitude of devout expectancy. Ten days previous to the opening of the revival, the pastor should hold special meetings, and he should preach concerning the coming revival at least two Sabbaths before it really opens. Thus the people are all expectation before the first blow is struck. My first effort would be to lead the church to more faith, to self-examination and to consecration. As far as possible, I would have the choir well organized and the hymns learned, in order that the singing might be a valued feature of the service at once. The secretaries should be ready and the workers for the altar all prepared. The duty of the secretaries is to take the names of those who come to the altar. With such an organization, and with the true Gospel spirit pervading a church, in anticipation of the coming of the revivalist, the work of the latter would be much more effective and the opportunities for spiritual benefit greatly improved. In church work, as in all other things, organization is of the greatest value, and no one knows this better than the experienced revivalist, whose labors are thereby rendered more effective, and, under God's blessing, more surely instrumental in awakening conviction and turning souls to Christ.

HELP FOR THE DRUNKARD.

HOW MR. CHAS. A. BUNTING IS LEADING THE SLAVES OF LIQUOR TO EMANCIPATION.

The Power of God's Grace in the Rescue of the Fallen Drunkenness a Sin, not a Misfortune—The Method Adopted—The Remarkable Success.

DRUNKARDS, in a majority of cases, realize very forcibly the condition described by the Apostle Paul in the memorable word "The good that would, I do not; the evil which I would not, that I do." Many a victim has struggled heroically to overcome the habit and, hating and despising himself for his weakness in yielding, has renewed the fight again and again, hoping against hope for victory. Very few are willing slaves; the majority of those who fail are men who are overcome in spite of good resolutions and desperate resistance. To such a helping hand is extended by the institution, pictures of which with a portrait of Superintendent appear on the first page. Mr. Bunting's theory is that drunkenness is not a physical defect, not a hereditary taint, but a sin and that the drunkard's best and almost only hope is in him who came "to proclaim liberty to the captives."

"We have a serious talk at the outset, with men who desire to enter the Home," said Mr. E. N. Hayes, who in Mr. Bunting's temporary absence received a representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. "We do not take in a man who is intoxicated. If a man comes to acknowledge his degradation and express an earnest desire to reform, we ask him if he is willing to submit to our rules and to cooperate with us in our efforts for his permanent reclamation. We treat him as an intelligent man desiring help. It is no part of our work to receive men who simply want to recuperate after a long spree, only to enter upon another. We want men who in their sober senses are sincere and in earnest in their wish to reform."

"When a clear understanding is reached in this conversation the man realizes that the rules have been established in his interest; he submits cheerfully to such restraints as he has thought it necessary to impose. He perceives that we are working with him to achieve the object of his coming."

"What are the restraints?" "Well, we expect him to remain in the home for a few days. Afterward, when we are convinced that he can be trusted he joins a few other persons who have been longer in the home than he, and takes exercise in Central Park every day."

"As to our remedies, we do not administer any. This is not a hospital. We tell the victim plainly that his sole hope of permanent recovery is in conversion. God can keep him, even after he has broken the pledge, broken the most solemn promises and the strongest resolutions. He must trust in Christ for keeping power. There is isolation for a short time from temptation, and we exclude much from the quiet retreat and cheerful social influences, nutritious diet and pure air. But everything depends—and this we impose on every inmate—on absolute unconditional surrender to God. Every man is taken in room alone and encouraged to look to God for rescue and to give his heart to him. There are Bible-readings in the Chapel and far prayers. Everything is designed to lead the victim to look out of himself and to God."

Asked about the results, Mr. Hayes spoke confidently. It was rare indeed, he said, that a man who spent the prescribed five weeks in the Home fell back into the sin. It was a significant fact, however, that the cases which occurred were of those who had not made surrender. Where a man clung to the old habit, for instance, and resumed it, leaving the Home there was a strong probability of his falling. This was not so because smoking might induce thirst, as use it showed that the man had not completely given himself up to God.

The project of the Home dates back to 1877. May 18 of that year, it was discussed at a meeting of gentlemen in the Y. M. C. A. rooms, New York. Those present were Caleb B. Folsom, Rev. D. Stuart Dodge, William T. H. R. R. McBurney, Arthur C. Parsons and Charles E. Bunting. The project in outline had already received the endorsement of John B. Folsom and William E. Dodge. A committee was formed, and an appeal for funds issued. So it was the response that on June 7, 1877, the Christian Home for Intemperate Men was opened. The house was situated on Seventy-eighth Street, and was capable of accommodating thirty inmates. At the end of the third year so great had the success and so large the number of applicants for admission, that the necessity for commodious quarters was recognized. An appeal for funds was issued. The result, as before, was prompt and liberal. A house was purchased on the corner of Madison Street and Eighty-sixth Street, and the present building was erected. It was formally dedicated on May 11, 1882. It cost $125,000, and was opened free of debt and mortgage. During the past eight years an average number of one hundred men have been received, and these, so far as can be ascertained, more than two-thirds have remained steadfast. This is a convincing proof of the efficacy of grace, and of the encouragement there is in him for deliverance from this and all sins. A number of deeply interesting incidents connected with this work will be published in future numbers of this journal.

MR. PENZOTTI RELEASED.

The Dispatch Announces that the Persecuted Agent of the Bible Society in Peru has been Liberated.

The welcome news comes by cable from Lima, Peru, of the release from prison of the Rev. Francis Penzotti, who has been incarcerated for more than eight months for no crime than that of circulating the Bible and holding religious worship. On January 21st, all details of his arrest, trial and imprisonment were related in this journal, with pictures of his house and the prison in which he was held. The facts in brief are that Mr. Penzotti, whose portrait appears on page 228, was sent for Peru of the American Bible Society. On July 25, 1890, he was arrested and thrust into prison. After several weeks imprisonment he was released and acquitted. But he was not released. His persecutors appealed to the Superior Court, which adjourned for two months before hearing his case. Dr. Gilman, the Secretary of the Bible Society made an earnest appeal for the intervention of the State Government, but the fact that Mr. Penzotti is an Italian embarrassed Mr. Blaine's efforts. The latest news which came by mail was that our agent at Lima, was making efforts to induce the Superior Court to hold a special session for the consideration of the case. The message now received would indicate that it has been successful. It does not, however, give any details, but simply announces that Mr. Penzotti has been released.

The spirit in which the persecuted man endures his accumulation of sorrows is evinced in his correspondence, much of which we have published. His last letter dated March 1st, was very characteristic. He wrote: "The realization of my imprisonment is breaking the health of my family, especially of my mother. Her head is white, her color yellow, and she is very weak, so that I have great solicitude for her. For myself I have not any anxiety, knowing that death is gain, but to live seems necessary for my family and those who are in darkness."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

ONEY in the Possession of a child has incited a family in Chicago to an attempt on his life. An orphan boy became the patient recently of a skilful physician in that city. The symptoms of his disease puzzled the doctor for a time. He was a busy man who had so many patients that it seemed unlikely that he would give much study or extra care to a child. But this particular child interested him, and he watched the case attentively. On making inquiries about him, he learned that he was heir to a large fortune, which reverted to his relatives in the event of his death. This discovery gave him a clue to the ailment of the boy. He satisfied himself that he was being slowly poisoned to death by minute doses of arsenic. He notified a lawyer of the facts, and the lawyer at once applied to the courts for an order to place the boy in St. Vincent's Asylum. If other boys have envied the orphan heir, they will be less disposed to do so when they hear that his wealth has nearly involved the loss of his life. There are many grown men who, as millionaires, are the object of envy, but who would not be so if the spiritual perils entailed by their riches were fully realized in the light of Christ's warning. (Matt. 19: 24.)

An Architect's Reason for Changing the Style of an edifice was given to a reporter last week. Citizens who have watched the restoration of the Western Union Building in New York, which was recently damaged by fire, have been surprised to see that the four upper stories, which have had to be entirely rebuilt, are of a different style of architecture from the lower stories, which the fire left standing. The former are of plain red brick utterly devoid of the blocks of granite which were so conspicuous in the old building and are still in their places in the lower stories. To the reporter who deprecated the change, which, he said, gave the edifice a patchwork appearance, the architect said that the difference was the result of the lessons learned from the fire. Although the granite blocks were strong and stable so far as supporting the weight of the building went, and though they gave it an imposing appearance they were an element of weakness in a fire. The fierce heat disintegrated the granite which quickly yielded when the flames attacked it. It had therefore been decided to discard the granite blocks though by doing so the beauty of the structure was impaired. His instructions were to provide first for safety. The same rule should be observed in character-building. Experience proves that some characters, which, in time of ease are admired for their beauty, contain elements which yield under the fierce fires of temptation or adversity. Stability rather than beauty is the object to be attained. (Matt. 13: 20, 21.)

Siren Signals in Railroad Tunnels are Suggested by an expert as a sure means of preventing collisions. The recent accident in the New York tunnel, has directed attention to the necessity of some new system of signals. The evidence given at the inquest proves that the danger-signal was duly set at the time of the catastrophe. The engineer's plea that he did not see it is nevertheless credited, as the tunnel was full of fog and smoke. It is now suggested that a lever should be so affixed to the signal as to touch the rail when the signal is set at danger. The front wheels of a locomotive passing that point would depress the lever, which should connect with a small tank or reservoir containing compressed air. The depression of the lever would open a valve in the tank, and the compressed air thus released would, in its escape, produce the peculiar noise known as the Siren cry. Thus, though the engineer might not see the signal, he could hear the noise and stop his train. If the engineer did not hear it, the conductor might do so and apply his brakes. All this assumes that the officials in charge of the train would not proceed if they were aware that there was danger ahead. The assumption is well-founded so far as trainmen are concerned, and one can only wish that there was the same caution exercised by all men when warning is given of spiritual danger. Preachers of the Gospel, Sunday School teachers and parents are continually uttering warnings of the danger of the eternal disaster which impends over those who are heedlessly living in sin, but too often the warning is disregarded. (Prov. 29: 1.)

The Marvellous Cure of an Idiot Child is Reported in a medical journal. It states that an operation has been performed upon an idiot girl by Dr. Lannelongue, an eminent specialist of Paris. The child, though four years old, could neither walk nor stand, never smiled or seemed to take notice of anything. The doctor made an incision in the centre of the child's skull, and raised a piece of bone from the left side to relieve the pressure of the skull upon the brain. Within less than a month the child could walk, and has now become quite like other children, smiling, playful, and observant. The suggestion is made, that other forms of mania less severe than that of the idiot, might be successfully treated by similar operations, and thus not only would the sufferers be benefited, but the burden of their support would be removed from the families to which they belong. Possibly the suggestion may be adopted in cases where there is a clearly defined malformation of the head, but when dementia proceeds, as it often does, from a moral cause, no such operation could avail. There are those, too, who are accounted sane, but whose propensities to evil render them a burden to society, and whose cure would give general relief. The physical remedy of the prison, which the law prescribes for them, often makes them worse instead of curing them. For them the only hope lies in the miracle which Christ promises to work on all who trust in him: "I will take the stony heart out of their flesh and give them a heart of flesh." (Ezek. 11: 19.)

An Illuminated Lady was Exhibited Recently at Lawrenceburg, Ind. An entertainment was being given in that city for a benevolent object. One of its features was an exhibition of a series of symbolical figures, each of which was intended to typify some industry carried on in the city. When it came to the turn of the Electric Light Company to place a figure on the stage, a lady peculiarly attired stepped before the spectators. Her dress was of a soft, white material with a trimming of the three national colors entwined. Over this was a network of wires with a minute colored glass globe at each intersection. On her head was something like a helmet, and in her hand she held aloft an antique lamp. As she stood motionless, the lights in the hall were turned down, and in a moment she was illuminated with the electric light. A dazzling light shone from the helmet, and another shot up from the lamp in her hand, while in each of the colored globes there was a spark glimmering. The effect is said to have been exceedingly beautiful, the light from the solitary figure illuminating the spacious room. It would be well for this dark world, if every Christian so lived, that his character would give out light, and thus be as Jesus said, "The light of the world." When there are in the character inconsistencies and worldliness, they obscure the light which the real Christian has within him, and which is a spark of the ineffable light of the Deity. Thus, the spark fails of its complete function, and the world is deprived of the light which should come from "The spirit of man which is the candle of the Lord." (Prov. 20: 27.)

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editor, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

NINEVEH BROUGHT TO REPENT.

S. S. LESSON FOR APRIL 26, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
JONAH 3: 1-10. GOLDEN TEXT, LUKE 11: 32.

A Second Opportunity of Service Granted—Jonah Undertakes the Mission—Goes Beyond his Commission in Fixing the Date of the City's Destruction—His First Day's Preaching—The People Believe and Repent—The King's Proclamation—The Prophet Disappointed.

WHEN a child of God who is in his school, runs away from the lessons which his heavenly Father gives him to learn, this heavenly Father in love and pity often gives him returned lessons: it was so with Jonah. "The word of the Lord came to Jonah the second time, saying, Arise, go unto Nineveh, that great city, and preach unto it the preaching that I bid thee." The first time it was, "Cry against it, for their wickedness is come up before me." Now, Jonah must go to Nineveh for his own soul's sake as well as for the people. Jonah must have pledged himself, while yet under the sea, to the obedience which God demanded; he had said, "I will pay that that I have vowed." (2: 9.) So Jonah arose, and went to Nineveh, according to the word of the Lord. His disobedience had brought him only shame, and confusion, and great loss of time; and at last, he had to yield to God. Jonah seems never to have doubted the power of God's word through his message, he never expected anything else than that his message should be received, and that the people should repent; but he was far from willing that it should be at any cost to him; he had not learned to be "a living sacrifice" for his God and for precious souls.

Nineveh was "an exceeding great city, of three-days' journey." What extent this signifies we cannot tell. In any case, when Jonah had carried his message; "Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be overthrown," through one-third of the city, it began to tell powerfully upon the population: "The people of Nineveh believed God, and proclaimed a fast, and and put on sackcloth, from the greatest of them even unto the least of them." The man of God disobeys and flees away from his God,

The Heathen Believe God and Obey!

Is there no parallel case in our own day? The men of Nineveh shall rise in judgment against this generation and shall condemn it; because they repented at the preaching of Jonas, and behold a greater than Jonas is here. (Matt. 12: 41.) The people were the first to bow before God. But word came to the king of Nineveh, and he was wise enough to recognize that a power which had bowed the hearts of his people as one man was no common thing; he was conscious of an unseen, but not unfelt power with the message, and he "arose from his throne," acknowledging by this very act, the superiority of Jonah's God who had sent his warning, he "laid his robe from him," his insignia of authority, and so bowed to a higher than he; and he "sat in ashes," in token of the deepest humiliation! And not only so, but he made use of his kingly power to bring his people down before God; he "caused it to be proclaimed and published through Nineveh, by the decree of the king and his nobles, saying, Let neither man nor beast, herd nor flock, taste anything; let them not feed, nor drink water; but let man and beast be covered with sackcloth, and cry mightily unto God." Everything which lived must bow down in deep humiliation. It was a grand sight; a whole mighty city with the king at their head, broken and abased before God! Or, if our land, our people with the preachers and rulers, and then all the people would thus bow and humble themselves before God for the terrible drink curse, the gambling and the immorality, and for the result of these sins in our lunatic asylums and prisons, in our ragged homes, and our unemployed, a far brighter light than that in any scheme or any long-trying work, would break over the country.

The king of Nineveh turned preacher, and, perhaps repeating the words of Jonah, he said, "Let them turn every one from his evil way, and from the violence which is in their hands. Who can tell if God will turn and repent, and turn away from his fierce anger, that we perish not?" God has given us sometimes to behold wondrous works of his grace, souls seeking the Lord by dozens, by fifties, even by hundreds, in a single meeting, and Oh! the sense of holy awe, but of intense gladness, which then has filled our souls, to see him Conqueror! We know nothing like it. The

with her penitent king went up to God; the mute beasts which might not feed; the workmen all in prayer, while their spades and looms, their hammers and other tools lay idle; the chariots standing still while the horses' heads drooped in their stables for want of water; the bazaars all still; no fire kindled, no food cooked, no conversation carried on,—all appealed to the Father-heart of God. An entire city had recognized, and laid to heart, that God was speaking to her! Oh, if Jerusalem had thus recognized the voice of Jesus, if she too had known "the time of her visitation," she would not have been "ploughed as a field," and her temple would not have been thrown down so that not one stone was left upon another! The cry of the city went up to God, not, like Sodom, for vengeance, but for mercy; "God saw their works that they turned from their evil way; and God repented of the evil that he had said that he would do unto them; and he did it not."

And Jonah! Was not his heart bursting with gladness, that, after all his wilfulness, God should use him as the instrument of the conversion of a whole city? Was he not beside himself with joy? Do we read it aright? "But

and he was very angry." What! a whole city converted to the fear of God, and the instrument of their conversion displeased? A city saved from destruction because it had repented before God, and a man of God displeased? Could it be possible? Yes; if all Nineveh had been destroyed and his prophecy had come to pass, it would have suited Jonah better! O, the depth of selfishness in the heart of man! Jonah had no pity for any other man but his despicable self, his reputation was more to him than the souls and bodies of all the people of Nineveh! Can there exist such depravity in a human heart? Yes; even to-day we have met with men and women who have no scruple in injuring some blessed work of God in order to gratify their own spite or ill-feeling against some other Christian! "Let Nineveh go, let souls perish, but I will have my rights, I am not going to be wronged." Such is the spirit which actuates some who betray their Lord for thirty pieces of silver or for some envied position in a church or mission! Some even commence missions in order to bring themselves into notice, and not to serve the purpose of their Lord! And he sees it all, and it grieves him to the heart. Nineveh was spared, but no thanks to selfish Jonah; the crew of the ship were converted, but no thanks to selfish Jonah; and yet he was a powerful preacher!

The cowardly man goes into a sulk, and says, because his prophecy had been reversed by God's mercy, "Therefore now, O Lord, take I beseech thee, my life from me; for it is better for me to die than live." Had Jonah forgotten the former lesson which God had taught him? Alas! he loved himself better than his God, and better than lost souls! The whole world and God and Nineveh, revolved around Jonah; he saw and felt everything, not as it was, but as it touched him, and so it is with every selfish man. "Doeest thou well to be angry?" said his patient God. Jonah had an idea of how to make himself comfortable; he made a booth and sat under it in the shade, to watch what would become of the city and God prepared a plant to come up over the booth in the rapid growth of Eastern vegetation. And he who could not rejoice when thousands of lives were saved found in his heart to rejoice with great joy because he felt a little cooler! So utterly unfeeling is a selfish man. But God wanted to make something of this man whose heartless selfishness repels us as we read. When man turns away in disgust, God still has patience. He prepared a worm to destroy the gourd, and a burning wind which interfered with the physical comfort of the prophet, and made him fidget with heat. For the third time, this man who was not afraid to die, but was too much of a coward to live, if he had to bear a little discomfort, requested to die! His only thought was to escape suffering himself, although he was callous enough to the dangers and suffering of others! A second time, God asks him, "Doeest thou well to be angry?" and he growls out, "do well to be angry, even unto death."

Then said the Lord, "Thou hast had pity on the gourd for the which thou hast not labored neither madest it to grow, which came up in a night, and perished in a night; and should I spare Nineveh, that great city, wherein are more than six score thousand persons that can not discern between their right hand and their left, and also much cattle?" The gourd served Jonah's purpose, there it was of value; the Ninevites were nothing to him! But Christ died for us Christians, "that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves but unto him which died for them and rose again" (II. Cor. 5: 15.) Jonah could not know how to be "crucified with Christ," and so, how to live his life—Christ dwelling in our hearts by faith is our only refuge from self and selfishness.

AN APPEAL TO THE DOCTOR.

A Story of the Sunday School Lesson for April 26. "Nineveh brought to repentance." Jonah 3: 1-10.

SEVERAL boys were working industriously at their lessons, one winter evening in the lower classroom of a large school. They were joined by one of their class-mates who came in hot and panting. "Where have you been, Tom?" they asked. "I am almost through."

"On an errand for Gower. He has a party in his room to-night. I've been for the dessert. They are having a high time. There are ten of the big boys there and they've got wine and cards."

"They'd have a high time if the Doctor knew," said one of the boys.

"And so would you have if you told of their retorted Tom. 'They'd half kill you.'"

A few days later there was some fun going on in the younger boys' room and a heavy snow was overturned. The noise brought to the room the junior master, under whose jurisdiction they were. He reproved them sharply and threatened punishment.

"You are pretty sharp on us," said one of the boys, "but you say nothing to Gower when he sets for their drinking and gambling. That is worse than anything we do."

Mr. Prior, the junior master, was astonished at the remark, but as the senior boys were under his control, it was no business of his. He decided, however, to report what he heard to Dr. Faber, the principal of the school. It was clearly a case for expulsion but Dr. Faber was always reluctant to take severe measures. He was so in this case, but he could not allow drinking and card-playing in the school.

"See them, Mr. Prior," he said, "and warn them. Perhaps they are not aware what the penalty is. Tell them plainly that they rendering themselves liable to expulsion make them understand the disgrace it will bring and the misery it will bring on their parents."

"Yes, sir; I will tell them, but I am afraid they will not heed me. They know I am not ordinate and they have always been haughty and arrogant with me."

"But this is a serious matter, Mr. Prior. They cannot afford to despise your message, especially they know you come from me."

Mr. Prior went very reluctantly on his mission. He had not bargained for this disagreeable task when he spoke to the Doctor on the subject. He supposed the doctor would have dealt with the delinquents himself. He had no hope of success and expected to be jeered at and snubbed. However, there was no alternative, as Dr. Faber had pressed him to go, so he went.

"The Doctor has heard of your doings and you are to be expelled," he said, when entering Gower's room he found the boys surrounded with signs of dissipation. It was true he was not authorized to make such a statement, but he thought that there was no better way of overawing them. "You have disgraced yourselves," he added, "and have brought dishonor on your parents. How will they feel when they read of our conduct in the papers and learn that you have been expelled?"

A sudden gravity fell on the boys at this terrible threat. They were fully sensible of the serious consequences of such a punishment. Mr. Prior was surprised at the way they took it. They did not jeer at him nor snub him as he had expected. Neither did they beg him to intercede with the Doctor for them. He left them gloomily considering their position. After he was gone they consulted and determined to go in a body to the Doctor himself and express their contrition. It was a painful thing to do, but of so painful as would be the penalty they had incurred.

"They spoke in a very manly way," said Dr. Faber, talking about the visit with Mr. Prior afterward. "They are really contrite, I am sure and there will be no more of those orgies."

"You are not going to expel them!" Mr. Prior asked in amazement.

"No, this is a far better ending than expulsion. We have to think of them and their future, you know, Mr. Prior. It is always a serious matter to disgrace a boy publicly. A stain on the character may make him reckless and, after all, what we really want is that he should repent and reform."

"They will never heed anything, I say again," said Mr. Prior, sullenly, as he left the Doctor's library, and he knew in his heart that he was sorry that they had been so leniently dealt with.

In another land and in a later time Mr. Prior was reminded of the incident. He was lying high unto death among strangers, and before him all was dark. Conscience told him that there was no hope for him beyond the grave. A sinful life lay behind him, and though he had long known the way of salvation, he had never sought reconciliation with God. A young clergyman who had heard of his desolate state, went to his bedside and won his confidence.

"God will pardon all," he said, "if you repent and plead the name of Jesus."

"I cannot," said the sick man. "There is no hope for me. I must bear the penalty of my sin."

"I remember once feeling as you do," said the clergyman. "When I was a mere boy in a public school, a great disgrace hung over me. There seemed no hope, but I went to the headmaster and humbled myself, and he forgave me."

"What is your name?" the sick man asked.

"Gower," said the clergyman.

"I thought your features were familiar. Yes, I knew you then. It is strange that you should be talking so to me. I am Prior, the junior naster who brought you Dr. Faber's message."

"Ah! I remember you now. Do you not think that there is more encouragement for you to go to God than there was for us to go to Dr. Faber that day?"

Mr. Prior had never taken that view of the case. His thoughts had been fixed on himself, not on the character of the God of love. He sought and found peace through Christ,

EARTH'S RE-GENESIS.

Will this Globe be Purified and Transformed by a Second Birth.

BY REV. GEORGE C. NEEDHAM.

DOES the Word of revelation disclose the future of this planet? If so, what shall the end be? Shall it be treated as a worn-out and useless machine, fit only for the junk-shop? Or shall it be counted worthy of the repair-shop, where its complicated movement shall be re-adjusted, and the wonderful orb, renewed and renovated, go on its course, beautiful as in its youth, when first created and sent on its mission through boundless space?

God hath indeed promised to renew the earth. As the bare grain cast into the soil, gives birth to the new grain with its abundant life, and as our corruptible bodies which are planted in the tomb shall spring into life immortal, so also will this physical globe emerge out of her terrestrial ruin, and become again a celestial planet, evermore bathed in the effulgent glory of her Creator, who hath promised to make all things new.

The Cloud Symbol.

The earth was indeed beautiful in her virgin youth; comely as a bride adorned for her husband. But she has had many days of sorrow, having been divorced from her royal partner, the glorious Cloud—symbol of the Divine Presence. These long ages "Ichabod" has been written on her walls, for alas, "the glory has departed." Nevertheless, the days of her divorcement shall end, and the friendly Cloud will again kiss her purified lips, and evermore dwell upon her radiant hills. (Isa. 4: 4, 5.) He who has told us of the birth of our planet by creation, has also predicted her second birth by a resurrection from the dead.

The theories which set aside creation, and per consequence, the Creator, we regard as the insane ravings of the maddest of mad men, instigated by hatred of God's sovereignty, and rebellion against his supreme authority. As we know of the world's genesis by divine and unerring history, so we know of its re-genesis by divine and infallible prophecy.

The Regeneration.

What then is earth's predicted future? Turn we now to Matt. 19: 28: "And Jesus said unto them, Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel."

The word translated regeneration is found again in Titus 3: 5, which very plainly refers to the new birth of a believer. It is not a figure of speech, not high-wrought imagery, but literal statement. The believer is made new, he is a new creation in Christ Jesus. So also shall the earth be made new according to the working of him who hath so purposed it. Those who are converted, through grace, are brought out of darkness into light, and from Satan unto God. Satan is now prince of the power of the air, the god of this age, but the planet will be wrested from his grasp, while he himself shall be hurled into the great abyss, and so we too will be brought from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God.

Again we read in Acts 3: 21, "Whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." Our Lord has gone into the heavens where he fulfills his priestly ministry until the time arrives when he shall again come forth for his glorious work of restoration.

And this is in consonance with that sublime "evangel of creation" in Rom. 8: 19-23, "For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God. For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope: Because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the first-fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to-wit, the redemption of our body."

Here is depicted both

Agony and Expectation;

agony because of the dread curse; expectation because of the promised blessing. The earth brought under the captivity of corruption through the sin of the first Adam, shall be redeemed, regenerated and restored; her centuries of groaning will cease for she shall be delivered from her bondage through the redemptive agency of the second Adam. For thus it hath been prophesied of him in Isaiah 65: 17-18, "For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth; and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create; for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy." The exceeding glory of earth's future will so completely overshadow her present condition, that any beauty which she now possesses will completely fade out of mind. Even now in her laboratory she can transmute her charcoal into diamond. As another has said, "Her crystals and pearls and gems and silver and gold are but shining dust and glorified slime."

Her Jewels.

Her translucent alabaster is formed by her cunning hands out of common earth, and in her servile state she produces gems of exquisite grace. What then may she not do when free from the bondage of corruption, and reinvigorated by the Spirit of Christ? What wonders, glories, miracles may she not then perform! When heaven and earth are united in holy alliance the magnificence of the one shall be shared in by the other. "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea. And I, John, saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. And I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God. And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away. And he that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new. And he said unto me, Write: for these words are true and faithful." Rev. 21: 1-5.

Purification.

How much is implied in this predestined renewal we do not know. But we do know that moral and physical evil will be banished from our planet, that the god of this world, by whose craft and malice, and strength the race has been deceived, and destroyed, will be hurled, a chained prisoner into the deep and fiery abyss, that the full consequences of the curse which man's sin entailed in its most virulent forms will be removed, and the ground, blighted and blasted by its fell power, will be purged from its results, when thorns and thistles will cease their spontaneous growth, and weeds shall no more usurp the soil. In view of such a hope for weary exhausted nature, well may we pray "Thy Kingdom come."

KEPT BACK.

VARRO, a Roman author, said he sent in many directions to find out from men what they thought to be the chief good. He received three hundred and twenty different replies; so many opinions were there in the world as to what was really the chief good to be sought after, and the chief joy to be received. Blessed be God, we are not left to a wild guess upon this subject; but we have in the Bible a positive statement of the fact that the highest good and the gladdest joy of the soul is the service of God. The religion of Jesus Christ is compared in the Bible to the light; but it is brighter than that. It is compared to a rock; but it is firmer than that. And the Lord Jesus Christ, the great central force of that religion is represented as a shepherd; but he is more careful than a shepherd. He is represented as a captain of salvation; but he is braver than any earthly officer. He is represented as the morning star heralding the day; but he is a brighter and more glorious promise to the soul upon which he shines. Now, if all these things are true, why is it that the vast majority of men do not come and receive this Christ and accept this Gospel? There are those who are kept back from the religious life because they feel they are too young to come. They say: "We shall live twenty, or thirty, or forty, or sixty years, and in that long reach of God's mercy there will be plenty of time to attend to these things. Meanwhile let us eat, drink, and be merry." Are you too young to serve God? Yes, if you are too young to receive any mercies at his hand; if you are too young to sit at the table of his bounty; if you are too young to be clothed by his goodness, to be fed by his love, to be sheltered by his benefaction, to be cared for by his loving-kindness—then you are too young. Yet the fact of your youth, instead of being the reason why you should stay away from Christ, is the very reason why you should come. Especial promise is given to you now that will never be given to you again. Besides that, are you not aware of the fact that if you put off the day of grace until the years of your youth have passed, in all probability you put it off forever? Do you not know that if you take up the Church records in any religious organization the world over, you will find that the vast majority of those who find their way into the kingdom of Christ come in their early days? Do you not know that if a man allows twenty-five years of his life to pass without having found the peace and hope of the Gospel, the strong probabilities are—twenty to one, one hundred to one—that he will die in his sins? Do you not know that the day of youth is the especial day of God's mercy; that you cannot, without infinite risk to your soul, adjourn the matter; that it is far easier to come to Christ at five years of age than at ten, at ten than at fifteen, at twenty than at twenty-five; and that if there are obstacles in the way now, they will multiply and augment, until Alps are piled on Alps, and Himalayas on Himalayas, and you will never scale the heights?

THE BACKSLIDERS.

HERE is a man who started for heaven a year ago. He had been given to dissipation; he has looked back. You are drinking too hard. I believe a moderate drinker may get into heaven, but a hard drinker, never! "No drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God." The snake catches the eye of the bird on the limb: it begins to tremble, and soon slips from the tree-branch, and begins to fly down toward the serpent, and soon it is caught in the terrible folds and is gone. The wine-cup has been your fascination. You have by it been brought down from the circles in which you once moved, and come down nearer and nearer to the day of your destruction, and after awhile you will be caught in the coils of that which "biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder." Oh, man give up drinking, or give up heaven! There is your choice. A man stood on the scaffold about to be executed, and the Sheriff, pulling out his watch, said: "You have five minutes to say what you have to say." The dying man said. "Rum ruined me. I had a little brother. I loved him very much. He was a bright-eyed lad. I came home one day intoxicated. My little brother was picking berries in the garden, and for some reason I got mad at him, and I took up an iron rake and with one stroke I killed him. Now I am to die for it, and you ask me what I have to say. It is this: never, never, never touch anything that can intoxicate." Alas, if you start for heaven and look back to your early dissipations!

A DIVINE BEING.

"CHRIST came, who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen." Paul was a reckless man in always telling the whole truth, it mattered not who was hit or what theological system it upset. In this one sentence he makes a world of trouble for Arians and Socinians, and gives a cud for scepticism to chew on for the next thousand years. We must proceed skillfully to twist the passage of Scripture, or we shall have to admit the deity of Jesus Christ. I roll up my sleeves for the work, and begin by saying, perhaps this is a wrong version. No, all the versions agree—Syriac, Ethiopic, Latin, Arabic. Perhaps this word God means a being of great power, but not the Deity. It is God "over all." But perhaps this word God refers to the first person of the Trinity—God the Father. No; it is "Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen." Whichever way I take it, and when I turn it upside down, and when I try to read it in every possible shape, I am compelled to leave it, as those who have gone before me, an incontrovertible proof of the eternal and magnificent Godhead of the Lord Jesus Christ. "Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen."

BRIEF NOTES.

A visit was recently paid by the Shah of Persia to the mission premises of the American missionaries in Teheran. This was the first visit ever paid by the Shah to a private foreign resident.

Dean Lefroy, of Norwich, England, selected one of the poorest parishes of the city, for his own work as district visitor. He was warned that bricks would be hurled at him. To this he replied, "All right: that's the place for me."

According to the American Baptist Year-Book for 1891, the Regular Baptists have in the United States 1,382 associations, 34,780 churches with a membership of 3,164,227, an increase for the year of upward of 94,000 members.

Mr. and Mrs. Maxwell P. Johnstone have resigned their position as managers of the Margaret Strachan Home for the Rescue of Fallen Women in West Twenty-seventh Street, New York, in order to devote themselves to general evangelistic work.

Mr. James Cannon, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Evangelist, begins services on Sunday next at the Bethany M. E. Church, 120th St. and First Avenue, New York, of which Rev. G. M. Compton is pastor. His services at the Woodstock Church have been very successful. The pastor has been sick, and Mr. Cannon filled the pulpit for him.

Rev. Arthur Crane has been conducting Union Revival services at Great Falls, N. H. The four churches of the town united in the work, and it is estimated that nearly one hundred souls were brought to Christ by the services. Mr. Crane is now holding meetings at Hampton Falls, and Seabrook, N. H.

Dr. Frank Deems, son of Dr. Charles F. Deems, pastor of the Church of the Strangers, New York, has entered the lecture field. His lecture on "Two Years and a-half with Edison," illustrated by the stereopticon and bright with anecdotes of his personal relations with the great electrician, delighted a large audience here a few evenings ago.

Rev. C. H. Yatman is holding a very successful series of union meetings in Findlay, O. No church can hold the crowds, and the city has never had such an awakening. The evangelist works with exhaustless zeal and power, and has glorious results. Mrs. Kress, of New York, accompanied by her mother, is singing for him. From here, Mr. Yatman goes to Pueblo, Colo.

During the past week the Church has suffered the loss of many eminent men. Among them were Dr. Luther H. Gulick, for nearly forty years a missionary in Micronesia; Dr. Edward Prime, for many years the assistant-editor of the Observer, of which his brother Dr. S. Irenæus Prime was the editor; and Dr. Edmund de Presensee, the famous French Evangelical preacher, and the author of The Life of Christ, and other valuable works.

Efforts are being made to rebuild the American College at Aintab, Turkey, which was recently destroyed by fire. The United States Consul at Beyroot says that the loss of the college is severely felt, as there were many gratis students and a large number who partially paid their expenses. All these and others who paid full fees deplore the loss of the educational aid which the institution afforded.

The value of the influence of prominent men who use it on behalf of Christ's cause cannot be overestimated. A case in point is the excellent work General O. O. Howard is doing in New York since he has been in command of the military district. On a recent Sunday he addressed a large audience of young men illustrating his Gospel talk with incidents of his army experience. The effect of the veteran's address will never be forgotten.

Mr. E. P. Telford closed his meetings at Troy, Pa., on April 2nd. They have been signally blessed in the conversion of souls. The Baptist, Presbyterian and Methodist Churches united in the movement, one week being spent by the evangelist at each church. On Sundays he preached three times, once in each church. The whole town was stirred, and the majority of the tradesmen closed their stores every night two hours earlier than usual, to give their employees an opportunity of attending the services. Mr. Telford is now laboring at Providence, R. I., with two Baptist and one Methodist Church.

Mr. Arthur J. Smith, who has been associated with Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman in his work in Bethany Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, has just resigned his position that he may give all his time to the work of an evangelist. Mr. Smith has been associated with many of the prominent workers of the country, and is therefore prepared by his experience to do good work in the churches, where he may be called to labor. He leaves Bethany with the heartiest commendations of Dr. Chapman, Postmaster-General Wanamaker, and the session of the church. He is open to engagements. His address for the present will be care of Bethany Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The April Elections—Senator Edmunds' Retirement—The Anglo-Indian Revolt—An Inventors' Congress—What Wrecked the Galena—General Notes.

N Some States the April Elections have not been without surprises. In Ohio, many of the cities went republican; but the Democrats made gains in the State. Senator Sherman's home in Mansfield County went republican, and the home of Senator-elect Brice in Lima, democratic. Illinois also showed considerable gains for the Democrats. In Kansas, the new political factor, the Farmers' Alliance, made a much poorer showing than was expected. The Democrats made gains in many counties. In the rural districts, the wives of Alliance candidates went among the voters, stirring up their enthusiasm. In Kansas City, ladies went to the polls, cast their ballots, and then stepped into carriages and returned home, riding in the same hack with colored women. In Missouri, Texas and Colorado, the result was not significant. Republicans made gains in California, and Democrats in Wisconsin and Minnesota. Michigan and Nebraska went republican, although in many cities the Democrats made large gains. At the "bye elections" in Rhode Island, the Republicans generally were victorious. Party leaders fail to attach any special importance to these elections this year. A call has been issued for a National Convention of the "Third Party," composed of Nationalists, Labor Unionists, Alliance Men and Farmers, to meet at Cincinnati on May 19.

The Threatening Attitude of Russia is Again giving rise to uneasiness in Europe and a great war seems certain in the near future. The Czar's troops are concentrated in vast strength at various points along the Galician frontier, and Austria has hurried large bodies of troops forward to strengthen her vulnerable posts at Tarnopol and Brody. Germany, too, is preparing her frontier fortresses, east and west, in apparent anticipation of an approaching struggle, with the double purpose of checking a Russian invasion, and a simultaneous movement on the part of France. Kaiser Wilhelm, however, does not let the war furore interfere with his pleasures, for he is about to go on a shooting trip in the northern provinces. One evidence of Russia's determination to assume the aggressive, is the part she is about to play in Africa. She has fitted out an expedition under the command of Lieutenant Mashkoff, a most determined soldier, which is now ready to start for Abyssinia. With the co-operation of King Menelek, it will endeavor to reach the great lakes by some hitherto unexplored route. Notice has been given that any interference by Italy, which now has an expeditionary force in that territory, will be considered an act of war.

The Revolt Against British Rule in India threatens to be much more widespread than was at first anticipated. A letter has been received from the chief of the Manipuris in the Punjab, admitting the killing of Commissioner Quinton and his party and justifying it on the ground that the British troops attacked his palace, massacred his soldiers and their women and children, threw living women and babes into the fire. This charge is indignantly denied. News has been received that a detachment sent against the Haku-Chins, another warlike hill tribe in Northern India, has been slaughtered to a man, having been ambushed and massacred. Late telegrams announce the defeat of a strong force of Manipuris by the Anglo-Indian troops.

The International Flurry over the Action of the Italian government in recalling Baron Fava has wholly subsided, and there is no longer any talk of the probability of war, as there was a week ago. Marquis Rudini, King Humbert's Premier, has assured our government that he never intended to convey the request that the

New Orleans lynchers should be punished in advance of a trial, and Secretary Blaine has replied, giving reciprocal assurances of protection to Italian interests. Baron Fava, although still quite ill from nervous prostration, has started for Italy. The Roman newspapers and the Italian press in this country have adopted a milder tone, and regard President Harrison's latest communication to King Humbert as conciliatory. The only disturbing element now seems to be the Mafia itself, whose members in different parts of the country are making threats of vengeance against the lynchers. They are being closely watched by the police in New Orleans and Chicago, where the order seems to be stronger than elsewhere.

Three High Canadian Officials have been Visit-ing Washington during the past week on a mission which, had it been successful, would have foreshadowed closer commercial relations between this country and the Dominion. They are Sir Chas. Tupper, Sir John Thompson, Minister of Finance, and Mr. Foster, Minister of Marine, and they came to confer with the President and Secretary Blaine concerning reciprocity.

They have returned to Canada very much chagrined over the ill-success of their mission, which is currently reported to have been a failure. They came, it is said, with authority from Sir John Macdonald, the Dominion Premier, to arrange for a Treaty, and they were surprised to find that the United States government could not recognize their authority to take any steps in a matter, which should be negotiated through the imperial government of England. The Canadian Liberals are greatly rejoiced over the failure of the mission. Sir Charles Tupper, (whose portrait is given in this column), and who acted as High Commissioner, is next to Sir John himself, the strongest Conservative in Canada. He is a native of Nova Scotia and is about seventy years of age. He has held many notable offices under the Dominion government and, during the recent campaign, was a leading organizer and one of the most active adherents of the government party. Still another Commissioner who has met with disappointment is the Hon. Robert Bond (see portrait below), who framed the Reciprocity Convention between Newfoundland and the United States, which has recently been repudiated by that Colony, as worthless to its fishery interests. Mr. Bond is the lieutenant of the Premier of Newfoundland, Sir William V. Whiteway, and has been so outspoken in his antagonism to England that he was omitted from the list of delegates who visited that country to protest against the Knutsford bill, the terms of which were recently explained in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A National Congress of Inventors was in session in Music Hall, Washington, for several days during the past week. Among the well-known inventors in attendance were Edison, Bell, Westinghouse, and Gatling. President Harrison, Postmaster-General Wanamaker and other Government officials occupied seats on the stage, and about four hundred inventors and manufacturers from all parts of the country filled the house. Many interesting papers were read and a permanent organization was formed, to be known as "The American Association of Inventors and Manufacturers," having for its object the advancement of industrial inventions and the improvement and enlargement of the American Patent system. The occasion of the Congress was the celebration of the second century of our patent system.

In the Retirement of Hon. George F. Ed-munds of Vermont, from the United States Senate, that body loses a member who has for many years been a leading figure in matters of national legislation. In his letter of retirement addressed to Governor Page, of Vermont, Mr. Edmunds states that personal considerations alone urge him to the step. He was born in Richmond, Vt., in 1828, and studied law at Burlington. At 26, he entered politics, serving five years in the State Legislature, three of them in the Speaker's chair. He was elected to the United States Senate in 1866, and took a leading part in the great debates on reconstruction and other important issues arising out of the civil war. In 1877 he was a member of the Electoral Commission, which seated President Hayes. As Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, he framed many of the leading measures passed by Congress during the last fifteen years. A portrait of Mr. Edmunds is given above. It is stated that Secretary of War Proctor will be a candidate for the vacancy.

So Many Counterfeit Two-Dollar Notes are in circulation that the United States Treasury has decided to call in all those of that denomination bearing the portrait of General Hancock, and to issue instead notes with the portrait of the late Secretary Windom. None of the old series will be reissued. It is probable that the use of the distinctive paper hitherto used in making these notes will be discontinued.

By a Vote of Three to One, the New York Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church has decided that women shall not be allowed to represent their sex in the General Conference or the Electoral Conferences. The discussion on this most interesting question took place at Yonkers last week, and a majority of the 200 members present had something to say on the subject. The galleries were crowded with women, who listened intently to the arguments and evinced pleasure at the eloquence of their champions. It would take a page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to recapitulate the reasons adduced on either side, during the debate.

A Moral Lesson may very Well be Drawn from the testimony of Commander Bicknell of the United States ship Galena, at the official inquiry into the recent loss of the vessel off Block Island Light. The Commander stated that the usual precaution had not been taken of ascertaining before sailing the exact deviation of the Galena's compass. The compass of the tug Nina, which accompanied the Galena, was taken as the standard and it proved to deviate one point westerly. That single point of deviation was fatal for it wrecked the gallant warship and well nigh sacrificed nearly a hundred lives.

The Movement to Consolidate into One Great metropolis under a single municipal government, the cities of New York and Brooklyn, and to include the counties of New York, Kings, Queens, Suffolk, Richmond and Westchester, is making rapid headway. A Consolidation Commission is now at work on a charter for the proposed new city, and it will be sent to the State Legislature, when completed. The consolidation would give New York a population of very nearly three millions, and would make it the second city in the world numerically, and perhaps the first in actual territorial dimensions. Economic reasons urge the union, but there is much opposition in the rural districts, which are proposed to be merged with the greater city, and it is difficult to foreshadow the fate of the measure in the Legislature.

BETWEEN THE APPEARINGS.

A NEW SERMON PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

The Links Between Heaven and Earth—The Respective Objects of the Two Appearings—I. Once and no Second—The End Accomplished by Jesus at his First Advent—The Putting Away of Sin—Done Effectually—No Ground for the Larger Hope—II. The Second Appearing—Open and Visible—Without Sin—Will Find None in His People—Will Appear to Those Who Look for Him.

"Now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself, . . . and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation." Hebrews 9 : 26-28.

THE two great links between earth and heaven are the two advents of our Lord: or, rather, he is the great bond of union, by these two appearances. When the world had revolted, and God had been defied by his own creatures, a great gulf was opened between God and man. The first coming of Christ was like a bridge which crossed the chasm and made a way of access from God to man, and then from man to God. Our Lord's second advent will make that bridge far broader, until heaven shall come down to earth, and ultimately earth shall go up to heaven. Jesus is seen as opening the door which none can shut, by means of which the Lord is beheld as truly Emmanuel, God with us.

Here, too, is the place for us to build a grand suspension bridge, by which, through faith, we ourselves may cross from this side to the other of the stormy river of time. The cross at whose feet we stand, is the massive column which supports the structure on this side; and as we look forward to the glory,

The Second Advent

of our Lord is the solid support on the other side of the deep gulf of time. By faith we first look to Jesus, and then look for Jesus; and herein is the life of our spirits. Christ on the cross of shame, and Christ on the throne of glory, we dwell between these two boundaries: these are our Dan and Beersheba, and all between is holy ground. As for our Lord's first coming, there lies our rest: the once-offered Sacrifice hath put away our sin, and made our peace with God. As for his second coming, there lies our hope, our joy; for we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is.

I want, at this time, to bring before you those two appearances of our Lord. The text says, "He hath appeared; and again, 'He shall appear.'" The twenty-sixth verse speaks of his unique manifestation already accomplished, and the twenty-eighth verse promises the glorious second outshining, as it promises, "He shall appear." Between these two lights—"he hath appeared" and "he shall appear"—we shall sail safely, if the Holy Spirit will direct our way.

I. Our first theme is

Once, and no Second.

"Now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." This he has done once, and he will never repeat it. Let us dwell on the subject in detail. Our Lord Jesus Christ has once appeared, and though he will appear again, it will not be for the same purpose. On his first appearing fix your thoughts; for the like of it will never be seen again. I know of no appearance that could have been more complete, more unreserved. He moved in the midst of crowds, he spake to men and women one by one. He was on the mountain, and by the sea; he was in the desert, and by the river; he was both in house and in temple; he was everywhere accessible; in the fullest sense "once in the end of the world hath he appeared." Oh, the glory of this gracious epiphany! This is the greatest event in history: the invisible God has appeared in human form.

The text tells us very precisely that in this first coming of our Lord he appeared to put away sin. Notice that fact. By his coming and sacrifice he accomplished many things; but his first end and object was "to put away sin." You know what the modern babblers say: they declare that he appeared to reveal to us the goodness and love of God. This is true; but it is only the fringe of the whole truth. The fact is, that he revealed God's love in the provision of a sacrifice to put away sin. Then, they say that he appeared to exhibit perfect manhood, and to let us see what our nature ought to be. Here also is a truth; but it is only part of the sacred design. He appeared, say they, to manifest self-sacrifice, and to set us an example of love to others. By his self-denial he trampled on the selfish passions of man. We deny none of these things: and yet we are indignant at the way in which the less is made to hide the greater. The great was not to live, but to die. He hath appeared not so much to subdue sin by his teaching, as to put it away by the sacrifice of himself. The master purpose which dominated all that our Lord did, was not to manifest goodness, nor to perfect an example, but to put away sin by sacrifice.

Do not let us think of Jesus without remembering the design of his coming. I pray you, brethren, know not Christ without his cross, as some pretend to know him. We preach Christ; so do a great many more: but, "we preach Christ crucified"; so do not so many more. We preach concerning our Lord, his cross, his blood, his death; and upon the blood of his cross we lay great stress, extolling much "the precious blood of Christ as of a lamb without blemish and without spot." We know no past appearing of God in human flesh except that which ended with a sacrifice to put away sin.

Let us go a step further with our text: once only does the Lord appear for the purpose of putting away sin. He came once to do it, and he has done it so well that there is no need for him to offer any further sacrifice. "This man, after that he had offered one sacrifice for sins, for ever sat down." He will never appear a second time for the putting away of sin. It was his purpose once; but he has so fulfilled it that it will never be his purpose again. He has so put away sin by the sacrifice of himself that he will never need to offer a second sacrifice.

No Larger Hope.

If any of you here are entertaining some "larger hope," I would say to you—Hope what you please; but remember, that hope without truth at the bottom of it, is an anchor without a holdfast. A groundless hope is a mere delusion. Wish what you will; but wishes without promises from God to back them, are vain imaginings. Why should you imagine or wish for another method of salvation? Rest you assured that the Lord God thinks so highly of the one sacrifice for sin, that for you to desire another is evil in his sight. If you reject the one sacrifice of the Son of God, there remains no hope for you; nor ought there to be. Jesus did it alone; he did not only seem to do it, but he actually achieved the putting away of sin. He blotted out the handwriting that was against us. He finished transgression and made an end of sin; and brought in everlasting righteousness when he died upon the cross.

I do not need, I hope, to linger here to warn you that it is of no use to expect that God will put away sin in any other way than that which at so great a cost he has provided. If sin could have been removed in any other way than by the death of his dear Son, Jesus would not have died. If there had been within the range of supposition any method of pardon except by the sacrifice of himself, depend upon it Jesus would never have bowed his head to death. The great Father would never have inflicted death upon the perfect One if it had been possible that the cup should pass from him. He could never have inflicted upon his Beloved a superfluous pain. His death was needful; but, blessed be God, having been once endured, it has once for all put away sin, and hence it will never be endured again.

II. We come now to look at the rest of the text. Once, and no second;

And Yet a Second.

"He shall appear a second time." Yes, Christ Jesus shall appear a second time; but not a second time for the same purpose as before. He will appear. The appearing will be of the most open character. He will not be visible in some quiet place where two or three are met, but he will appear as the lightning is seen in the heavens. At his first appearing he was truly seen: wherever he went he could be looked at and gazed upon, and touched and handled. He will appear quite as plainly by-and-by, among the sons of men. The observation of him will be far more general than at his first advent; for "every eye shall see him." Every eye did not see him here when he came the first time, for he did not travel out of Palestine, save only when, as an infant all unknown, he was carried down into Egypt. But when he comes a second time all the nations of the world shall behold him. They that are dead shall rise to see him, both saints and sinners; and they that are alive and remain when he shall come shall be absorbed in this greatest of spectacles.

His second appearing will be without sin. That is to say, he will bring no sin-offering with him, and will not himself be a sacrifice for sin. What need that it should be so? We have seen that he once offered himself without spot to God, and therefore, his present relation to human guilt will finally cease. He will come, moreover, without those sicknesses and infirmities which arise out of sin. At his first advent he came in suffering flesh, and then he came to hunger and to thirst, to be without a place whereon to lay his head; he came to have his heart broken with reproach, and his soul grieved with the hardness of men's hearts. He was compassed with infirmity; he came unto his God with strong crying and tears; he agonized even unto bloody sweat; and so he journeyed on with all the insignia of sin hanging about him. But when he comes a second time it will be without the weakness, pain, poverty, and shame which accompany sin. There will then be no marred visage nor bleeding brow. He will have re-assumed his ancient glory. It will be his glorious appearing.

When He Comes a Second Time,

Then the text adds: "He shall appear without sin unto salvation." What does that mean? It means that he will then display the perfect salvation of all those who put their trust in him. He will come to celebrate the great victory of mercy over sin. At his coming he will set his foot upon the dragon's head, and bruise Satan under our feet. He will come to have all his enemies put under his feet. To-day we fight, and he fights in us.

Life from the Dead.

But the resurrection is the salvation principally intended here. Alas, what evil sin hath done! How many of our best beloved lie rotting beneath the clay! The worms are feeding on those whose voices were the music of our lives. The scythe of death has cut them down like grass; they lie together in rows in yonder cemetery. Who slew all these? The sting of death is sin. But when our Lord cometh, who is the resurrection and the life, from beds of dust and silent clay our dead men shall rise; they shall leap up into immortality. "Thy brother shall rise again." Thy children shall come again from the land of their captivity. No aching hands and weary brows then; but we shall be raised in power. Our vile body shall be changed, and made like unto his glorious body. Though sown in corruption, our body shall be raised in incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality. What a glorious prospect lies before us in connection with the day of his appearing a second time unto salvation!

Now notice that this appearing and this salvation will chiefly belong to those who look for him. Will you bear with me patiently a minute or two here? I wonder how many there are in the Tabernacle who are looking for him. The text says, "Unto them that look for him shall he appear a second time without sin unto salvation." Beloved, I will put the question again: How many here are looking for our Lord's second coming? I am afraid if conscience hath her perfect work many will have to say, "I am afraid I am not among the number." I will tell you what it is to look for that second appearing. It is to love the Lord Jesus, to love him so that you long for him as a bride longeth for her husband. Why are his chariots so long in coming? Come quickly, Lord Jesus? Strong love hates separation, it pines for union. It cries, "Come, Lord! Come, Lord!" Longing follows on the heels of loving.

Preparing for Him.

To look for his coming is to prepare for him. If I were asked to visit you to-morrow evening, I am sure you would make some preparations for my call—even for one so common-place as myself. You would prepare, because you would welcome me. If you expected the Queen to call, how excited you would be! What preparation good housewives would make for a royal visitor! When we expect our Lord to come, we shall be concerned to have everything ready for him. I sometimes see the great gates open in front of the larger houses in the suburbs; and it means that they are expecting company. Keep the great gates of your soul always open, expecting your Lord to come. It is idle to talk about looking for his coming if we never set our house in order, and never put ourselves in readiness for his reception. Looking for him means that you stand in a waiting attitude, as a servant who expects his master to be at the door presently. If you look for his appearing you will be found in an attitude of one who waits and watches, that when his Lord cometh he may meet him with joy. Christ is coming, I must not sin: Christ is coming, I must not be rooted to the world.

The Tired Ones.

My friend Mr. Govett, in his Commentary on my text, reminds us of the story of Moses, when God told him to take seventy men up the hill with him. We read of these honored men, that "they saw God, and did eat and drink." What a privilege! They were all the Lord's guests. As Moses went up to God into the thick darkness, he said to them, "Tarry ye here until we come again unto you." Moses was gone for forty days, and how many waited for him? I do not know when they began to slip down from the hill, or whether they went one by one, or in groups; but when Moses returned not a soul of them was left, save Joshua, whom Moses had taken up with him to still higher ground. The seventy had gone down among the people, and probably spread that unbelief among them which led to the making of the golden calf. None can do so much mischief as those who have been with God, but cannot wait for the glorious appearing.

You tell me Moses was gone a long time—well-nigh six weeks. Yes, and that is why many cannot wait for the Lord now, because the delay is so long: it is nearly nineteen hundred years since he went away. True, four thousand years rolled away before he came the first time, but two thousand quite wear out the watchers for his second coming. Men cannot wait, and therefore go down to the world and help to fashion its idols. Only here and there do we see a Joshua who will abide in his place till his leader appears.

As to watching, this is rarer than waiting. The fact is, even the better sort of believers who wait for his coming, as all the ten virgins did, nevertheless do not watch. Even the best sort of the waiters slumbered and slept. You are waiting, but you are sleeping! This is a mournful business. A man who is asleep cannot be said to look; and yet it is "unto them that look for him" that the Lord comes with salvation. We must be wide-awake to look.

We ought to go up to the watch-tower every morning, and look toward the sun-rising, to see whether he is coming. Surely our last act at night should be to look out for his star, and say, "Is he coming?" It ought to be a daily disappointment when our Lord does not come; instead of being, as I fear it is, a kind of foregone conclusion that he will not come just yet.

The Two Clouds.

Many professing Christians forget Christ's second coming altogether; others drop a smile when we speak about it, as though it belonged only to fanatics and dreamers. But ye, beloved, I trust are not of that kind. As ye believe really in the first coming and the one great sacrifice, so believe really in the second coming without a sin-offering unto the climax of your salvation. Standing between the cross and the crown, between the cloud that received him out of our sight, and the clouds with which he will come with ten thousands of his saints to judge the quick and the dead, let us live as men who are not of this world, strangers in this age which darkly lies between two bright appearances, happy beings saved by a mystery accomplished, and soon to be glorified by another mystery which is hastening on.

Now all this must be strange talk to some of you. I wish it would alarm those of you who once made a profession of true religion, and have gone back to the world's falsehood. How will you face him, you backsliders, in that day when he shall appear, and all else shall vanish in the blaze of his light, as stars when the sun shines out? What will you do when your treachery shall be made clear to your consciences by his appearing? What will you do, who have sold your Master, and given up your Lord, who was and is, your only hope for the putting away of your sins? Oh! I pray you, as you love yourselves, go to him as he appears in his first coming; and then, washed in his blood, go forward to meet him in his second coming for salvation. God bless you, and by his Son and Spirit make you ready for that great day which cometh on apace!

VISIT TO A PRINCESS.

IN a letter to the valuable periodical, The Missionary Link, Mrs. Bacon writes:—"Bhopal, a city in a native state which I have visited, is governed by a Hindu princess, called the 'Begum of Bhopal.' Though subject to the British Government, her position is hereditary, passing in regular succession from mother to daughter. This Begum has been married twice. During her first husband's life, she used to go among her people, and even visit other cities, but she married a second time a very strict Mohammedan, who shut her up in her palace, and for many years she has not been seen outside. Within a year the second husband has also died, and the people think and hope that she will come out among them again."

"In this city there has never been a missionary, and only three European families live there, who do not come to win souls, but to make money. I was fortunate enough to secure an interview with the Begum, and think it was owing to my saying I was an American. I doubt if her Majesty had ever seen any one from that far-away land."

"The Begum was seated in an alcove of an inner room, dressed in a pair of tight red trousers, with a band of gold around the ankle; without shoes or stockings, and a flowered sari thrown around her. She was most gracious, asking me all manner of questions about my country, and about myself, even to my age. An attendant at her command brought a bottle of exquisite perfume to pour upon my handkerchief, and she also gave me sachets of sweet spices. She told me she would send one of her elephants for me to ride on, to visit her favorite garden."

"The visit was most interesting and Oriental, yet the one subject nearest my heart, the one message I came to India to give, I was requested by her chief minister not to speak of, and it made me sad."

The Permanence of Christ's Words.*

ALTHOUGH no magic was impressed on the syllables which flowed from the lips of the Redeemer to arrest their natural passing away, still it is true and certain that they have not passed away and cannot pass away while the world stands. For one thing they have not passed away in this sense—that when they were spoken, the simple narrative of the Evangelists took and perpetuated them; and in these four Gospels we have the words of Christ preserved. But it is a little thing to say that Christ's words were perpetuated on paper. We should not set much store by the fact that upon printed pages by millions and millions the words of our Redeemer, have outlived the storms and the wear of ages; we should not mind much about that if it stood by itself; but we take it with this, that these words are so marvellously adapted to the needs of our immortal nature that those who have once felt their power, would feel it was parting with life to part with them. Earthquakes, deluges might sweep this world; but you must unpeople it before the words of Christ could pass away from it. Though the last Bible perish, as perish it may in the wreck and ruin of this world, though the blessed words of Jesus were to do what they never can—fade away utterly from the remembrance of the glorified soul; even then these words would live on in the effects they had produced. They would live and last in heaven in the souls they had brought there; in their justification before God, in the purity of their renewed natures, in their changeless and never-ending peace.

What Self-Sacrifice Means.

A man is distinguished from an animal by the fact that he is able to regard his nature as a whole, and to gather up its passing experiences into the unity of a consistent life. But he is also, and still more strikingly, distinguished by the fact that he can live in the lives of others. He may so identify himself with others as to make their lives his own, and unless he does this he is not really human. It is only as our individual, narrow, exclusive, isolated self, is developed into a larger inclusive, sympathetic self, that we come to our highest life. The capacity of love and self-sacrifice is the capacity to make the happiness of others my own, and to identify my life with an ever-widening sphere of life beyond myself. As a rule, this capacity is called forth in early life; and when once it has been brought into exercise it should grow with our growth and strengthen with our strength. The self-denial then, which Christ requires of us is not self-destruction, but self-completion,—self-perfection; it is not self-mutilation but self-development; it is not self-neglect, but self-fulfilment. It will bring us gradually to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ. It does not ignore any of the various elements of our nature, but it enables them all to work together harmoniously for the perfecting of the whole man. He who has learned the lesson of self-sacrifice is so changed from what he was before he learned it, that he may emphatically be called a new creature, and yet he is not less a man than formerly; rather we should say it is he and such as he alone who deserve that exalted title.

The Alabaster Box.

Here is a woman—probably a poor woman—doing an act which excites the indignation of the whole Church. Not a voice is heard in her favor except—sublime exception!—the voice of Jesus. In such circumstances there must be something worth looking at. A minority which God approves must not be overlooked with heedlessness and contempt. The wisdom in this case is with the few and the folly with the many. The wisdom is with love, not policy; with gratitude, not calculation. The points of special interest are these: (I.) The all-surrendering generosity of love. The woman had an alabaster box of very precious ointment—only one box—and that solitary box she broke and poured its pure nard on the only human head that had not lost its crown. Love never puts its own name upon anything. Love has some object—must have some object—on whose shrine it lays its every possession. Love, warm, intelligent, growing love, keeps back nothing from God. (II.) The moral blindness of a prudential policy in the service of Christ. There are men who can never take other than an arithmetical view of things. They are the keen economists of the Church; they get near enough to Christ to ascertain the texture of his garments and to calculate the value of his seamless vesture. There is a point of criticism here most singularly suggestive. The same word in the original is used to signify both waste and perdition; and if we connect this idea with another, we shall apprehend the idea I wish to present. "Those that thou gavest me I have kept, and none of them is lost but the son of perdition," and this very son of perdition was the man, who, on another occasion, and probably on this, called a sacrifice "waste," and vehemently maintained the claims of the poor. Then there is the startling fact before us that the men who denominate other people's service "waste," are themselves the most likely to be cast away as the refuse of the universe.

A NOVEL PROPOSAL OF MARRIAGE.

A REMARKABLE incident significant of the social conditions which obstruct the work of the missionaries in heathen lands is narrated in a letter to the Church at Home and Abroad from the Rev. A. C. Good, who is laboring in Africa. It indicates a view of the marriage relation which prevails among peoples who have not been brought under the elevating influences of Christianity. Mr. Good says:

"The condition of society among these down river people is something terrible. Immorality is fearfully prevalent, so that a large part of the population live by it. The lot of woman is hard indeed. Here, more than anywhere else in this country, she is bought and sold, married and unmarried, without any regard to her own preferences. Once married into a family, that is, once they have paid for her, she belongs to that family. If her first husband dies, she must marry some other man in the family. If she declines the man, who offers to marry her, then she has committed a heinous crime called here "hating her husband," the punishment for which is usually death.

"In one of the towns we visited, a woman came to us and said she was to be killed, and declaring that she was innocent of any offence. We inquired into the matter, and were told that she was not to be killed, she was only to have her nose and ears cut off, and that she deserved it, for she had 'hated her husband.' On further inquiry we found that this was her offence: She had been married into a small family and all its male members had died, except one small boy, her husband being the last." As there was no one left to marry her, she desired to return to her own people or to marry into some other family; but no; the decayed family were not to lose their money in that way.

"An old woman, the head of the family now that all the men were dead said, 'you shall marry me; I will be your husband,' i.e., 'you shall serve and obey me, which is the prominent idea in marriage here. Naturally the widow declined, and so the charge was brought against her that she 'hated her husband.'"

LONDON-PARIS.

The Opening of the New Telephone Between the English and French Capitals.

(See Illustration.)

A NOTABLE advance in the facilities for international communication has just been made in the line which now connects the capitals of England and France by telephone. The completion of the line has been a work of considerable difficulty, owing to the stormy nature of the narrow channel which separates the two countries. The obstacles have, however, been overcome, and now statesmen, merchants and private citizens, can hold converse with each other by word of mouth, though three hundred and thirty miles apart. The official inauguration of the line took place on March 18, when the Prince of Wales in London held a conversation with M. Carnot, the President of the French Republic, in Paris. The conversation was in French, and the two gentlemen were mutually congratulatory. An exchange of congratulations then passed between Mr. Raikes, the English Postmaster-General, and M. Jules Roche, the French Minister of Commerce, Industries, and Posts and Telegraphs. They also spoke in the French language. At the Paris Central Telegraph Station, Lord Lytton, the English ambassador, Madame Roche, M. Reinach, and M. de Selves were present with M. Roche.

As the telegraphs and telephones in England are controlled by the government and form a department of the Post Office, the central station in London is in the Post Office building which was suitably decorated in honor of the occasion. A large board covered with red cloth stood against the wall of the room. Above it the English national flag was entwined with the Tricolor and beneath were the words, "London—Paris." Six transmitters of different kinds were fixed below for experimental use. These will be tested for a time and the best will be finally adopted. So far, the London people prefer the Gower-Bell instrument while the French officials have pronounced in favor of the Ader. Our illustration represents the scene in the London office on the inauguration day.

THE BLIND SINGING EVANGELISTS.

Mr. and Mrs. William V. Baker Singing the Songs of Zion.

(See Portrait.)

VERY pathetic and very significant is the story of the two evangelists whose portraits are here given. In their physical darkness they not only enjoy spiritual light, but God has used them in enlightening others. Under an affliction which might naturally have caused deep depression of soul, they have gone from place to place singing joyous melodies and cheering the hearts of others. Their lives are a conspicuous proof of what God's grace can do in enabling his afflicted children to rejoice in their lot.

William V. Baker is now fifty-one years of age, and is a native of Luzerne County, Pennsylvania. He lost his sight during a severe illness in infancy. At the age of seven he was admitted to an institution for the blind in Philadelphia, where he gained an education, and where under the guidance of a Christian inmate of the institution he was led to Christ. He remained there twelve years and then, at the age of nineteen, undertook the difficult task of earning a livelihood. His musical talents, and a voice of singular compass and power, were all his capital. At first he sang ballads at concerts and other entertainments, but soon God showed him that his calling was to sing for the Saviour. He commenced his religious work at Ithaca, N. Y., and since that time has visited many States, singing in churches and mission halls with many tokens of the divine blessing.

During one of Mr. Baker's intervals of rest in Philadelphia, he became acquainted with Miss Katie Smith, a lady similarly afflicted and similarly endowed with musical talents. The acquaintance soon ripened into love, and in 1884 they were married. Mrs. Baker now accompanies her husband on the piano and organ in his services, and so enhances their value. Her method shows a phenomenal power of memory for she is able to play any piece, the full score of which has been read to her. Mr. and Mrs. Baker have lately been holding services in New York, and during their visit they delighted a large audience in Dr. Talmage's Church by their beautiful rendering of sacred music.

The Palatine and Coliseum.

On their rounds of sight-seeing the end of which one seems never to reach in Rome, the young ladies plodded along, and Camilla fancied that Margaret in her feverish haste, was trying to crowd out other thoughts, and perhaps to be ready to leave the city abruptly. The Italian girl ventured to remonstrate. "No, my dear," returned Margaret, "I can't rest here.

One forenoon the Gordons came with a cab for Carolyn, and the rest followed in another to the Palatine Hill.

"Shall we need a guide?" asked Goldthorpe, as they passed the gate, and he took his mother and Carolyn, one upon each arm, for the climb.

"I don't think so," replied Margaret. "We can better depend upon Carolyn. She is a little more modest about fixing the exact place where everything happened, than the guides are. How far can you take us back, coz?"

"Oh, to Virgil's story that Evander welcomed Æneas here, long before Romulus."

"Aristocrats have monopolized history," remarked Margaret; "so on this patrician hill, the most of the Roman story was planned, and much of it done."

"I never thought of that before," said Gordon, as he placed for his mother and Carolyn the camp-stools that he had been carrying, and sheltered them with his umbrella from the sun that began to seem warm to the foreigners. The others fluttered down upon bits of marble, and were in talking and listening attitudes.

"The palace of the Cæsars," said Mrs. Gordon; "I suppose the emperors lived here."

"No, mamma," replied Goldthorpe; "at least, not all of them. They had their villas outside of the city. The first of the palaces here was the one that the senators built for Augustus. He was too simple in his habits, and his house too plain to suit them."

"Nero had quite another notion of how to be great," said Margaret. "He spread his Golden House all over the Palatine, and out upon two other of the hills. We have some moderns who try to increase their consequence in a similar manner, heaping about themselves enough to make plenty of poor people comfortable." Goldthorpe and Carolyn looked at her, as if she were setting forth some American, or millennial vagary; so she added, "I suppose Nero was not troubled with any such fancies about the claims of the plebs."

"Some day when Carolyn has quite recovered her powers of locomotion," said Margaret, "she must show us just where Augustus' palace stood. Cataline's villa was near the same place; and Vespasian's palace was built over it. He filled up Augustus' house with dirt, so as to make a foundation for his own."

"How solidly those old Romans built," said Margaret, "on the rock, and of the rock. Their very language was rough. We cut our classical teeth on it; and so we know them better than our next-door neighbors. More patrician blood has been shed here than on any other spot on the planet."

"It is not such a great space, either," said Carolyn; "about ten or twelve hundred feet in area, according to the books."

"Poor zings!" echoed Marie.

"Some day next week," said Margaret, assuming a professional air, "Miss Pelham and Mr. Gordon, reciting on the spot, will give us the exact place where the palaces and temples stood, also, the house of Livia, of Drusus, and of Cicero. We must know where the Triclinium was, where Nero was dining with the imperial family, when his step-brother, Britannicus, fell over dead, after drinking Nero's poison; and where Commodus was drugged and strangled; and where Pertinax was killed after his three month's reign."

"Miss Pelham," ventured Mrs. Gordon, a woe-begone expression wrestling with the hopefulness of her uplifted brows, "allow me to suggest—perhaps you might—eh—isn't there some more cheerful aspect of the place upon which the—eh—the young people might occupy themselves—under the circumstances?"

"I'm afraid, my queen," threw in Camilla, hiding her amusement behind a decorous air, "your chamber of horrors will be a little difficult of restoration."

"If only you Americans wouldn't quite take one's breath away!" said Carolyn.

"Signorina Mattioli." Margaret went on, as if loftily oblivious of comment, "will please be prepared to conduct the party from the entrance of the Crypto-Porticus, to the Fora in front of the palace. We will go with her through the passage with the mosaic floors, and inlaid ceilings, glancing into the private reception-halls as we pass."

Camilla's hands were thrown up in mock despair.

"We'll help you," said Carolyn, falling naturally into the use of the pronoun, first person, plural. "If the thing can be done, we'll do it. But one good turn deserves another. Suppose, cousin, you reproduce for us the trial of St. Paul, before Nero, here on the Palatine."

"A Roland for an Oliver!" cried Goldthorpe, with a delighted laugh, in which his mother joined heartily.

"Did you say, zat St. Paul vas tried here on zis hill?" asked Marie.

"We know that Paul had converts in Cæsar's household," "but we shall have to get the monks to tell us where his own hired house stood."

"Oh, ze monks!" shrugged Marie. "Zey do know everyzing."

After the Palatine came the Coliseum. "Ven vas zis great zing built?" asked Marie.

"In the first century, B. C.," answered Carolyn. "It was built by Vespasian."

"Rome fell into the slough of mammonism," said Margaret, "as our Americans are likely to do. Then came effeminacy, and decay. This is one of the tombstones of human liberty—the birthright sold for a mess of pottage. Ambitious men treating the nation as if it were an unmanageable child, to be amused. 'Bread and the circus' became the cry. So they built this immense circus, where a hundred thousand, more or less, could be entertained at once."

"How hopelessly brutal their religion was!" exclaimed Goldthorpe, raising his umbrella and holding it over the two who were his special care. Carolyn recognized his kindness with a murmured, "Thanks," asking in the next breath, "Was it open to the sky, cousin?"

"No: they had canvas over the top, managed by five thousand sailors who occupied the upper tier of seats. They could draw it over any part, or the whole, as the people needed shelter from sun or rain."

"Vere ze men and ze vomen seated togezzor?" asked Marie.

"O, no;" replied Margaret, "that would not be at all in keeping with heathen customs. The women sat in the next tier below the sailors,—next to the servants, always. The vestal Virgins sat in a lower tier opposite the emperor—the heathenish premium on celibacy. The citizens, knights, and senators, were in tiers below the women. There were fountains scattered about through the different rows of seats, and also eating places."

"And the beasts," suggested Goldthorpe.

"They were kept in dens on the Celian Hill, and driven down here through dark passages with torches of lighted tow. They were brought down the day before the fight, and kept in cages, under there," pointing with her parasol.

"In those little rooms under the arena?" asked Camilla.

"No," replied Margaret, "the gladiators were in them. If you don't mind the walk, Carolyn, we can see the stone partitions down there, and the very grooves in which the elevators ran, to bring the men upon the arena."

"Ah, my queen!" said Camilla with the Italian love of pictures, on canvas or wall, in marble, or words, "why can't you reproduce a gladiatorial play for us?"

"Really, Miss Pelham," said Mr. Gordon, "I do not think we would mind the—eh—the horribleness of it, at all, if you would be so kind."

"Well, I'll try, though it may be like a twice-told tale. To begin, we'll place it in the first century, A. D. The legions have had a most successful campaign. Thousands have been killed, and to pacify their souls there must be a large number sent after them into Tartarus. An order has been sent to the Gladiatorial School. The gladiators have arrived, and are ready in the little rooms down there under the arena."

"Those same little rooms!" exclaimed Camilla. "Poor fellows! And some of them were princes and generals, before the Romans captured them, and put them in school to learn to fight and die for their pleasure."

"The other day when I was here alone," said Margaret, "I saw some pieces of stone up there in one of the recesses, with figures cut on them by gladiators who were waiting for their turn to come to fight."

"Ze Romans were very cruel," said Marie, with a little shudder.

"The gladiators were trained to die, Margaret went on. "When one of them had another at his mercy, he looked up for a sign from the chief Vestal Virgin. She took a quick vote of the spectators. If the majority thought the prostrate man had not shown spirit enough, and so deserved to die, she held her hand down, and he was dispatched at once. If the majority thought he had made a brave fight, and must be saved to die for their delectation some other day, she held up her hand, and he was spared. If he had to die, he took a graceful attitude, throwing out his neck, so as to make the flow of blood profuse. That was meant to harden the men who were looking on, with the sight of human gore."

"They were a beastly lot," exclaimed Gordon, "absolutely brutal!"

"Our prizefighting is but little better," said Margaret. "The Romans ruled by muscle. They made themselves magnificent animals at the expense of every better trait."

"Our games move a little slowly," said Carolyn, who looked upon her cousin's philosophizing as a sign of great cleverness, though she never aspired to comprehend it fully.

"The emperors themselves took part in the games, did they not?" asked Goldthorpe.

"Commodus, the brutal son of the great Marcus Aurelius, took a regular course of gladiatorial training, and even a gladiator's pay. He used to shoot the heads off ostriches, that would run on, leaving their heads behind them."

"Unlike that saint over the door of the cathedral in Paris," said Camilla. "He carries his head in his hand."

"Commodus fought seven hundred and thirty-five times without receiving a wound," continued Margaret. "He killed a hundred lions, one after another, piercing the brain, just as they leaped upon the arena."

"Leaped upon the arena?" said Carolyn, "I thought they were kept down under there."

"So they were—in the dark, and without food. When the trumpet sounded, a bar was drawn, and the elevators came up through the trap doors bringing a hundred men upon the arena. At the same instant another bar opened all the cages, and the beasts leaped up the incline upon the stage. Now Commodus stood back of them, and shot the lions on the leap. When beasts and men were supposed to be killed, the trumpet sounded, and slaves with hot irons sprang out of those places that you see around the lower tier of seats. If the gladiators flinched under the hot irons, the Plutonians made an end of them. Then they were dragged over to the drawbridge in front of

The way in which Hood's Sarsaparilla builds up people in run down or weakened state of health, conclusively proves the claim that this medicine "makes the weak strong." that arch:—the Gate of Death. It went up with weights, throwing the dead men and beasts into a ditch, while the arena was sanded for the next act. When this place was dedicated the games lasted a hundred days, and five thousand gladiators were killed. During Trajan's hundred and twenty-eight days of games ten thousand were killed."

"God be thanked, Christianity has conquered that beastliness," said Gordon with a deep breath.

"This old place has been a quarry," said Margaret. "Many fine palaces have been built of its stone. It has also been a fortress, a factory, and a sanctuary. There used to be a cross in the centre, and stations all about the circle, sacred to the martyrs who perished here."

"Christians could not have been gladiators," said Camilla, shaking her head dubiously; "and none but trained gladiators were allowed to fight in the imperial arena."

"I know, my dear, but there is proof that in the persecutions of the early centuries many Christians did perish in this place. Many white souls went to God, with this same brilliant sky above them, and these bird songs in their ears."

"Gavazzi used to harangue the people here," said Camilla. "In the terrible struggle for independence, he spoke to sixty thousand here, every day for two months."

"A good use to make of the old ruin," said Goldthorpe, shutting his umbrella, and taking up the stools to follow the ladies, who had risen, and were moving toward the entrance.

It was a bright afternoon that our little party chose for their visit to the burial place of the early Christians. They drove out through Porta Pia; and stopped to look at the place where the breach was made in the wall for an entrance of the army of liberation. About the names on the wall of the fifty men who fell at that time, there were laurel wreaths.

"Did you ever hear who went first through the breach?" asked Goldthorpe. They were sitting in their cabs talking about the great event that was brought about through the efforts of Mazzini, Garibaldi, Cavour, and Victor Immanuel.

"Our people were wild with delight when the soldiers came," said Camilla. "The men marched down that street," pointing toward Via Venti Settembre. "The parliament changed its name in honor of the day. The people wept for joy, embracing the soldiers, bringing them fruit and confectionery, and throwing flowers in their path. They hailed them as deliverers from the papal tyranny."

"But ze first zat vent zrough ze breach?" queried Marie.

"O—ah—yes," replied Goldthorpe. "You see there was a little colporteur in camp—a man that sells Bibles, you know. He had a little cart for his books, and a little donkey that he called Pio Nono. He had been driven out of the city: and so the soldiers put him and his donkey and cart, books and all, first through the breach. They said, 'They do not want the Bible; but the Bible they shall have.'"

All joined in a laughing appreciation of the soldier's joke, and its meaning, except Marie. It was a little beyond her comprehension. "I do not comprehend vy zey banish ze little Bible seller. My fazzer says zat ze Bible is ze best book: and ze count says zat ve vill study it togezer sometime. Zen I vill understand ze joke of ze soldiers."

They drove out toward the church of St. Agnese. "These are all new villas," said Margaret. "If ever, in a fit of extravagance, I put up a house to my mind, I will have an Italian architect. We Anglo-Saxons know nothing of the rhythm of form and color."

"Your Queen Anne houses are fine, I'm told," remarked Carolyn.

"Yes: their crazy-quilt appearance is a rest from our square, white boxes with green blinds, and our red brick ones with white blinds, replied Margaret. "They have an antique look that contrasts charmingly with our newness. Beyond that they suggest nothing more than that one started to build with stone, and went on as long as it lasted, and then fell back on brick: and when that was exhausted, he finished out with boards and shingles. Now that villa," pointing to one at the left, "is a poem, a song. 'I would like to have that house as a home for women who would work for the poor of the city.'"

"And you will some day, my queen," flashed Camilla. "You will some day." "Are you ze prophet like Mazzini?" twittered Marie.

Their cabs drew up at the gate of St. Agnese fuori le Mura; and as soon as they were on their feet, Carolyn began dutifully, "Founded by Constantine, the first Christian emperor, at the request of his daughter Constantia, in honor of the virgin martyr, St. Agnese, buried in the Catacomb here. Innocent VIII., repaired it in 1490."

"Two years before the discovery of America," said Margaret. "That is one of the pins on which I hang those slippery dates. While Columbus—"

"The Italian," threw in Camilla.

"Yes, yes, my dear, while Columbus, the Italian, was trudging about from court to court, trying to get a few dollars with which to rig out his little schooners, Pope Innocent was out here rebuilding this old church of Constantine."

As they passed across the yard to enter the church, the porter pointed them to a window at the right. Shading the glass so that they could look in, they saw a large fresco on the opposite wall. It represented Pius IX. and his cardinals falling through the floor, while St. Peter and the Virgin appeared on the scene, just in time to prevent disagreeable consequences by exerting their benign power over broken planks and beams.

"St. Agnese is one of the primal saints in the calendar," said Carolyn as they entered the church. "She was only twelve or thirteen when she suffered martyrdom."

"I zink I haf read," said Marie, "Zate ze pallium, vich is ze type of ze episcopal dignity of ze pope, is made of wool cut from ze lambs zat are consecrated here."

"Yes;" said Carolyn, "the monks of St. John Lateran send two lambs here to be blessed at this altar. Their wool makes the pallium which is made holy by being kept in the urn of gold in St. Peter's tomb."

"Much ado about nothing," quoted Goldthorpe to Margaret, whose eyes expressed an irreverent amusement at that moment.

"O, I don't know," was the reply, "poor monks are shut away by thousands from honest trades and home life. They have plenty of useless time on their hands. This consecrating of wool may keep them from meddling with matters too high for them,—family and political affairs and the like."

"MY FATHER KNOWETH."

Precious thought, my Father knoweth,
In His love I rest;
For whate'er my Father doeth
Must be always best.
Well I know the heart that planneth
Nought but good for me;
Joy and sorrow interwoven,
Love in all I see.

Precious thought, my Father knoweth,
Careth for His child;
Bids me nestle closer to Him,
When the storms beat wild,
Though my earthly hopes are shattered,
And the teardrops fall,
Yet He is Himself my solace,
Yea, my "all in all."

Sweet to tell Him all He knoweth,
Roll on Him the care,
Cast upon Himself the burden
That I cannot bear,
Then without a care oppressing,
Simply to lie still,
Giving thanks to Him for all things,
Since it is His will.

Oh, to trust Him then more fully!
Just to simply move
In the conscious, calm enjoyment
Of the Father's love,
Knowing that life's checkered pathway
Leadeth to His rest,
Satisfied the way He taketh
Must be always best. —L.W.

A BRILLIANT RELIGION.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON PREACHED IN THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN, LAST SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 19, 1891.

A Difference in Estimates—The Glories of the Crystal—Religion Superior to it in Precision—No Happen-so's in Theology—A Slipshod Universe Maddening—Superior in Transparency—The Astronomer's Use of the Crystal—What it Reveals in the Spiritual Heavens—The Star in the Sky of Trouble—The Rivers and Mountains of Grace—Superior in Beauty—The Symmetry of God's Dealings—Superior in its Transformations—The Stony Heart Changed—The Three Apocalyptic Crystals.

"The crystal cannot equal it." Job 28: 17.

ter worth more than the former, but Job makes an intelligent comparison, looks at religion and then looks at the crystal and pronounces the former as of far superior value to the latter, exclaiming in the words of my text, "the crystal cannot equal it."

Now, it is not a part of my sermon design to depreciate the crystal, whether it be found in Cornish mine or Hartz mountain or Mammoth Cave or tinkling among the pendants of the chandeliers of a palace. The crystal is the star of the mountain; it is the queen of the cave; it is the ear-drop of the hills; it finds its heaven in the diamond. Among all the pages of natural history there is no page more interesting to me than the page crystallographic. But I want to show you that Job was right when taking religion in one hand and the crystal in the other, he declared that the former is of far more value and beauty than the latter, recommending it to all the people and to all the ages, declaring: "The crystal cannot equal it." In the first place I remark that religion is superior to the crystal in exactness. That shapeless mass of crystal against which you accidentally dashed your foot is laid out with more exactness than any earthly city. There are six styles of crystallization and all of them divinely ordained. Every crystal has mathematical precision. God's geometry reaches through it, and it is a square or it is a rectangle or it is a rhomboid or in some way it hath a mathematical figure. Now religion beats that in the simple fact that spiritual accuracy is more beautiful than material accuracy. God's attributes are exact. God's law exact. God's decrees exact. God's management of the world exact. Never counting wrong, though he counts the grass-blades and the stars and the sands and the cycles. His providences never dealing with us perpendicularly when those providences ought to be oblique, nor lateral when they ought to be vertical. Everything in our life arranged without any possibility of mistake. Each life a six-sided prism. Born at the right time; dying at the right time. There are no "happen-so's" in our theology. If I thought this was a slipshod universe I would go crazy. God is not an anarchist. Law, order, symmetry, precision, a perfect square, a perfect rectangle,

ANY of the precious stones of the Bible have come to prompt recognition. But for the present I take up the less valuable crystal. Job, in my text, compares saving wisdom with a specimen of topaz. An infidel chemist or mineralogist would pronounce the lat-a perfect rhomboid, a perfect circle. The edge of God's robe of government never frays out. There are no loose screws in the world's machinery. It did not just happen that Napoleon was attacked with indigestion at Borodino so that he became incompetent for the day. It did not just happen that John Thomas, the missionary, on a heathen island, waiting for an outfit and orders for another missionary tour, received that outfit and those orders in a box that floated ashore, while the ship and the crew that carried the box were never heard of. The barking of F. W. Robertson's dog, he tells us, led to a line of events which brought him from the army into the Christian ministry, where he served God with world-renowned usefulness. It did not merely happen so. I believe in a particular providence. I believe God's geometry may be seen in all our life more beautifully than in crystallography. Job was right. "The crystal cannot equal it."

Again I remark that religion is superior to the crystal in transparency. We know not when or by whom glass was first discovered. Beads of it have been found in the tomb of Alexander Severus. Vases of it are brought up from the ruins of Herculaneum. There were female adornments made out of it 3000 years ago—those adornments found now attached to the mummies of Egypt. A great many commentators believe that my text means glass. What would we do without the crystal? The crystal in the window to keep out the storm and let in the day—the crystal over the watch defending its delicate machinery, yet allowing us to see the hour—the crystal of the telescope by which the astronomer brings distant worlds so near he can inspect them. Oh, the triumphs of the crystals in the celebrated windows of Rouen and Salisbury! But there is nothing so transparent in a crystal as in our holy religion. It is a transparent religion. You put it to your eye and you see man—his sin, his soul, his destiny. You look at God and you see something of the grandeur of his character. It is a transparent religion. Infidels tell us it is opaque? Do you know why they tell us it is opaque? It is because they are blind. The natural man receiveth not the things of God because they are spiritually discerned. There is no trouble with the crystal; the trouble is with the eyes which try to look through it. We pray for vision, Lord, that our eyes might be opened. When the eye-salve cures our blindness then we find that religion is transparent.

It is a transparent Bible. All the mountains of the Bible come out: Sinai, the mountain of the law; Pisgah, the mountain of prospect; Olivet, the mountain of instruction; Calvary, the mountain of sacrifice. All the rivers of the Bible come out: Hidekel, or the river of paradisaical beauty; Jordan, or the river of holy chrisms; Cherith, or the river of prophetic supply; Nile, or the river of palaces; and the pure river of life from under the throne, clear as crystal. While reading this Bible after our eyes have been touched by grace, we find it all transparent, and the earth rocks, now with crucifixion agony and now with judgment terror, and Christ appears in some of his two-hundred and fifty-six titles, as far as I can count them—the bread, the rock, the captain, the commander, the conqueror, the star, and on and beyond any capacity of mine to rehearse them. Transparent religion!

The providence that seemed dark before becomes pellucid. Now you find God is not trying to put you down. Now you understand why you lost that child and why you lost your property; it was to prepare you for eternal treasures. And why sickness came; it being the precursor of immortal juvenescence. And now you understand why they lied about you and tried to drive you hither and thither. It was to put you in the glorious company of such men as Ignatius, who, when he went out to be destroyed by the lions, said: "I am the wheat and the teeth of the wild beasts must first grind me before I can become pure bread for Jesus Christ;" or the company of such men as Polycarp, who when standing in the midst of the amphitheatre waiting for the lions to come out of their cave and destroy him, and the people in the galleries jeering and shouting, "The lions for Polycarp," replied: "Let them come on," and then stooping down toward the cave where the wild beasts were roaring to get out, "Let them come on. Ah, yes, it is persecution to put you in glorious company; and while there are many things that you will have to postpone to the future world for explanation, I tell you that it is the whole tendency of your religion to unravel and explain and interpret and illumine and irradiate. Job was right. It is a glorious transparency. "The crystal cannot equal it."

I remark again that religion surpasses the crystal in its beauty. That lump of crystal I put under the magnifying glass of the crystallographer and he sees in it indescribable beauty—snowdrift and splinters of hoar-frost and corals and wreaths and stars and crowns and castellations of conspicuous beauty. The fact is that crystal is so beautiful that I can think of but one thing in all the universe that is so beautiful, and that is the religion of the Bible. Now wonder this Bible represents that religion as the daybreak, as the apple-blossoms, as the glitte of a king's banquet. It is the joy of the whole earth.

People talk too much about their cross and not enough about their crown. Do you know the Bible mentions a cross but twenty-seven times while it mentions a crown eighty times. Ask that old man what he thinks of religion!

He has been a close observer. He has been culturing an æsthetic taste. He has seen the sunrises of a half century. He has been an early riser. He has been an admirer of cameos and corals and all kinds of beautiful things. Ask him what he thinks of religion and he will tell you, "It is the most beautiful thing I ever saw." "The crystal cannot equal it."

Beautiful in its symmetry. When it presents God's character it does not present Him as having love like a great protuberance on one side of his nature, but makes that love in harmony with his justice—a love that will accept all those who come to him, and a justice that will by no means clear the guilty. Beautiful religion in the sentiment it implants! Beautiful religion in the hope it kindles! Beautiful, religion in the fact that it proposes to garland and en-throne and emparadise an immortal spirit. Solomon says it is a lily. Paul says it is a crown. The Apocalypse says it is a fountain kissed of the sun. Ezekiel says it is a foliaged cedar. Christ says it is a bridegroom come to fetch home a bride. While Job in the text takes up a whole vase of precious stones—the topaz and the sapphire and the chrysoprasus—and he takes out of this beautiful vase just one crystal and holds it up until it gleams in the warm light of the eastern sky, and he exclaims, "The crystal cannot equal it."

Oh, it is not a stale religion, it is not a stupid religion, it is not a toothless hag as some seem to have represented it; it is not a Meg Merrilies with shrivelled arm come to scare the world. It is the fairest daughter of God, the heiress of all his wealth. Her cheek the morning sky; her voice the music of the south wind; her step the dance of the sea. Come and woo her. The Spirit and the Bride say come, and whosoever will, let him come. Do you agree with Solomon and say it is a lily? Then pluck it and wear it over your heart. Do you agree with Paul and say it is a crown? Then let this hour be your coronation. Do you agree with the Apocalypse and say it is a springing fountain? Then come and take the thirst of your soul. Do you believe with Ezekiel and say it is a foliaged cedar? Then come under its shadow. Do you believe with Christ and say it is a bridegroom come to fetch home a bride? Then strike hands with your Lord the King while I pronounce you everlastingly one. Or if you think with Job that it is a jewel, then put it on your hand like a ring, on your neck like a bead, on your forehead like a star, while looking into the mirror of God's Word you acknowledge "the crystal cannot equal it."

Again, religion is superior to the crystal in its transformations. The diamond is only a crystallization of coal. Carbonate of lime rises if it becomes calcite or aragonite. Red oxide of copper crystallizes into cubes and octahedrons. Those crystals which adorn our persons and our homes and our museums have nearly been resurrected from forms that were far more lustrous. Scientists for ages have been examining these wonderful transformations. But I tell you in the Gospel of the Son of God there is a more wonderful transformation. Over souls by reason of sin black as coal and hard as iron, God by his comforting grace stoops and says: "They shall be mine in the day when I take up my jewels."

"What," say you, "will God wear jewelry?" If he wanted it, he could make the stars of heaven his belt and have the evening cloud for the sandals of his feet; but he does not want that adornment. He will not have that jewelry. When God wants jewelry he comes down and digs it out of the depths and darkness of sin. These souls are all crystallizations of mercy. He puts them on and he wears them in the presence of the whole universe. He wears them on the hand that was nailed, over the heart that was pierced, on the temples that were stung. "They shall be mine," saith the Lord, "in the day when I make up my jewels." Wonderful transformation! Where sin abounded grace shall much more abound. The carbon becomes the solitaire. "The crystal cannot equal it."

Now, I have no liking for those people who are always enlarging in Christian meetings about their early dissipation. Do not go into the particulars, my brothers. Simply say you were sick, but make no display of your ulcers. The chief stock in trade of some ministers and Christian workers seems to be their early crimes and dissipations. The number of pockets you picked and the number of chickens you stole make very poor prayer-meeting rhetoric. Besides that, it discourages other Christian people who never got drunk or stole anything. But it is pleasant to know that those who were farthest down, have been brought highest up.

The Great Tabernacle Windows.

Out of infernal serfdom into eternal liberty. Out of darkness into light. From coal to the solitaire. "The crystal cannot equal it."

But, my friends, the chief transforming power of the Gospel will not be seen in this world and not until heaven breaks upon the soul. When that light falls upon the soul then you will see the crystals. Oh, what a magnificent setting for these jewels of eternity! I sometimes hear people representing Heaven in a way that is far from attractive to me. It seems almost a vulgar Heaven as they represent it with great blotches of color and bands of music making a deafening racket. John represents Heaven as exquisitely beautiful. Three crystals. In one place he says: "Her light was like a precious stone, clear as crystal." In another place he says: "I saw a pure river from under the throne, clear as crystal." In another place he says: "Before the throne there was a sea of glass clear as crystal." Three crystals! John says crystal atmosphere. That means health. Balm of eternal June. What weather after the world's east wind! No rack of storm clouds. One breath of that air will cure the worst tubercle. Crystal light on all the leaves. Crystal light shimmering on the topaz of the temples. Crystal light tossing in the plumes of the equestrians of Heaven on white horses.

But "the crystal cannot equal it." John says crystal river. That means joy. Deep and ever rolling. Not one drop of the Thames or the Hudson or the Rhine to soil it. Not one tear of human sorrow to embitter it. Crystal, the rain out of which it was made. Crystal, the bed over which it shall roll and ripple. Crystal, its infinite surface. But "the crystal cannot equal it." John says crystal sea. That means multitudinously vast. Vast in rapture. Rapture vast as the sea, deep as the sea, strong as the sea, ever changing as the sea. Billows of light. Billows of beauty, blue with skies that were never clouded and green with depths that were never fathomed. Arctic and Antarctic and Mediterranean and Atlantic and Pacific in crystalline magnificence. Three crystals. Crystal light falling on a crystal river. Crystal river rolling into a crystal sea. But "the crystal cannot equal it."

"Oh," says some one, putting his hand over his eyes, "can it be that I who have been in so much sin and trouble will ever come to those crystals?" Yes, it may be—it will be. Heaven we must have, whatever else we have or have not, and we come here to get it. "How much must I pay for it?" you say. You will pay for it just as much as the coal pays to become the diamond. In other words, nothing. The same Almighty power that makes the crystal in the mountain will change your heart which is harder than stone, for the promise is "I will take away your stony heart and I will give you a heart of flesh."

"Oh," says some one, "it is just the doctrine I want; God is to do everything and I am to do nothing." My brother, it is not the doctrine you want. The coal makes no resistance. It hears the resurrection voice in the mountain and it comes to crystallization, but your heart resists. The trouble with you, my brother, is the coal wants to stay coal. I do not ask you to throw open the door and let Christ in. I only ask that you stop bolting it and, barring it. O, my friends, we will have to get rid of our sins. I will have to get rid of my sins and you will have to get rid of your sins. What will we do with our sins among the three crystals? The crystal atmosphere would display our pollution.

The crystal river would be befouled with our touch. Transformation must take place now or no transformation at all. Give sin full chance in your heart and the transformation will be downward instead of upward. Instead of a crystal it will be a cinder. In the days of Carthage a Christian girl was condemned to die for her faith, and a boat was bedaubed with tar and pitch and filled with combustibles and set on fire and the Christian girl was placed in the boat, and the wind was off shore and the boat floated away with its precious treasure. No one can doubt that boat landed at the shore of Heaven. Sin wants to put you in a fiery boat and shove you off in an opposite direction—off from peace, off from God, off from heaven, everlastingly off; and the port toward which you would sail would be a port of darkness, and the guns that would greet you would be the guns of despair, and the flags that would wave at your arrival would be the black flags of death. O, my brother, you must either kill sin or sin will kill you. It is no wild exaggeration when I say that any man or woman that wants to be saved may be saved. Tremendous choice! A thousand people are choosing this moment between salvation and destruction, between light and darkness, between heaven and hell, between charred ruin and glorious crystallization.

TO DEDICATE THE TABERNACLE.

EVERYTHING IN READINESS FOR THE GREAT EVENT IN BROOKLYN NEXT SUNDAY FORENOON.

the completion of the largest estant church in the United States, the pastor of which is also their editor. With him they have watched with deep interest the progress of the work and now they unite with him in jubilation over its completion.

On the front page of this issue we present a picture of the exterior of the Tabernacle. The edifice is of the Norman style of architecture, unconventional in type, and is built of dark red Connecticut granite, with facings of brown stone from Lake Superior, forming a pleasant contrast. Over the two upper entrances, one on the Clinton Avenue side, the other fronting on Greene Avenue, there is a rounding projection, two stories in height, which forms the base of a square tower of massive proportions, with a slender round turret at each corner.

The semi-secular interior gives the impression of a vast amphitheatre, and, indeed, it is one of the very largest church edifices in its seating capacity, accommodating over 6,000. There are two galleries which will seat about one-half the number. Incandescent electric lamps will light the building. Among the most beautiful features of the new Tabernacle are the great windows of richly stained cathedral glass, the frames of which are beautifully carved. Three of these windows are shown in the illustration on page 243.

The pastor's study (see illustration on page 242) is a noteworthy feature of the new building. It is beautifully finished in cabinet style and is roomy and attractive—just the ideal study for a metropolitan clergyman.

The great organ, which at once attracts the eye on entering the Tabernacle, (see illustration on this page) is probably the finest and largest pipe instrument in the United States, and was built at a cost of $30,000. Mr. Henry Eyre Browne, the Tabernacle organist, and other experts unite in declaring it a perfect instrument.

The total cost of the Tabernacle building and site, exclusive of the great organ, is in the neighborhood of $400,000.

The dedication programme is an imposing one. In the forenoon the services will begin with the singing of the long-metre Doxology:

Praise God from whom all blessings flow, after which the Rev. Thomas Hastings, D. D., President of the Union Theological Seminary, will make the invocation. He will be followed by the Rev. Wendell Prime, D. D., the son of the famous Dr. Irenæus Prime, who will offer the dedicatory prayer. Both gentlemen will be introduced by the Pastor, Rev. Dr. Talmage. It will be remembered that it was the late Rev. Irenæus Prime who laid the corner-stone of the new Tabernacle. In the corner-stone there was deposited, in a metal box, a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, bearing the name of Rev. Dr. Talmage, as editor, there to remain while time endures, and until the great edifice itself shall have crumbled into dust.
Praise him all creatures here below;

The sermon will be preached by the Rev. Teunis S. Hamlin, D. D., of the Church of the denominations will participate. In the evening, Dr. Talmage will preach a sermon appropriate to the occasion.

Among the prominent preachers who have been invited, and who will probably assist in the dedication exercises in the forenoon, are Rev. Wendell Prime, Rev. James H. Darlington, Rev. Talbot W. Chambers, Rev. Lyman Abbott of Plymouth Church, Rev. Edward P. Terhune of the Reformed Church, Williamsburg, Rev. Charles Deems, Church of the Strangers, New York; Rev. A. B. Kendig, Hanson Place M. E. Church, Brooklyn, and others. The portraits of several of these distinguished divines are given on page 245 of this issue.

Among the other illustrations which we print in this connection, is the picture of the recent Brooklyn Tabernacle, which appears side by side on the first page with the portrait of Rev. Dr. Talmage, the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We also print the portrait, on this page, of Dr. Tucker of the Tabernacle Board of Trustees, who has been one of the most active members in urging forward the work of rebuilding to a successful culmination.

The material assistance rendered by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers in rearing the new Tabernacle has been a constant source of encouragement to Dr. Talmage and was at certain important stages of the enterprise of exceptional value in forwarding the great work to a successful issue.

M. STAMBOULOFF.

THE attempted assassination of M. Stambouloff, the Premier of Bulgaria, has startled the whole world. It was a crime evidently inspired by international hatred, and therefore in the present strained relations of Eastern Europe has serious significance. The facts briefly stated are that M. Stambouloff was taking his usual evening stroll on March 27, in company with his colleague M. Belcheff, the Secretary of the Treasury, when four men rushed from under the shadow of the overhanging trees and fired at them, killing M. Belcheff. There are good reasons for believing that the assassins supposed they were killing the Premier, but it happened that in violation of the rigorous European etiquette which prescribes that the man of higher rank should walk on the right of his companion, M. Stambouloff was on the left. There was no reason for killing Belcheff while there were very cogent reasons for killing Stambouloff. He is the statesman who, more than any other, has incurred the enmity of Russia. So skilful a diplomatist is he that he has been called "the Bismarck of the Balkans." He it was who thwarted Russia by his fidelity to Prince Alexander and after the Russians had abducted the Prince, Stambouloff brought him back in triumph. The Prince declined to remain, being hopeless of maintaining Bulgarian independence in opposition to Russia, but Stambouloff dexterously thwarted Russian intrigue and so adroitly guided the destinies of Bulgaria that her inevitable enemy has been unable to gain control of the Government.

The Grand Organ in the New Brooklyn Tabernacle.

Covenant, Washington. Professor Browne will preside at the organ, and Prof. Ali, the cornet virtuoso, will lead the congregation at singing.

In the afternoon the Rev. Dr. Talmage will preside and will personally conduct a "Union Service." There will be about fifteen or twenty addresses by well-known pastors of various churches—the whole constituting a great Union Meeting, in which clergymen of all Christian sia by his fidelity to Prince Alexander and after the Russians had abducted the Prince, Stambouloff brought him back in triumph. The Prince declined to remain, being hopeless of maintaining Bulgarian independence in opposition to Russia, but Stambouloff dexterously thwarted Russian intrigue and so adroitly guided the destinies of Bulgaria that her inevitable enemy has been unable to gain control of the Government.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

Ostentation in the Home Versus Comfort—An Ingenious Check on Advertising Agents—A Living Man Legally Dead—An Unsigned Will in Dispute.

USELESS palaces are in the market in San Francisco. The Call of that city, in mentioning the fact that the owner of a magnificent mansion on California Street is offering it for sale at a price far below its original cost, comments on the folly of erecting such residences. It says that several citizens who a few years ago became suddenly rich made that mistake. In their travels in Europe they were impressed by the grandeur of the castles owned by the nobility, and on their return erected residences on a similar scale. They soon discovered that they had no use for the multitude of rooms they had provided, and when they and their servants were provided with all the apartments they needed there were still many rooms unoccupied. Instead of a snug home they had erected a great barrack, and they speedily tired of the pleasure their ostentation afforded them for a time. The richest man only needs comfort in his home and the excess of accommodation so far from giving increased comfort adds to his cares and expenses and gives no return. The huge mansions will probably become hotels or apartment-houses at no distant date, and the aristocrats who expended enormous sums in building them will be content with homes of a size no more than sufficient for their use. It is not alone in buildings that this mistake is made. The acquisition of a large fortune entails similar disappointment. The royal preacher asked long ago: "What good is here to the owners hereof saving the beholding of them with their eyes?" (Eccles. 5:11.)

Photographic Vouchers are Demanded by a certain class of advertisers. Firms who rely largely for the extension of their business on the advertisements of their wares on the rocks and fences are, it is stated, requiring a new kind of proof from their agents. When they give out a contract for the painting of an inscription setting forth the merits of a patent medicine or a peculiar kind of soap on suitable places through any large country district, they stipulate that a photograph of the scene shall be furnished to them. The agent carries a camera and when he has painted the inscription on the rock or fence or the side of a barn he takes a photograph of it, and his employer examines the photographs and learns from the river or mountain or any natural object appearing in the background the locality of his advertisements and how many of them have been inscribed. This check is devised to prevent the agent charging for more advertisements than he has painted and from neglecting any distant section of country which he has contracted to cover. One well-known firm is said to have in its possession a collection of the photographs so complete that a perfect panorama of the country scenery for thousands of miles is represented in the series. A disinterested person looking over these photographs would be impressed chiefly by the natural beauty of the scenery, but the object for which the owner scrutinizes them is to see that his advertisement is there. When the Christian is called to account for his life-work the scrutiny will be of a similar kind. It is expected of him that wherever he may go and in whatever surroundings he may live, he will, by his life, if not by direct preaching, show forth the power of his Lord to redeem men from evil. Evidences of his sojourn may be found in his achievements account, but through some informality in his claim had not secured payment. A claim-agent had offered his services, but, as the man did not want to pay fees the offer was rejected. He decided to wait until he could go to Washington and make his claim in person. He settled down to work at his trade, and no opportunity came of paying the visit. He still intended to go, but year after year passed without his doing so. In January last he was able to go, but on presenting his claim he was informed that the Department had been notified that he was dead, and the amount due him had been paid to his administrator. The man was puzzled, but he obtained a clue to the mystery when he discovered that the money had been paid to the claim-agent, whose services he had rejected. The agent having failed to trace him, owing to his change of residence, had made affidavit five years ago in a court in Independence that he was dead and had filed administration papers. The defrauded man has had no little difficulty in proving himself alive, as the court records attested his death, and he could not afford to take witnesses to Independence to identify him.

If he had been seeking eternal riches he would have had no such difficulty. It is they who are dead to the world who get that blessing. (Rom. 6:8.)

Procrastination in making a will is likely to involve litigation in Plainfield, N. J. A wealthy old man, whose property is supposed to be worth nearly a million dollars, was stricken down with illness, recently. He had neither wife nor children living, but some of his nephews and other relatives came to see him when he was sick. His death was evidently near at hand when he surprised his relatives by saying that he must make his will. They were astonished that so wealthy a man and one who cherished a strong attachment to some of his nephews and as strong a dislike for others, had not performed the duty before. A lawyer was summoned and a will was prepared under his instructions. He listened to the reading of the document and pronounced it satisfactory and, having called all present to witness that it was his last will and testament, proceeded to sign it. Before, however, he could write his name, death seized him and he fell back lifeless with his pen in his fingers. The question now arises whether the will being unsigned will be admitted to probate. As its provisions are very different from those which would govern the distribution of the estate if he is declared to have died intestate, there is a strong possibility of a lawsuit. The old man would have grieved as much over his property being divided under the intestate law as he would over it being wasted in litigation, but his delaying the making of a will seems to have rendered one of those events, if not both, inevitable. His folly is evident to all, but many who would blame him for it, commit still more egregious folly in postponing to a dying hour the duty of making their peace with God through Jesus. (Isa. 55:6, 7.)

A Man's Effort to Prove Himself Alive has involved him in considerable trouble as reported in the Journal, of Kansas City, Mo. It appears that after the war he settled in Independence, afterward removing to Santa Fe, and subsequently to Kansas City. During the war he had supplied the government with some horses and had rendered other services entitling him to payment. He had endeavored to collect the

ISRAEL OFTEN REPROVED.

S. S. LESSON FOR MAY 3, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
AMOS 4: 4-13. GOLDEN TEXT, PROV. 29: 1.

The Lord's Prophets Taken from all Classes—Amos not a Professional Prophet—Amaziah Alarmed by his Visit—His Own Position as Prophet in Danger—Amos Told to Ply his Business in his Own Country—His Retort—A Mistaken Idea of Immunity—The Message Delivered.

OUR God seeks among his children for hearts which will understand him. There were, in the latter days of Elijah, seven thousand in Israel which had not bowed the knee to Baal nor kissed him; there were schools of prophets to be found; worshippers of the true

God had multiplied in the land,—but amongst them all, there was but one Elisha! There were more in quantity than in quality; few understood and knew him as he loves to be known; few were free enough from personal interest to bear the burden of the Lord. Sometimes one, two or three in a generation have fully understood the heart of God. Is it the mark, the prize of the high calling of God thus to know him? God has sought such souls from all classes: the learned Moses, the child Samuel, the prophets Elijah and Elisha, the statesman Daniel, the aged Anna, and the herdsman of Tekoa, were among those of whom the latter wrote: "Surely the Lord will do nothing but he revealeth his secret unto his servants his prophets." (Amos 3: 7.)

Amos was a simple farm-laborer: "I was no prophet, neither was I a prophet's son: but I was an herdsman and a gatherer of sycamore fruit: and the Lord took me as I followed the flock, and

The Lord Said Unto Me, go, prophesy unto my people Israel." But those who are in the counsels of God never are, never have been, and never will be understood by man. The brethren of Joseph and of David made them suffer keenly, the disciples did not understand Mary Magdalene; "the world knoweth us not because it knew him not."

In all the rugged simplicity which belonged to him, Amos obeyed the call of his God, and the same power which was so with the child Samuel, that God "did let none of his words fall to the ground," gave weight also to the words of Amos. Amaziah, the high priest of the golden calf at Bethel, the archbishop, so to speak, of the then idolatrous established religion of Israel, began to be alarmed. Amaziah carried his complaint to the king, Jeroboam II., under the pretense that these prophecies were dangerous to the state: "Amos hath conspired against thee in the midst of the house of Israel:

The Land is not Able to Bear all his words." What a testimony to the power of God with Amos! But this same idolatrous priest, who sought to appear so zealous for the government in disclosing a dangerous conspiracy, took quite another tone when he spoke to Amos in person. Far from charging him to his face with conspiracy, he gave him the title of prophet or seer; "O thou seer, go, flee away into the land of Judah, and there eat bread, and prophesy there. But prophesy not again any more at Bethel, for it is the king's sanctuary, and it is the king's court." The sleek ecclesiastical would be understood to act with a benevolent patronage which he might think would win or disarm an unlettered peasant, and easily gain his confidence, and so he would dispose of him quietly. A living was an object to a laboring man; if he preached in Judah, he would be appreciated, he could "eat bread there," he was sure of support there. But it was altogether out of place for him, an inferior, to go against the grain of royalty, and run counter to the state religion by preaching at Bethel; the king was against it; it would never do. Amos saw through the courteous hypocrite, and repeated his God-given commission to the man-made priest, at the same time turning by divine direction the edge of his prophecy against Amaziah himself, announcing that he who would turn aside a prophet by temporal and worldly considerations should find his own calculations in error and should himself become a pauper. Amos did not mince matters, God had given him to see sin as he saw it himself, "I know your manifold transgression and your mighty sins," he says (Chap. 5: 12), and his estimate of sin among the people of the Lord was formed from God's communications to him. First, to his own heart, and then to the people through him, God spoke, "You only have I known of all the families of the earth;

Therefore I will Punish You for all your iniquities." It is imagined, and even asserted by some, that sin in a believer may be palliated or excused, and that it is guilty only in those who are unreconciled to God! Where such a doctrine of unrighteousness originated we know not; certainly not in the Word of God. It is the servant who "knew his Lord's will and did it not" that shall be "beaten with many stripes," and he that knew it not with few stripes.

Amos asks the pertinent question, "Can two walk together except they be agreed?" Enoch had walked with God and how blessedly that walk with God ended! The constant intercourse with his God made life on earth impossible to this patriarch; "and he was not, for God took him." But at this time, in Israel, God and his people were not pulling together, not walking together, not agreed. Amos saw the breach always becoming wider, and his soul was stirred within him. From time to time, in his former life, he had defended the sheep from the wild animals which at that time infested the land, and he says, "As the shepherd taketh out of the mouth of the lion two legs or a piece of an ear, so shall the children of Israel be taken out." (Chap. 3: 12.) Amos saw the lion of idolatry devouring the people of the Lord, and they must at any cost be rescued. So he yielded himself up as an instrument to declare the attitude which God took up with regard to his people, not, like Jonah, considering his own reputation, but, like Paul, counting not his life dear unto himself.

Worship Without Consecration.

Rough and ready in his utterance, he addresses the population of Bashan, which was a rich grazing country, as "Ye Kine of Bashan" . . . which oppress the poor, which crush the needy; which say to their masters, bring, and let us drink. . . . Come to Bethel and transgress; at Gilgal multiply transgression." Bethel (the house of God), Gilgal, (the place of turning), O what a mockery that just here idolatry should flourish! There was plenty of religion of a certain kind among the people, "Bring your sacrifices every morning." They would not neglect their religious observances, they made a cover of respectability for their oppression and extortion and carnality! There was plenty of religion, but the object of their worship was a golden calf, instead of the God who had brought them up out of Egypt. Offerings, sacrifices, tithes, they were ready for, anything, everything, so long as they did not come in contact with the holy, and living, and true God!

The very object of Amos' mission was to plead the cause of God, and by some means, by any means, to awaken Israel by a sense of her departure from him. God says to his prophet: "I have also given you cleanness of teeth in all your cities, and want of bread in all your places; yet ye have not returned unto me, saith the Lord." Scarcity was to be a sign to his people that they were not walking with him, the sign was given them, they suffered under it, but took it as a chance, not recognizing the hand of their God, and they went on worshipping the golden calf, and forsaking the God that loved them. Then the Lord withheld the rain, and made it difficult and inconvenient for them to obtain water. Would not this bring back the memory of the smitten rock? No; the result was the same, "Yet have ye

Not Returned Unto Me, saith the Lord." Next, he smote the fruits of their land with blasting, and mildew, and the palmer worm and curse after curse, which had been foretold by him through Moses, Lev. 26, Deut. 28, came upon them, pestilence, sword, conquest by their enemies; yet, in their blindness and hardness of heart, they did not connect the plagues which came upon them with their sins, or recognize God's hand in them. The fear of God which worked upon their fathers in the days of the judges to turn to God again and again when trouble came upon them, seemed to have died out from among the people, and the God who had so long borne with them says again, "Yet ye have not returned unto me!"

"Therefore will I do this unto thee, O Israel." Do what? "The Lord God hath sworn by his holiness, that, lo, the days shall come upon you, that he will take you away with hooks, and your posterity with fishhooks." (Ver. 2.) It was the announcement of their dispersion, which came to pass some half a century later. "And because I will do this unto thee, Prepare to Meet Thy God, O Israel." But what about those who are hardened against God in these days, those who now worship the golden calf of money, those who now live unto themselves under a certain cloak of religion? The same words apply, "Prepare to meet thy God." In time and in eternity, in mercy or in judgment, in Christ or in his sins, every soul must meet him. Oh, to meet him at the cross of Jesus!

EUROPE'S WARLIKE ATTITUDE.

Journalists Agreeing With Prophetic Students in the Expectation of an Approaching War.

STUDENTS of prophecy who read the newspapers in the light of the Bible are not surprised to notice that the European correspondents of American journals are reporting unusual military activity and open preparation for a great war. The times correspond in so many ways to the description given by Christ and the prophets of those which were to usher in the close of this dispensation, that there is an expectation of change in the boundaries of nations, which can result only from a stupendous conflict. Prophecy teaches that when the world enters on the last seven-year period of its pre-millennial history—the seventieth heptad mentioned by Daniel (Daniel 9: 24, 25), which was separated from the previous sixty-nine weeks by the whole of this parenthetical dispensation—the belt of territory surrounding the Mediterranean sea would be divided into ten kingdoms. That belt was the Roman world as it existed under the Cæsars. The territory, which was outside it then, will again be separated from it and the present divisions within it will disappear, and ten kingdoms will take the place of the twenty-three kingdoms of which it is now composed. A glance at the map will show how gigantic must be the struggle which could have this outcome. Believing that

This Change Will Surely Come, those Christians who believe in their Bible and who think that God has put nothing there that was not intended for our instruction or warning, have, like Daniel, endeavored to "understand by books the number of years." These men have not been deceived by the pacific assurances of monarchs and statesmen, and they are not astonished by the reports that all Europe seems to be preparing for war.

Among these reports the most circumstantial and apparently the most sagacious are those sent by Mr. Harold Frederic, the correspondent of the New York Times. In the course of a general survey of last week, he says: "It is difficult to see how Europe's strained international relations can maintain their present tension for many more weeks without a rupture coming somewhere. No doubt a watched pot boils slowly and the longevity of sick men is proverbial, but even with all the experience of the past fifteen years of peace, with their successive war alarms turning out one after another to be premature, close observers grow more nervous now week after week as Spring advances. There is no longer any doubt whatever that Russia has added seven battalions to her army of observation on the Russo-Austrian frontier within the past ten days, and that in Berlin military circles the belief is general that the year cannot end without fighting.

The European Situation

"On this latter point numerous messages of confirmation have come under my notice, all from quarters far removed from any of those suspicions of stock-jobbing motives which too often taint the political news from Berlin. The element of doubt in the situation is that political students see irresolution in the French Cabinet. Numerous fancy lists have been printed of late giving the names of Ministers supposed to be ranged on either side of this momentous question. These are of small importance. It is more nearly true to say that each of the Ministers is on both sides of it. They all have their moments of excited confidence in the equipment, spirit, and fighting quality of their huge army.

"Nobody any longer thinks it worth while, in either Paris or St. Petersburg, to dissemble the plans of the two great powers lying to the East and West of Germany. They make no secret of their intention to fall upon her simultaneously when the time comes and tear her limb from limb. The Czar has got entirely over his former prejudice against an alliance with the Republic. All that nonsense was swept away by Bismarck's colossal tumble, and it had previously been much diminished by M. Carnot's conservative behavior.

"Looking at the map and studying the gigantic figures of army totals, one would say that Germany must be inevitably crushed between her enemies, and this might happen; but the French realize that something gravely different might occur, namely, that the German armies might be within sight of Paris in three weeks, with the hideous black wake of spoliation and a barren waste behind them, while the sluggish Russian forces were still pottering about on the wrong side of the Vistula. This is a very sobering thought.

The Uncertain Factor.

"If Italy could be detached from the Triple Alliance, French hesitation would vanish in a moment. This is the real key to the existing condition of armed suspense. Nobody is likely to know authoritatively what Italy decides upon in the matter until she has committed herself and then we are as likely to hear of it through the roar of cannon and bugle calls as by diplomatic announcements. Her continued adhesion to the Triple Alliance with Germany and Austria by no means insures permanent peace, but her leaving it would certainly entail war.

"Italy had scarcely taken her place among the nations before she was dubbed 'the harlot of European politics.' Something of this contemptuous suspicion colors the mind of every diplomat who has to deal with the Quirinal. Stagnation is the one thing which Italy cannot stand. It means not only overtaxation and ruinous tariffs, but grievous boredom. She was promised by her rulers that her enormous outlay in ships and troops should bring her big territorial profits. None of these come, and she is very poor and tired to death of waiting for a dozen years.

"Her notion has been to partake in the partition of France and get Nice and Savoy as her share of the plunder. Now, France sagaciously suggests that she would do much better by joining the other combination and taking Trento and Trieste from Austria instead. This is what Italy is pondering just now, and all the armed camps of Europe are waiting for her to make up her mind."

"But when," said Jesus (Luke 21:9), "ye shall hear of wars and commotions, be not terrified; for these things must come to pass first; but the end is not immediately."

NED BAXTER'S PROCRASTINATION.

A Story of the S.S. Golden Text for May 3. "He that being often reprov'd, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy." Prov. 29:1.

HAPPINESS does not depend on a large fortune or luxurious surroundings. If it did Ned Baxter and his wife would not have been happy. Ned's income was small—only the salary he received as a clerk in a dry-goods house. Ned's wife had no dowry, but she was a bright, cheery, pretty woman and had always been accustomed to the frugality which must avoid all unnecessary outlay. They had a small flat when they were first married and it seemed to them a little Paradise. Other people might have thought it cramped and poverty-stricken, but to Ned and his wife, who had been boarding before they were married, a home of their own, however small, was a delight. Mrs. Baxter's friends came to see her and envied her; Ned brought his acquaintances in to have supper with them and they would go away inclined to find a wife and set up house-keeping themselves. Ned's wife used to look so lovingly at him and he was so tender and gentle with her and so proud of her and his little home, that many a millionaire had less of real happiness than they.

"You must be very thankful to God, I should think," said one of Ned's old friends, his former Sunday School teacher, in fact, whom Ned brought in one evening, having accidentally met him in the street. "Such happiness as yours comes to very few. God has been very good to you. Don't forget who it is that blesses you."

Ned and his wife were silent. The fact was that they did forget God. They were so wrapped up in each other and there was always so much to talk about and think of, that somehow the little home had never been consecrated by prayer. They would have been shocked if the thought had been put in words, but they lived practically as if they thought that their happiness was due to their own ability and effort and they had no one but themselves to thank for it. Though they made no reply to the admonition of Ned's friend, the words touched them both for both had been in Sunday School and knew that what he said was true.

They had some talk about it late that night and agreed that they would go to church next Sunday. They had not been there since they were married. But the next Sunday was wet and there were several things to be attended to in the home, so it was postponed, and they drifted on as before. They were too much absorbed in themselves and their surroundings to "look up."

When love and happiness do not lead people to give their hearts to God, sometimes stern measures are applied. God wants the love of all his creatures and in his providence some are brought to him by adversity when prosperity has failed. There came such a time in the little home. Ned's wife was sick. Ned was alarmed, and as he sat by her bedside they had some serious talk. They promised that if her life was spared they would lead different lives for the future. She did recover, but there was such an arrear of work to be cleared up and there was a baby to occupy her attention, and Ned was working late hours, too. So their vow was not kept.

Ned was prospered in his business. The trade of the mercantile house in whose employ he began as humble clerk, was greatly increased and some four years after his marriage, young Baxter was appointed travelling salesman with salary and commissions, which gave them three times the income they had before.

After the first excitement of moving into better quarters had somewhat subsided, the still small voice was heard saying "Son, give me thine heart." "Daughter, give me thine heart."

"I must have a little time first, to enjoy myself" the husband said. "The children take up too much of my time," was the wife's reply.

The next summons came in the death of one of Ned's boon companions. They had been enjoying themselves after the manner of jovial travelling salesmen and were in a strange city away from home and friends. After a three days illness, during which time the sufferer had been in a delirium and Ned had been his only nurse, he passed away, crying "I am lost, I am lost!"

It was a terrible experience and Ned went home completely overcome with distress and fatigue. Several times during the illness that followed, when his wife was leaning over him, ministering to his comfort, he was on the point of saying "that dreadful cry of Joe Peters keeps ringing in my ears 'I am lost.' I know if I had been in his place the same would have been true of me. Let us dear wife seek salvation before it is forever too late." But he suppressed these yearnings after higher and better things and said nothing and grieved God's spirit.

"Ned" said his wife, the first day he was able to attend to business "I wish you would apply to the firm to change your position and give you something to do that would keep you at home all the time. You are not near so well as you were and you are so nervous and irritable that I am sure travelling cannot agree with you."

Ned kissed her anxious face and said "Yes, I mean to do so soon; but you know I have not laid by anything yet, and there are greater chances of making money in travelling. But I tell you what I'll do, I'll promise you not to have any more good times when I'm off."

This promise was made only to be broken because Ned Baxter made it in his own strength. The very next journey he took, a telegram was sent to him, saying one of his children was very ill, and asking for his immediate return. He could not be found for a couple of days, and when he finally reached home the child was dead. The mother's grief was very intense for it was the darling of her flock. This time she was ready to reply to the sweet voice that whispered through the affliction, "Look up:" "I will for:

The heavens are better than this earth below,
They are of more account and far more dear.
I will look up, for all most sweet and fair
Most pure, most excellent, is garnered there.

Ned Baxter, however, disregarded this heavenly voice, as well as his wife's pleadings. "Let me first do better and show that I mean it, then I'll become a Christian."

But the next thing his friends heard of him was from a paragraph in a Western journal which briefly reported that a travelling salesman named Edward Baxter had been killed that morning in the lobby of the principal hotel of that town. A detective was after him with a warrant for embezzlement. Baxter had recognized the detective, and endeavored to escape, and in the scuffle that ensued, he had been accidentally shot.

He had been often reprov'd, he had repeatedly hardened his neck, and now he was destroyed without remedy.

"PEACE, BE STILL!"

THE question often asked us during the last few days is, "What do you think of the controversies now going on in the different denominations of Christians?" I do not wonder at the question, for it is an extraordinary time in many of the religious sects. There are our friends, the Episcopalians, who have on hand the interesting question, "Should some of the prominent Rectors who have invited ministers of other denominations to take part with them in worship, be reprimanded or disciplined?" The Methodists are having a lively time with the question whether women should be sent as delegates to their ecclesiastical courts. The United Brethren are not united on an important subject. The Presbyterian Church is bringing under Presbyterial observation, in anticipation of General Assembly scrutiny, an address delivered by a learned Professor in "The Union Theological Seminary." And there are fires all round the sky which indicate excitements among the great tribes of the Lord.

In answer to the question as to what I think of these discussions I have to say, "Let every denomination settle its own disputes." Denominational controversies, like family quarrels, are seldom made any better by outside intermeddlers. The newspapers (God bless them!) have to take all denominations under editorial and reportorial discussion, for their field is the world. But churches, non-episcopal, will fail every time they try to tell our friends who believe in apostolic succession how many of us outsiders they ought to admit inside their chancel. So the Methodist Church will not be helped by those who believe in the eternal decrees when they try to tell the followers of John Wesley whether or not it has been decreed that women should be admitted within the gates of General Conference. Nor will those who were born once, or born again on the wrong side of Presbyterianism define how much liberty of thought and belief are to be allowed in the chairs of "Theological Seminaries." When Pædobaptists attempt to instruct the regular Baptists on the subject of close communion or free communion they only break up the communion of good wishes which long ago was established between those who are sprinkled and those who are immersed. In the associations, and consociations, and conventions, and general assemblies, these questions ought to be settled, and will be settled, if ever settled at all. Mind your own business, is advice as appropriate for religious sects as for individuals.

We only hope that when the aforesaid questions come up in the different ecclesiastical courts, a spirit of kindness and good sense may dominate. Religious wars always have been the bitterest wars. Adam Clarke said, long ago, "some people serve the Lord as though the devil were in them." Moderation and suavity in large doses ought to be prescribed for those who manage religious disputes. Even ministers sometimes lose their patience, and say things they are sorry for the rest of their lives. The apology for which is that the greatest draught of that profession is on the nervous system. They have to weep with so many sorrows, listen to so many stories of wrong, become the receptacles of so many tales of imposition, and have to attempt on comparatively small resources to relieve so many overwhelming necessities that their nerves after twenty years of pastorate become worn out fiddle-strings. When such ministers, exhausted in Christian service, gather together to discuss important questions, I am not surprised they sometimes lose their equipoise, and become inflammable, and recite the imprecatory Psalms of David with unusual emphasis.

Our prayer is that all the questions about to be legislated upon in the church courts may be under the Divine supervisal and guidance, and that from the controversies all the great denominations of Christians may come forth without damage, and better prepared than ever before, to do the work the Lord has assigned them. We cannot spare one of them, for all the hosts of the church militant we have words of cheer. Forward, the whole line!

THE GLORIOUS CHURCH.

I LOOK upon the Church of God as one vast hosanna. Joy dripping from the baptismal font, joy glowing in the sacramental cup, joy warbling in the anthem, joy beating against the gate of heaven with a hallelujah like the voice of mighty thunderings. Beautiful for situation! The joy of the whole earth is Mount Zion. It is the day and the place where Christ reviews his troops, bringing them out in companies and regiments and brigades, riding along the line, examining the battle-torn flags of past combat, and cheering them on to future victories. Oh, the joy of Christian assemblage!

A WONDERFUL FLOWER.

ONE of my parishioners brought me from the South a strange floral creation. It is called "The Flower of the Holy Ghost," and was brought from Panama. We never saw anything more tenderly beautiful. It is twice the size of an orange blossom, white as the snow on the morning of its descent, its aroma suggestive of Paradise. As your eye walks in under the dome of alabaster, you see a dove's head a little bowed, and with tinged beak; wings spread as if descending, the plumage seemingly sprinkled with coagulated blood. Underneath it is a crown, as though the dove had dropped it. To our eye the flower is an evangel. It seems as if it must be a blossom from the Tree of Life shaken over the wall by a breeze from heaven. Here is the dove of the Eternal Spirit descending, on its wing the blood of redemption to apply to the soul, which application being made, here is the crown of pardon, and life, and heaven to be set upon the brow. The flower comes from a warmer climate, and we wrap it up in cotton, and place it in a box. To-day or to-morrow it will die, but neither its delicate fragrance nor its Divine architecture can be forgotten. Some flowers are typical of pride, or human affection, or remembrance; but this stands in none of those groups. Hereafter there shall be a glorious Trinity for us in the Rose of Sharon, the Lily of the Valley, and the "Flower of the Holy Ghost."

BRIEF NOTES.

Owing to the pressure on our space this week, by the illustrations connected with the dedication of the new Brooklyn Tabernacle, we have to postpone publication of an excellent article by Rev. Thomas Harrison on "Shepherding the Lambs."

The Eleventh Annual Meeting of the Woman's Board of Missions of Cumberland Presbyterian Church will be held in Dallas, Texas, May 3d, 4th and 5th.

The Disciples under the labors of Messrs. Updike and Eaton, have just closed a glorious meeting at Des Moines, Iowa, with a large number of converts.

The returns of the census just completed show the population of the Empire of India, to be 285,000,000, being an increase of 30,000,000 since the last census taken in 1881.

Mr. James H. Cannon, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Evangelist, commenced services last Sunday in the Bethany M. E. Church, on First Avenue and 120th Street, New York, of which Rev. G. M. Compton is pastor.

The students of Williams College, Williamstown, Mass., are actively engaging in Evangelistic work in the neighborhood. There has been a marked revival of religious interest in the college since Evangelist Sayford labored there.

There are now seventy Extra-Cent-a-Day Associations. It is calculated that if all the Evangelical Christians of the United States who now contribute to Foreign Missions adopted the plan, nearly fifty million dollars would be available every year for mission work.

Rev. E. P. Telford's meetings at Providence, R. I., have been a success from the beginning. The ministers of the city say they have never seen the city so moved by revival meetings. The Baptist Church, seating one thousand persons, could not accommodate all who came.

The union meetings in Washington, D. C., conducted by Rev. E. Payson Hammond, continue with unabated interest. At one service, composed mainly of children and young people, about forty-five signed covenant cards as a token that they had decided to begin the Christian life.

Mr. W. Peck Smith, of Brooklyn, N. Y., has left the New York Stock Exchange to devote all his time to Christian service. He is about to visit London, England, to take part in a revival work which began last summer and which is still going on with most blessed results.

The American Board of Foreign Missions since its organization has sent to the foreign field 2026 missionaries. The record of the society work abroad shows 446 churches, which have counted a membership of 110,449 persons. Last year forty-two new missionaries were sent out, and twenty-four new churches built.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's Union Services at Haverhill, Mass., are being much blessed. The Academy of Music is filled to overflowing, and the meetings for men only are attended by immense audiences. The Baptist, Congregational and Methodist pastors united in calling a Convention of Christian Workers at Haverhill, which was held on April 15 and 16, two sessions each day. Mr. D. L. Moody and Mr. George C. Needham, were among the speakers.

Contribution to the fund for supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $53.50. From Fairmont, Minn., $10; Dudleyville, Ill., $1; Parnassus, Pa., $3.50; Fairbury, Ill., 50 cts.; Philadelphia, Pa., $4; Port Chester, N. Y., $2.50; Providence, R. ## CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Tour—Ravages of the Grip—A Western Commercial Congress—The Italian Troubles—European War—Clouds—Abuses in the Congo State—General Notes.

PRESIDENT HARRISON

has started on his Southern tour. He is accompanied by Mrs. Harrison and a special party, which includes Miss Wanamaker, Secretary of War, Proctor, and a few others. They are travelling in a special train, which, for fineness of equipment and multiplied conveniences, eclipses any ever used in a Presidential tour heretofore. At most of the cities where stops were made, there were speeches of welcome and a cordial reception by the citizens, the President replying in brief terms. At Knoxville, Tenn., there was a narrow escape from what might have been a serious accident. The President and friends had left the cars and were in carriages, when the horse drawing the vehicle occupied by Secretary Rusk took fright and bolted, crashing into the President's carriage. Mr. Rusk's carriage was wrecked. At Chattanooga the President re-visited war-time scenes, and he journeyed to Atlanta by the same route that Sherman followed on his famous "March to the Sea." Excepting at Atlanta, the demonstrations of welcome were uniformly enthusiastic; at the latter city they were courteous but cold. All along the line, preparations were made for a hearty reception to the nation's Chief Executive.

Our Dread Foreign Visitor, the Grip, is now practically epidemic in a score of cities, including New York, Brooklyn and Chicago. In the first, the death rate has gone up to over two hundred. In Brooklyn it is fully one hundred, and in the western city about one hundred and fifty. Other leading cities, North and West, have experienced an increase in proportion. Not in a generation has the death rate been so high as now. Many of the public schools, and private educational institutions in the East are closed. Health Boards are hopeful that with the advent of spring weather the mortality may be greatly diminished. England and France are also suffering a revival of the same malady, and in both the average death rate has doubled within the last fourteen days.

Simultaneously With the Unauthenticated rumor of the appointment of Explorer Stanley, as Governor of the Congo Free State, comes an attack on the conduct of King Leopold's present government in that part of Africa, which the civilized world has generally supposed to be ruled on Christian and humane principles. Col. Williams, a colored man of high intelligence, and who claims to write from personal acquaintance with the facts, accuses the rulers of the Congo State of the grossest abuses of power, even to the extent of buying and selling the blacks for the purpose of securing laborers and carriers. He declares that it is not uncommon for negroes to be beaten to death by Belgian officials, and that women and girls are seized and sold, or exchanged for carriers. King Leopold (whose portrait we give in this column), admits that many "sad things have taken place in Africa," but is loth to credit the specific charge against his officers. In any event, it will probably lead to an overhauling of the officials in question, who seem to have had very little sympathy with the real wishes of their king, whose goodness and worth are known all over Europe, and whose whole energy has for many years been devoted to the advancement of science and the improvement of his fellow-men, while other European monarchs have been dreaming of wars of conquest.

The First Commercial Congress ever held in the West assembled in Kansas City, last week, representatives being present from twenty-five States. Senator Kelley of Kansas was chosen as temporary chairman. On the opening day, a letter was read from President Harrison, in which he discussed the development of agricultural products, and the outlook for reciprocity with Central and South America, as furnishing new markets for meats, breadstuffs and manufactures. He declared also that nothing would so retard the restoration of the free use of silver by the commercial nations of the world, as American legislation placing this country on a basis of silver mono-metalism. The Congress discussed at several sessions the special needs of the West, the general sentiment of the speakers being that East and West should stand together and that the national Congress had hitherto legislated too much in favor of the East, and the creditor class. Edward Atkinson, Erastus Wiñan and other prominent Eastern men read papers before the Congress.

King Humbert of Italy and his Handsome queen, Marguerite, (whose portraits are given below), are at the present moment the two most talked-of rulers in Europe. Just what Humbert will do with respect to the Triple Alliance is the question that is puzzling the Cabinets of Germany and Austria, no less than those of England, France and Russia. Shall he join the Alliance and thus precipitate the inevitable war between Germany and Austria on the one hand, and France and Russia on the other, in the hope of adding a slice of territory to his possessions? Or shall he hold aloof and be prepared to benefit by the victory of France, should the Republic, with the aid of the Czar, scatter the armies of the German Kaiser? Italy's navy, next to those of England and France, is the finest in the world and, arrayed on the side of the Alliance, would cast the balance of military power in their favor.

Secretary Blaine's Reply to the Latest Note of the Italian government regarding the New Orleans affair, was sent to the Marquis Imperiali, Italy's acting Minister, on Tuesday last. It is voluminous and answers all the points raised in the note of Premier Rudini. Mr. Blaine clearly sets forth the rights of foreign residents, who, he declares, are not a favored class, and claims that under existing treaties, no compensation is due the victims at New Orleans. On receiving the reply by cable, Premier Rudini made a statement in the Italian Chamber to the effect that Italy would not accept the American view of the irresponsibility of the general government for the acts of States. There is little cause to fear any serious diplomatic rupture. The beligerent feeling has revived in some of the rural districts, where companies are being formed whose services will be tendered to the government at Washington in the event of war. Meanwhile, United States Minister Porter, at Rome, is authority for the statement that our official relations continue undisturbed, and that the prospects still point to a peaceful settlement.

Newfoundland has Appealed its Grievances to the Imperial Parliament and the delegation now in England representing the colonial interest is making every effort to secure such treatment as will hereafter discriminate in favor of French fishermen adversely to the people of Newfoundland themselves. The delegation includes Sir W. V. Whiteway, the Premier of the colony, Hon. A. W. Harvey, Hon. Moses Monroe, George H. Emerson, Speaker of the Legislative Assembly, and A. B. Morine, all very prominent and influential in colonial affairs.

Premier Whiteway, (whose portrait is published in this column,) is an Englishman by birth, but has spent most of his life in Newfoundland, where he has amassed a fortune in legal practice. He is by no means popular with the fishermen, who had expected that his administration would have made better times for all the colony. The address to Parliament is a very strong plea in opposition to the French naval interests, which are now more potent in the Newfoundland fishing grounds than those of the settlers themselves.

Death has Again Invaded the Domestic Circle of ex-Secretary Bayard, the victim being Count Reinhold Abraham Loewnhaupt, who, only a few weeks ago, married Miss Ella Bayard, the youngest daughter of the famous statesman. Within a few days the bridal pair were to have started for Sweden, where the Count intended to present his wife to his family, one of the noblest in that country. The young nobleman had been in America a little over a year, and was studying marine architecture, with a view to utilizing the knowledge on his return to Sweden. Overwork brought on an attack of typhoid fever from which he never rallied.

A Climax is Approaching in the Chilian Rebellion. After sustaining numerous reverses, more or less serious, at the hands of the insurgents, the forces of President Balmaceda have been routed disastrously at Copiapo, where 3,000 government troops were driven back with heavy loss, the town being occupied by the rebels. Copiapo is the capital of a wealthy mining province, and has a population of over 12,000. The insurgent army, greatly strengthened by desertions from the government ranks, is now about to advance simultaneously upon Santiago and Valparaiso.

There is a "Tempest in a Teapot" Raging among the Board of Lady Managers of the World's Fair Commission. Some time ago, Miss Phoebe Couzins, who has long been known in connection with the Suffrage movement, and who has practiced law for a number of years in the West, was appointed secretary of the Commission; but for some reason Mrs. Potter Palmer, wife of the Chicago millionaire, and other members of the Executive Committee, decided to remove Miss Couzins and this was done accordingly. The secretary, however, showed fight, and protested that the removal was arbitrary and unauthorized; she declined to vacate the offices and the result is a dead-lock in the Woman's Department of the World's Fair, which is costing the government in the neighborhood of $120 a day. Miss Couzins threatens to carry her case to Congress.

Our New Treaty With Spain has been Concluded, and it will presently be made public. It is understood that it will provide for the opening up of the markets of Cuba to American goods on a broad basis of reciprocity, a stipulation being that our markets should be open for free sugar, and that American flour should be admitted to Cuba at reduced rates. No concessions are made by our government beyond those contained in the McKinley tariff bill. Hon. John G. Foster represented America in the negotiations at Madrid.

THE STRANGE OVATION.

A NEW SERMON PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

A Triumph Unique in the Saviour's Life—Strange that it Had not Occurred Before—His Services Called for It—Jesus had Repressed Enthusiasm—The Fickleness of the Crowd—I, Jesus Triumphant in the Capital—Why He Permitted the Ovation—Constituted an Open Declaration of His Rank—Intimated a Claim—II. Glorified in His Church—III. Received in the Heart—Brought Joy.

"And the multitudes that went before, and that followed, cried, saying, Hosanna to the son of David: Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest." Matthew 21:9.

FOLLOWING the miracle of the raising of Lazarus, a great fame went abroad concerning our Lord. He rested still at Bethany, and the people who came up to the feast in great number went out—an easy walk from Jerusalem to Bethany—to see Jesus, and to see Lazarus, who had been raised from the dead. These people, on a certain day, formed a company, and marched with Jesus toward Jerusalem. On the way our Lord sent two of his disciples to fetch an ass and its colt; and upon this last he rode into the city. Another crowd, coming out of Jerusalem, met the company attending upon Jesus, and, forming one great procession, the whole multitude marched into the city escorting the Lord Jesus in humble state, and paying him honor as King in Zion. Upon no stately war-horse, but riding upon a colt the foal of an ass,

The Meek and Lowly King entered the city of David, attended by vast and enthusiastic crowds, who strewed the fronds of palms, and the branches of trees, and their own garments in the way along which he rode. Our Lord thus received a right royal and popular reception to the metropolis of his nation. This was a strange event, so very different from anything else that happened to our Saviour, that one wonders at it with great wonderment.

Assuredly, this honor paid to our Lord was passing strange; a gleam of sunlight in a day of clouds, a glimpse of summer-tide in a long and dreary winter. He that was, as a rule, "despised and rejected of men," was for the moment surrounded with the acclaim of the crowd. All men saluted him that day with their Hosannas, and the whole city was moved. It was a gala day for the disciples, and a sort of coronation day for their Lord.

Why was the scene permitted? What was its meaning? The marvel is, that the like had not occurred before; for our Lord had healed many sick folk, and these and their friends must have felt favorably toward him. He had fed thousands at a time with the bread of this life, and hosts had been cheered and comforted by his teaching. The common people heard him gladly, and were ready to gather around him. Among an excitable people it was a wonder that they had not long ago taken him by force, and made him a king.

Avoiding Popularity.

It was the Lord himself who had suppressed the popular enthusiasm. With great skill he had succeeded in bridling a dangerous fanaticism. He, with a masterly art, repressed everything that would have made him a popular hero. He uttered unpalatable truth, or he stole away from the scene of his miracles, or he kept himself in obscure villages, and thus he eluded their honors. When he had fed the multitudes, he took ship, and went to the other side of the lake, that they might not follow him. Many men live for ambitious ends, but our Lord lived to escape the honors of men.

It came at last, you see: I have read you the story in John and in Matthew. They saluted him with their shouts of loyal welcome. But there was little in the acclamation when it did come. There was great shouting for the while, and abundant strewing of branches, and lining of the road with garments; but there was little else. Remember what happened less than a week afterward! If not the same individuals, yet people of the same city cried, "Crucify him, crucify him." The hosannas may be very loud, but they will not be long. "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord," sounds very sweetly; but how much more vehement will be the cry, "Let him be crucified!" Everything which comes to Jesus and his cause by requires at all times to be duly weighed; and when weighed it will be found wanting. "Vox populi vox Dei" they used to say; but the saying is false: the voice of the people may seem to be the voice of God when they shout "Hosanna in the highest;" but whose voice is it when they yell out, "Crucify him, crucify him?"

So little value did our Lord place on popular applause that he repressed it; and when it did burst forth, so little did it elevate his spirit that we find him in the midst of it, gazing upon the city with tears in his eyes. While others were glad, he was weeping for the woes which his prophetic eye foresaw. It may seem good that the Christian minister should be popular, but popularity is lighter than vanity. Once the Saviour rides in state as a King, but soon he walks down those very streets bearing his cross like a criminal. How soon is the public voice purchased for evil! What dependence can be placed on the clamor of the streets?

I. First, I ask you to view

Christ Triumphant in Jerusalem.

Why this procession? Why these shouts of homage? Our Lord always had a reason, and an excellent one, for all that he arranged or permitted. What meant he by this? How shall we interpret the scene? I think it was, first, that he might most openly declare himself. He had frequently avowed his mission in plain speech; he had told them who he was, and why he came; but they would not hear; so that they dared to say to him, "If thou be the Christ tell us plainly." He had plainly told them times without number. Now he will assure them still more positively of his kingdom by openly riding into the city of Jerusalem in state. Now shall they see that he claims to be the Messiah, sent of God of whom the prophet said, "Say ye to the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy salvation cometh." Therefore he permitted this great gathering and this honorable attention to himself, that he might say to Israel by deeds as well as by words, "I am he that should come." Thus he beyond all question manifested himself to the people. When they crucified him the rulers knew what he professed to be. Albeit many of them were in ignorance as to the truthfulness of his claims, yet they knew right well that they were crucifying one who professed to be the Lord of glory, one who was acknowledged to be the son of David, one who had in public avowed himself to be King in Zion. I think this was one reason for the joyous

Entry into the City of God.

Next, it was our Lord's public claiming of authority over Israel. He was the son of David, and therefore he was by natural right the King of the Jews. As King he rode to his capital, and entered his palace. In his priestly royalty the Son of God went to his Father's house, to the temple of sacrifice and sovereignty. Among the tribes of Israel he is seen to be "one chosen out of the people," whom the Lord had given to be a leader and commander for the people. Although they might afterward choose Barabbas, and cry that they had no king but Cæsar, yet Jesus was their King, as Pilate reminded them, when he said, "Shall I crucify your king?" and as his cross declared when it bore the legal inscription, "This is Jesus the King of the Jews." Before his trial and his condemnation he had put in a public claim to the rights and prerogatives of Zion's king, whom God has set upon his holy hill.

Nor have I exhausted the Saviour's reasons. We are told by the evangelist that he did this that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet. I have just now quoted the text from Zechariah 9:9. Our Lord was ever careful and earnest to fulfil each prophecy of Holy Scripture. He held the inspired Word in high esteem, and was careful of each letter of it. You never hear a word from him derogatory of the inspiration, authority, accuracy, or infallibility of the law and the prophets. He fulfils the Word of the Lord even to its jots and tittles. He directed his life by that old chart, in which the way of the Messiah was laid down long before he came to earth. Oh, for the same reverence of Scripture among preachers, nowadays!

I think also that as our Lord thus looked back and fulfilled Scripture, he was looking forward to give us a prophetic type of the future. Beloved, our Lord will not always be rejected. There are days of triumph for him. "The stone which the builders refused is become the headstone of the corner." This is the age of iron, but there comes

A Golden Age of Love and Light.

We look for his appearing and his reign; his reign of peace and joy. There will come a day when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ. He shall sit upon the throne of his father David, and of his kingdom there shall be no end. The Lord shall reign for ever and ever. We see, then, in the simple state of our Lord in the streets of Jerusalem, a vision of the long glories which await him in the New Jerusalem, where he shall sit upon his throne, and his enemies shall be made his footstool.

One thing more I cannot help mentioning: surely, our Lord allowed the populace a vent for their enthusiasm with the desire to delight his friends. Do you not think that the sympathetic Jesus thought it worth while to give his little band of followers what our forefathers would have called "a gaudy day"—a high day, a holiday? These had been with him in his humiliation, and he would give them a taste of his glory. They had seen him despised and rejected of men; and he relieved the monotony of his humiliation with a glimpse of his glory. For once they should be allowed to cast their garments under his feet and strew fragrant branches on his path. For once their zeal should have license to climb the trees and break down the boughs to strew his pathway. Nothing on that day filled their ears but the praises of their loved Lord and their honored Master. They would soon have enough sorrow when they would see him seized in the garden and taken away bound to Caiaphas and Pilate to be condemned to die. He would give them a breathing space, an interval of pleasure, wherein their spirits should no longer drag on earth, but rise on wings, into a lofty joy. Our Lord loves his people to be glad.

II. Secondly, my text is to my mind a parable of Christ

Glorified in his Church.

There are choice days when the shout of a King is heard in our assemblies. I think that such days come to the Church of God after special miracles of grace have been wrought. Lazarus is raised from the dead, and when the people thus see the greatness of the Prophet of Nazareth, they begin to commend and extol him, and this leads on to holy excitement. If the Lord will be pleased to work remarkable conversions among us, we shall have grand times. What joy there is in saintly hearts when ring-leaders in sin become champions for truth! Oh, that our God would work such transformations in this city! Pray, my brothers and sisters, that the Lord will do the like for us, and for all his churches just now. Oh, for displays of his power to quicken the dead! Oh, for Lazarus to be raised, and to live among us as a wonder of grace whom neighbors would come to see. O Lord, give us this signal of delight!

It is also a cheering sign when there is a general eagerness among the people concerning our Lord. When the disciples gather around their Master, and are prompt to do his bidding, then good times are come. When we are all ready, each man, each woman ready, to take our share in the harvesting, then will the sheaves be garnered. It is cheering when the congregation shares the excitement with the church and its ministers, and the prospect of a divine blessing is before the mind of all who seek better things. Surely, the time to favor Zion, yea, the set time has come, when her King is longed for, and every heart beats high with love of him.

The case is clear when all this is attended with an abounding generosity. It is well when disciples are not only willing to fetch another man's colt, but are willing to lay their own garments thereon; when they will not only gather palm fronds to strew the path, but will take off their own coats to carpet the way of the King. When everybody does something, or gives something, or at any rate joins in the hearty Hosannas, then is the King come into our midst.

The Children's Share.

Beloved, we must not forget that it is a token of God's having come to his church and of his having given her a joyful day, when the children share in it. Luther was greatly encouraged when he found that the children met together for prayer. He said, "God will hear them." The devil himself cannot defeat us now the children begin to pray." It is very beautiful to read Mr. Whitefield's remarks about his sermons at Moorfields and elsewhere in London, when mud and stones were cast upon him, and yet a group of children always surrounded his pulpit; and though some of them were hurt, yet he noticed how bravely they stood by him through the service. He thought it a token for good that children drank in his words. When God moves the children to earnestness, he will soon move their fathers and mothers.

I want you to notice in our text, that our Saviour was received with a shout of Hosanna! The best interpretation I can give is—"Save, oh, save! Save, oh, save!" Different nations have different ways of expressing their good will to their monarchs. A Roman would have shouted, "Io triumphe!" The Persians said, "O King, live for ever." The Jews cried, "Hosannah!" "Save," or, "God save the King!" The French have their "Vivas," by which they mean, "Long live the man." Hosanna is tantamount to all these. It is a shout of homage, welcome, and loyalty. It wishes wealth, health, and honor to the king. In the Saxon we say, "Hurrah;" in Hebrew, "Hosanna, Hosanna, the King is come. Save him, O Lord! Save us through him! Long live the King!" We never cease to pray, "Thy kingdom come; thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven." Let us then cry, Hosanna!

III. I have only a little time for my third point, and yet it is of great importance. Christ

Received in the Heart.

His triumphant ride into Jerusalem was a type of his entering the renewed heart. On that day, when Christ came up from Bethany, the city gates were wide open. We read nothing about them, because they were not in the way; they were no shut gates to him. He rode into Jerusalem without let or hindrance. Are your gates wide open this morning? If not, I would say, "Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors: and the King of glory shall come in." He is willing to abide in your hearts, and go no more out for ever; be sure that your gates are set wide before him. You must receive Jesus willingly, or not at all. He comes to reign; but he comes in the gentleness of love. He rides on no high mettled charger, he lays his hand on no sharp sword which clatters at his side, about him are no men-at-arms, behind him come no heavy guns, dragged along the trembling streets. Jesus was willingly received: everyone exultingly welcomed him. Will you so receive Jesus? Has he made you willing in the day of his power? You may well salute him, and welcome him to your heart and your home; for you have never before received so blessed a guest. Set open wide the gates, and entreat him to come in; for he will bring heaven with him. He never uses force; he conquers only by love.

His entrance caused great joy. No man's heart was made heavy that day. The face of the King frowned on none. Other kings have found it needful to force their way through crowds of rebels to their capital, and wade through slaughter to a throne; but none was found to hurt or devour in all the holy mountain when Jesus came to Zion. Women have been ravished, men have been murdered, even babes have been massacred when monarchs have entered cities; but when our King cometh, boughs and palm fronds, shouts and songs, are the setting of a very different scene. Instead of shrieks and groans, we hear the ringing music of children, with their glad Hosannas. Oh, will you not admit the Lord Jesus? Who will refuse an entrance to one who brings with him joy and peace?

As a Reformer.

But I must tell you one thing which I am sure will not damp your ardor, if you are in a right state. If Jesus comes into your souls he will come as a Reformer. He will make your heart a temple, and out of it he will drive the buyers and sellers, and all else that would pollute the soul. With his scourge of small cords he will whip out many a naughty thing from the heart which he makes his temple. Ay, let the thieves go! If your heart has been made a den of thieves by evil desires, should not these be chased out without mercy? So let it be. Welcome thou great Refiner! Fain would we lose our dross.

Last of all, you that have not yet received him, we want you to join with the rest of us in honoring him and glorifying him as he comes into your heart. "Oh!" saith one, "if he will only come into my heart I will indeed praise him." Have your Vivas ready! Receive the Lord Jesus Christ with all honors. Mention his name with rejoicing. Have your Hurrah ready to welcome the King, the Conqueror, as he enters your soul. Be jubilant! Be enthusiastic! Rejoice that such a one as he should come to dwell with such a one as you, and bring such a blessing with him. Praise him! Praise him! Extol him in the highest heavens! Then pray to him. "Save, Lord! Save, oh, save!"

RESCUED AND KEPT.

It would be difficult to conceive of a clearer proof of God's power and willingness to keep those who put their trust in him, than is furnished by the letters which are received from time to time by Mr. Charles A. Bunting, the Superintendent of the Home for Intemperate Men in New York. The method pursued in this Home, has been already described in this journal. No recourse is had to medicines, the sufferer is not required to sign any pledge; but he is led to trust in Jesus for salvation and to rely on his power to keep him from falling. That he does not trust in vain there is abundant evidence.

In 1884 a merchant from Montreal, was living in New York, in a pitiable condition. He had fallen into the lowest depths of degradation. He was separated from his wife and family, who had lost all hope of his deliverance from the power of the intoxicating cup. He was penniless and hopeless. He was received into the Home and encouraged to look to Christ for help. He did so, and after remaining for a time went home to Montreal with a new hope in his breast. Last year he wrote: "Six years have passed and I can yet say 'Jesus keeps me still' in the midst of varied temptations."

Another case was that of a man who was introduced to the Home by one who had had personal experience of what it could do under God's blessing. He, too, was rescued, and he now writes: "I am very glad to be able to tell you that at no time since leaving you, though exposed to the usual temptations, have I tasted a drop of anything stronger than coffee, nor, I am thankful to add, have I experienced any desire so to do. I feel more encouraged for the future than at any time for the past ten years, and my heart turns with grateful remembrance to the source of my new inspiration for good, under the blessing of God."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

The War of 1812.*

THE American declaration of war against England on July 18, 1812, annoyed those European nations which were gathering their utmost resources for resistance to Napoleon's attack. Russia could not but regard it as an unfriendly act, equally bad for political and commercial interests. Spain and Portugal whose armies were fed largely, if not chiefly, on American grain imported by British money under British protection, dreaded to see their supplies cut off. Germany, waiting only for strength to recover her freedom, had to reckon against one more element in Napoleon's vast military resources. England needed to make greater efforts in order to maintain the advantages she had gained in Russia and Spain. Even in America no one doubted the sincerity of England's wish for peace; and if Madison and Monroe insisted in her acquiescence in their terms, they insisted because they believed that their military position entitled them to expect it. The re-conquest of Russia and Spain by Napoleon, an event almost certain to happen, could hardly fail to force from England the concessions, not in themselves unreasonable, which the United States required. This was, as Madison to the end of his life maintained, a fair calculation; but it was exasperating to England, who thought that America ought to be equally interested with Europe in overthrowing the military depotism of Napoleon, and should not conspire with him for gain.

At first the new war disconcerted the feeble ministry that remained in office after the death of Spencer Perceval: they counted on preventing it, and did their utmost to stop it after it was begun. The tone of arrogance which had so long characterized Government and press, disappeared for the moment. Castlereagh did not abandon the hope of peace until Jonathan Russell, on August 24, reported to him the concessions which the President required antecedent to negotiation—the stoppage of impressments, dismissal of impressed seamen, indemnity for spoliation, and abandonment of paper blockades. The British Secretary intimated that he thought these demands, as conditions precedent to an armistice, somewhat insulting; and in conversation he explained to Russell that such concessions would merely cost the Ministry their places without result. Russell then proposed an informal understanding, adding of his own accord, without authority from his Government, a proposal, afterward adopted by Congress, that the United States should naturalize no more British seamen. Castlereagh made the obvious reply that an informal understanding offered no more guarantee to England than a formal one; that it had the additional disadvantage of bearing on its face a character of disguise; that in any case the discussion of guarantees must precede the understanding; and that Russell had on this subject neither authority nor instructions. The correspondence closed September 19, and Russell left England; but not until October 13, after learning that the President had refused to ratify the armistice made by Prevost with Dearborn did the British Government order general reprisals; and even this order closed with a proviso that nothing contained therein should affect the previous authority given to Admiral Sir John Borlase Warren to arrange a cessation of hostilities.

brought news that the British fleet consisting of eight or ten ships-of-the-line and frigates, was in the river, sixty miles below, making its way up the difficult channel to Washington. A reasonable, and well-grounded fear took possession of the city. On July 21, Serurier wrote to his Government: "Everyone is making ready to move. I know that they are secretly packing up at the Departments. I have as yet sent nothing away, in order not to show distrust of the Government's power, but I have got ready my most valuable papers, and from the moment the President shall quit his residence, I shall follow where he goes, with my principal portfolios in one of my carriages." The British ships were approaching the city; the sound of their guns was believed to be heard; and the Government had little means of stopping them. Every man prepared for volunteer duty; other work was suspended. On July 15, the House of Representatives ordered a Fast, and went into secret session to consider modes of defence.

THE PEOPLE'S PALACE IN JERSEY CITY.

The Philanthropic Christian Movement Initiated by Dr. John L. Scudder to Promote the Welfare of the Poor.

CHRISTIAN men who are grappling with the problem of "How to reach the masses," may get some light on the subject by visiting the Tabernacle in Jersey City, N. J., and having a talk with its pastor. They will there see in operation an earnest, well-conceived, and practical effort to make Christianity a real blessing to the poor. The Tabernacle, standing on the corner of York and Henderson Streets, is in the midst of a population which needs all the help that religion and philanthropy can give. Men and women live in the tenements around that spot, who must work hard early and late, to earn the barest necessities of life, and who count themselves fortunate if they are not prevented working by sickness or accident or the caprice of an employer. They cannot save money; and they expect no rest on this side of the grave. Such people are apt to think that religion is not for them but for the well-to-do classes who can spare time to attend to it. They gain a new view of it when they go to the Tabernacle.

Dr. John L. Scudder, the pastor, is a son of the famous missionary to India, Dr. Henry Martyn Scudder, and was born in 1853. He graduated from Yale in 1874 and thence proceeded to Union Theological Seminary. In 1882, he became pastor of the First Congregation Church in Minneapolis, where he did excellent work among the students of the Minnesota State University. Four years later he settled in Jersey City and commenced his present work. The past four years have been years of arduous and consecrated labor with him. His firm belief is that religion should cover the entire man and not the spiritual part alone, for man is a composite and the spiritual nature can be reached by a variety of avenues. His aim was to prevent sin by keeping the boys off the streets, the young men out of the saloons, and interesting the girls in sewing, housekeeping, cooking, etc. Gaining the good will of the young people, his efforts were directed to bringing them to a saving knowledge of Christ. Bible readings, young people's meetings, and the Sunday School were brought to a high state of efficiency, and then he felt that he had made a beginning. Proceeding along this line he extended the field of his operations. A free public library was established, an amusement hall opened, a band and orchestra organized and other means adopted to render the Tabernacle a place of entertainment and delight as well as of instruction. Every effort, whether seemingly secular, or religious has been made in the name of Christ and in his spirit, and everything has been done to point to the Cross. The plans succeeded and the Tabernacle is now the largest Congregational church in the State.

The "People's Palace," Jersey City, N. J.

Dr. Scudder is now taking another step which promises a still larger blessing. He has secured several lots adjacent to the Tabernacle on which he proposes to erect a "People's Palace," a picture of which is here given. It is to contain baths, a dispensary for the needy sick, a day nursery for working mothers, a kindergarten for neglected children, a clothing department, where contributions of slightly worn apparel can be sorted and kept in readiness for the worthy poor, a coffee-house and wood-yard attachment, a penny-bank, a newsboys' home, a boarding-house for working-girls, a manual training-school supplying instruction in various branches, enabling the rising generation to become intelligent workers and obtain an honest livelihood, and other aids for the welfare of the poor. All this will cost about $150,000. A considerable part of this sum has already been contributed, and Dr. Scudder believes that the whole will be furnished. Wealthy Christian men who endow colleges for the benefit of the few can scarcely fail to give a little to the support of an institution for the benefit of the many, whose need is more urgent; nor can the philanthropist find a better object for his gifts than one that will provide an attractive and effectual refuge from the saloon and other forms of vice. But the fact that it is a genuine Christian—that is Christ-like—work is its strongest claim. The poor are his representatives on earth, and in alleviating their woe, in helping them bear their burdens, and in leading them to trust in him his followers show, better than in any other way, their love for him and the extent to which they have entered into his spirit. We heartily wish Dr. Scudder god-speed in his effort and sincerely hope that the funds he needs will be speedily in his hands.

THE MASSACRE OF MANIPORE.

Not since the terrible mutiny of 1857, has so heavy a calamity befallen the British forces in India as that which is now reported. The British Government in India does not confine its attention to the territory it holds there, but takes a lively interest in the affairs of its immediate neighbors. It has treaties with the native princes who rule the states which lie on its frontiers and in some cases has pledged itself to maintain them on their thrones.

The present trouble had an origin of this kind. England was pledged to support the Maharajah Chandra Kirti Singh in his government of Manipore, a native state north-east of the Bay of Bengal and south of Assam. Last year was the fortieth year of his reign and some of his subjects, losing patience, broke out in insurrection and deposed him. He appealed to the English to help him regain his throne. Mr. J. W. Quinton, the Chief Commissioner of Assam, who was the nearest English official, to him, promptly set out to his assistance with a force of 470 native Goorkha soldiers commanded by English officers. His first step on arriving in Manipur territory was to form a camp and summon all the native chiefs to a Durbar or conference to discuss the situation and, if possible, to arrange for a peaceable restoration of the Maharajah to his throne. The insurgents however, apprehending hostilities made a night attack on the camp. The Goorkhas defended themselves bravely, but their ammunition was soon exhausted and they were ruthlessly put to death. The Commissioner and the English officers were also killed and their bodies thrown to the dogs. The insurgents then marched to attack another force which was hastening to the support of the Commissioner under Lieut. Grant. They met the force at Thobal, where Lieut. Grant had entrenched himself in an old mud fort. There a desperate fight ensued in which the insurgents, though outnumbering Lieut. Grant's troops nearly twenty to one, were utterly routed and their leader killed.

The State of Manipore, which will now probably be annexed to British India, contains about 250,000 inhabitants. It is a thriving province, the people being noted for their skill as weavers, saddlers and metal workers. They also breed a famous kind of ponies which command high prices in the markets of India. The accompanying illustration, which represents three types of Manipuris, is taken from a photograph secured by a press correspondent.

Types of the Warriors of Manipore.

"Gibbon says that there were 50,000 Christians in Rome," said Goldthorpe.

They threaded their way along narrow passages, flanked on either hand by niches cut in the rock where had lain one or more bodies. Other passages crossed the one in which they were, and occasionally, there was a place large enough for a number of persons to sit or stand. A chapel, the guide explained: the slab covering the sarcophagus at one end, serving for an altar. There were columns partly cut from the rock, low, arched ceilings, and, now and then, a fresco of a Scripture scene.

"Were these burial-places private, or public," asked Mrs. Gordon.

"I think," said Margaret, who had stopped to notice a "Chi Ro" that formed the monogram of Christ the Redeemer, appearing often on the tombs, "at first they were the property of people of some means, who built their tombs un- their gardens and vineyards, and shared them with others. I believe they were never used after the capture of the city by Alaric in 410."

"The church used to bury the dead at night," remarked Carolyn, her thought swinging back with characteristic persistence, to the Catacombs, after a glance at the historic mountain.

"I have read that their processions were grimly dismal," said Camilla, "after they got beyond the persecutions, and their faith began to decline; priests and paupers, hired for the occasion, carrying the dead along in a rough, heartless way, their torches flaring in the night wind, and their guttural chant hideously doleful. My people have a horror of death. They dread the purgatorial fire into which they expect to plunge; and then those old-time funerals may have made it worse. It will be different when the light of faith is shot through the gloom."

When the young ladies were driving home, they met a band of music escorting a hearse belonging to the civil authorities. It stopped at the door of a church.

"That is strange," said Camilla. Civil funerals never have priests, nor go to churches.

They got out of the cab and went into the church, one of the plainer edifices of which there are many in Rome.

The church pall was thrown over a plain, board box, in which lay the dead man, in centre of the dimly-lighted building. Rough men holding large, flaring, dripping candles stood around the coffin. Priests chanted and sprinkled holy water in an officially heartless way. After about an hour of these exercises, the pall was taken off the box, which was hurried into the hearse. The band began to play and the little procession moved off toward the cemetery.

Camilla asked a woman who was knitting before her shop-door beside the church, how a civil funeral came to stop at a church. "It is unusual," she said.

"Yes, signorina," replied the woman with a shrug, "but these are unusual times. We are not quite out of the old, nor yet in the new." Then she went on to explain with many words that the dead man's fraternity wanted a civil funeral. His brothers favored it also; but his wife was afraid of her confessor. "The priests," she added, crossing herself with a shrug, "the priests and the woman carried the day, as you have seen."

That evening our young ladies were invited to meet some English and American friends at the house of a Mrs. Payne, who had been a resident of Rome for a number of years.

Margaret had a few moments' talk with the pastor of the soldiers' church who recognized her as having attended the service one Sabbath evening, a few weeks before. "Strangers often come to see us," he said. "Our church is unique, all of soldiers. I remembered your being there because you looked very ill when you went out. I had just been interrupted in my sermon. Possibly you remember."

"Oh, yes," said Margaret, mustering all her strength in an effort to appear indifferent, "I know nothing about your soldiers: so, of course, I couldn't understand the matter."

"The men are trained to rise, and salute a superior officer," said the Cavaliere. "They are always respectful and attentive; but that night when Major Buonanno came in they rose mechanically and saluted him. He is a splendid fellow. His presence is worth more than a sermon, the men think so much of his soldierly and Christian character. Oh, there is Guilfi. I must see him. Have you met him?"

Margaret replied in the negative. She wanted of all things to ask if Major Buonanno was an American. Was he at Dogali? Had he a family? But her tongue clave to the roof of her mouth. She made some little, commonplace remark about Guilfi's handsome face and form, which served as a spur to the Italian's volubility. "Has not Signorina Mattioli told you? She met him at my house one day when she called to make some inquiry about—a mutual acquaintance. Now I recall, it was the day after you were at our chapel."

"Indeed!" and Margaret followed the clue of recollection till she re-called the gentleman who picked up Camilla's handkerchief when their train was standing by the platform

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

N old, slipshod brother, in a long, grey gown, led the party through a side door, and down a flight of rough steps to the Catacombs, after giving each a lighted piece of candle-wick dipped in tallow or wax.

"The burial-places of the early Christians," remarked Mrs. Gordon. "Really, I cannot imagine anything more intensely interesting. Many a time I have pictured to myself the little procession of early saints who have gone down into the heart of the earth, as it were, to lay away their dead. They must have gone down these very steps, steep and narrow as they are."

"Yes," said Carolyn, "and three or four flights below these. The Catacombs are five stories deep, you know, in some places. It must have seemed frightful to leave one's friends away down here."

"No," said Margaret. "You must not forget that their hope of the resurrection was like the brightest noon compared with the midnight gloom that their former pagan notions threw about death. Don't you see you read always along here that they rest 'in hope,' 'in peace,' 'in joy?'" pointing to the rudely lettered and sculptured tablets. "Their anchor means hope, the dove, peace, and the palm-branch, victory."

"There must have been a great many of them," said Carolyn. "Their tombs are said to have been enough to reach 350 miles in a straight line—the whole length of Italy."

in Turin. She looked again in his direction, and was half piqued and half amused to see him bending toward Camilla in animated conversation, with all his soul frankly beaming in the eyes that she had criticized. Forgetting her own love-affair in her care of her friend, she asked if Signor Guilfi had not been a priest.

"Yes," replied the pastor. "In Sicily, though a Roman by birth and education. At twenty-six,—you know that is before young men are usually fairly in the saddle, he was at the head of a cathedral with nine canons, and rector of a school for the education of priests. He was tremendously popular as a preacher, and one day he was converted under one of his own sermons. It was on the passion of our Lord. Then there was trouble. A while after, the government claimed the privilege of inspecting the school, and the priests would not allow it: then the institution was closed; and Guilfi was glad to escape to England. He has been up north preaching to the soldiers. He has been preaching to Major Buonanno's men: though I am inclined to think that Buonanno is the better preacher of the two. I must go at once and ask him when the Major is coming back to Rome, if you will kindly excuse me."

That night in the fifth story on the corner of Via Torino and Via Cavour, there were two pairs of eyes that were hardly closed till dawn, though their owners for many reasons, occult and manifest, kept their own counsel.

Perhaps it was Mr. Pelham's letter, telling his nieces that he would be down in a few days for a glance at Rome, and then they would slip up to Paris for a peep at the Exposition which would have itself unpacked by that time,—perhaps it was the letter, and perhaps it was something else, that set our maidens off bright and early with a full programme for the day. The contented Carolyn was going with the Gordons to Tivoli, so three others set forth toward St. Peter's and the Vatican. It was clear to Camilla that while Margaret was waiting patiently for direct word from her lost friend, she was availing herself of Galen's "prime remedy, occupation."

"Isn't it strange how the superlative things of the world are crowded into a little space about this cathedral?" exclaimed Margaret as they went into St. Peter's. "This is the greatest church. Close by is the Pinacoteca, the greatest gallery,—the Transfiguration, called the greatest picture, you know,—the Last Judgment, the greatest fresco,—the Apollo Belvidere, the god in marble,—and the Laocoon, the idealization of pain. The popes, with all their priestly vows of poverty, have managed to get for themselves the masterpieces of every art."

Camilla responded with one of her dainty palm-spreading shrugs; while Marie's bright, childlike eyes were wide with a new thought.

"I do not care to haf my poor, leetle head filled viz ze horrid mummies," she said as they stepped into the Egyptian museum.

"Don't you want to see again the cat that may have purred under the stroking of little Prince Moses?" asked Margaret laughing.

"You remember what that German burgher said to his wife, when we were here the other day," laughed Camilla, "about the cats four thousand years old."

"Shall we look at the Gobelins again," asked Margaret. "Made only for kings' palaces, a year's work on each square yard. The old man in this Vatican has that long gallery hung with them. Shall we go in there again?"

"Zey are ze wonderful pictures in silk and vool," said Marie wrinkling her forehead. "But my head vill not hold all ze magnificence. Let us not go there."

"Well, my little one," said Margaret, "we'll take the mosaics, if that pleases you." So to the mosaics they went. They passed through rooms the sides of which were covered with cabinets of material, 28,000 shades, they were informed. "The little blocks of coloring," the custodian said, "are made of metals, ground, mixed, and hardened by chemical processes; each has to be ground into exact shape to fit the place where its shade is needed."

In the room where the artists were at work several men were busy, each with his little grindstone beside his bench.

"How long does it take to make so large a piece as that?" asked Margaret of a young man who was copying Guido Reni's St. Peter.

"About seven years," was the reply. "That one," pointing to a portrait of Leo XIII., life-size, "working every day, one could do that one in a year and a half."

In making a picture, they were told, the first thing was to spread on a great surface about three-quarters of an inch of plaster of Paris, and over that a sort of putty in which the bits of coloring were set.

"Who was it, my queen," asked Margaret, "that called the mosaic the true paintings of eternity?"

"Ghirlandjo, was it not?" replied Camilla. "It seems a right word when one notices how they kept their color; those on the church of St. Prase, for example."

"You mean the little church in which we found the tomb of the woman bishop," said Margaret. "Yes, that is the one," replied Camilla. "You know we said that in the early church, women were not only 'ministrae,' as Pliny calls them, but 'episcopae.' I made a note of that, because my father believed that the degeneracy of the church came partly from the subjection of its women,

That Tired Feeling

SCOTT'S EMULSION

Of Pure Cod Liver Oil with Hypophosphites Of Lime and Soda.

There are emulsions and emulsions, and there is still much skimmed milk which masquerades as cream. Try as they will many manufacturers cannot so disguise their cod liver oil as to make it palatable to sensitive stomachs. Scott's Emulsion of PURE NORWEGIAN COD LIVER OIL, combined with Hypophosphites is almost as palatable as milk. For this reason as well as for the fact of the stimulating qualities of the Hypophosphites, Physicians frequently prescribe it in cases of living them to use their strength in second-hand ruling through fanaticism and intrigue."

"If one mouses about in this old treasure-house of eternal pictures," said Margaret, "there are plenty of strange bits of history to be found."

"Those mosaics on St. Praxede are more than 1,000 years old," said Camilla, "and they are as bright as ever."

After luncheon the young ladies went down Via Cavour, and up some stone-steps at the left, under a long, low arch that brought them out upon the piazza in front of San Pietro in Vincoli.

"This church has stood here nearly fourteen centuries," remarked Camilla, looking around, as they entered.

"Shall we ask to see the Holy Chains before we take our little chat with dear, old Moses?" asked Margaret.

"A bitter sarcasm," said Camilla; "the holy chains at the elbow of the statue of him who liberated the world from anarchy."

The keeper of the chains opened their shrine and costly casket, and brought to view a rough, rusty old chain that looked as though it might have done service at a backwood's hogging-bee. He informed them that these were two chains that bound St. Peter in the Mamertine Prisons. The leniency of both was established beyond doubt, he said for when they were brought near each other they sprang together and welded themselves. This great edifice was built for them; and the church kept its day of their soldering as a feast.

Kings and queens have paid well for a few filings from them; and no matter how much is filed away, they grow again, so that they never become less. A box near the statue of Moses bore the inscription, "Alms for the worship of the holy chains."

"I would not worship shains!" cried Marie. "I would rather worship him who sets the people free from sins."

"If Michelangelo had finished the tomb of which this Moses was to have been a part," said Margaret, "it could have told a mighty tale, with its forty figures."

"It is strange that the pope himself should be in so subordinate an attitude," said Camilla. "Somebody has called him a conqueror in the robes of a priest, hearing the thunder of cannon in the music of the psalms."

"Michelangelo adored muscular strength," said Margaret, as they gazed at themselves before the statue. "Just look at the arm and knee. They are those of a desert shepherd."

"I wish we could see his mouth," said Camilla. "I am sure it is kind expression."

"The beard," remarked Margaret, "hides the corners of the mouth. A countryman of mine says that there where that awkward fowl, self-consciousness, makes her nest."

"Vat kind of a nose has he?" Marie lowered her voice a trifle, as if she were afraid the statue might not be so scanned.

"It is less aquiline than the Hebrew," replied Margaret, "less exquisitely sensuous than the Greek, and without the dominance of the Roman. It has the best lines of each."

"But his eyes, my queen, his eyes!" said Camilla enthusiastically. "They are as open as those of a child, as devout as a saint's, as keen as a sage's, and as remote as a seer's. Some one says that they have in them the light of the burning bush, a majesty of anger as of a passionate being, drunk with fire: yet a little child would not be afraid to lay his head on that breast, or bend for the caress of that large hand."

"The secret of the world's enfranchisement is in that face," said Margaret reverently. "They who do good work for God must, like him, forget themselves so fully in their work that they will not think of making for themselves a house, or a succession. He was so loyal to the truth that he could say, though the meekest man that ever lived, the Christ was to be like him."

"Garibaldi and Gavazzi were like him," said Camilla, "but a greater than they must come to set my Italy completely free."

"God send him right speedily," said Margaret, as they rose and walked toward the door.

WEAVING.

BY S. L. CUTHBERT.

YES, I'm a weaver, and each day
The threads of life I spin,
And be the colors what they may,
I still must weave them in.

With morning light there comes the thought,
As I my task begin—
My Lord to me new threads has brought,
And bids me "weave them in."

Sometimes he gives me threads of gold,
To brighten up the day;
Then sombre tints, so bleak and cold,
That change the gold to gray.

His love, alas! I oft forget
When these dark threads I spin,
That cause me grief and pain, but yet
He bids me "weave them in."

And so my shuttle swiftly flies,
With threads both gold and gray;
And on I toil till day-light dies,
And fades in night away.

Oh when my day of toil is o'er,
And I shall cease to spin;
He'll open wide my Father's door,
And bid me rest within.

There safe at home in heavenly light,
How clearly I shall see
That every thread, the dark, the bright,
Each one had need to be!

J. E. JEWETT, Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for ten cents or 100 for twenty cents. Postage stamps taken.

The superiority of Hood's Sarsaparilla is due to the tremendous amount of brain work and constant care used in its preparation. Try one bottle and you will be convinced of its superiority.

CHILD SAVED FROM THE MOUTH OF A LION.

A lion escaped from the managerie of a Duke of Tuscany, and finding its way into the city of Florence, spread consternation on every side, people rushing wildly to and fro in their endeavors to reach a place of safety. In the confusion a mother let her infant fall from her arms, and before she could recover it, the ravenous beast was upon it, seized it, and seemed about to devour it. When the mother saw the fate in store for her child, throwing all regard of personal safety to the winds, and with all her motherly affection aroused she placed herself before the lion and by her imploring gestures, supplicated his mercy. The royal beast looked at her intently, then as if moved by her tears and entreaties he gently placed the helpless infant on the ground uninjured, and walked away. And will not the loving, faithful prayer of a Christian mother have effect with the Lion of Judah, whose love for us surpasseth all earthly love of which we have knowledge.

PATHETIC ORIGIN OF A HYMN.

Dr. Fawcett, author of the hymn, "Blest be the tie that binds," was the pastor of a small Baptist Church in Yorkshire, from which he received only a meagre salary. Being invited to London to succeed the distinguished Dr. Gill, he accepted, preached his farewell sermon, and began to load his furniture on wagons for transportation. When the time for departure arrived, his Yorkshire parishoners and neighbors clung to him and his family with an affection which was beyond expression. The agony of separation was almost heart-breaking. The pastor and his wife, completely overcome by the evidences of attachment they witnessed sat down to weep. Looking into his face, while tears flowed like rain down the cheeks of both, Mrs. Fawcett exclaimed, "Oh John, John, I can't bear this! I know not how to go!" "Nor I either," said he; "nor will we go; unload the wagons, and put everything in the place where it was before!" The people who had cried with grief now began to cry with joy. He wrote to the London congregation that his coming was impossible; and so he buckled on his armor for renewed toils in Yorkshire on a salary less by £40 a year than that which he declined. To commemorate this incident in his history, Doctor Fawcett wrote that hymn. He was converted at the age of sixteen under a sermon preached by George Whitefield, and at first united with the Methodist Church, but afterwards joined the Baptists.

A CRUSADER FORGIVING HIS ENEMY.

There is a story of a Crusader who had gone to fight in the Holy Land in those foolish wars of that time, and was taken prisoner by a Turk, who used him very cruelly. At last money was given to the Turk, for ransom. At great cost the knight was set free from his cruel prison, where his hardships and sufferings had almost ended his life. The war went on, and one day it chanced that this same Turk was taken prisoner by the soldiers of the knight, who brought him before their master. There they stood face to face. The tables had turned, and the prisoner was now master of his former tyrant. The knight thought a little as he looked at his captive, and then he said, "So it is my turn now, what do you expect from me?" "Retribution," said the Turk. "Yes," said the knight, "you shall have the retribution of a Christian. If you will not fight against us you shall go safely to your home in peace, for the Christ we serve has said, 'Love your enemies.'" It is great—it is Godlike to be merciful.

SOLDIERS PURCHASING BIBLE.

It is told of an African Missionary that when he was first sent out, the Bible Society sent with him a large number of Bibles to be distributed among the soldiers of a Highland regiment then serving at the Cape. When the missionary arrived the regiment was drawn up in order to receive the Bibles, and ordered to file past Mr. Campbell, who stood at one side with the books. The first man to be presented with the Bible was a fine-looking, tall, stalwart Highlander, who, as the Bible was placed in his one hand, plunged with the other into his pocket and drew out four shillings and sixpence, saying, "I'll not accept this as a present when I can pay for it," and insisted upon his money being accepted, and many soldiers followed his example, each paying for and carrying off a Bible, which, I have no doubt, they valued more on account of having paid for it. True Christians are never content with always receiving; they seek to give, whether in work, sympathy, or money.

DON'T ENVY THE RICH.

The late Henry Ward Beecher used to tell the following anecdote: "I heard a good man say once, as we passed the home of a millionaire: 'It doesn't seem right that such a man as he is should be rolling in wealth, while I have to work hard for my daily bread.' I made no reply. But when we reached the home of the grumbler, and a troop of rosy children ran out to meet us, I caught one in my arms, and, holding him up, said: 'John, how much will you take for this boy?' And he answered, while the moisture gathered in his eyes: 'That boy! my namesake! I wouldn't sell him for his weight in gold.' 'Why, John, he weighs forty pounds at least, and forty pounds of gold would make you rich. And you would probably ask as much for each of the others. So, according to your own admission, you are immensely rich. Yes, a great deal richer than the cold, selfish, childless millionaire whom you were envying as we came along. Nothing would tempt you to change places with him. Then you ought to be grateful instead of grumbling. You're the favorite of fortune, or, rather, of Providence, and not he.'"

MALAGASEY SUPERSTITION.

The superstition of the Malagaseys has by no means died out. A scientific expedition was sent out from Paris, which landed at Madagascar in March, 1889. The exploring party consisted of Dr. Catat, M. Maistre and M. Foucart. The latter soon broke down with fever and had to return to France, while M. Maistre, who also had fever had to return to Tamatave. Dr. Catat, in giving an account of the Expedition at Paris a few weeks ago, stated that on recovering from his illness M. Maistre made some surveys of Lake Alaotra and the surrounding country. The two travellers then proceeded southward into the country of the Bara, where much distrust of their scientific operations were shown. The Royal family, however, submitted to be photographed. Next day the distrust increased, and at a grand "Kabary," war was declared against the travellers and their followers. The accusation against them was that the Frenchmen had taken the souls of the natives and meant to sell them in their own country. In a long reply, the travellers protested that they had done nothing of the kind. These assurances were unavailing. The travellers had at last, after the custom of the country, to catch the souls, which were placed in a great basket, and ordered by Dr. Catat to return to their respective domiciles.

NOT A BAD PRAYER.

A young lady not engaged to be married, is stated to have been in the habit of praying every night for whoever may be her future husband, "because," she explains, "you know if I am to be married, my husband is living somewhere in this world, and I pray always that he may triumph over all temptations, be kept faithful to Christ, and be successful in whatever business God gives him to do." "And is this all you pray for in reference to him?" "Oh, no," and she blushed a little as she made this admission: "I pray that the Lord may hasten the happy time when we may be brought together!"

SERMONS IN STONES.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON PREACHED AT THE DEDICATION OF THE NEW BROOKLYN TABERNACLE
LAST SUNDAY EVENING, APRIL 26, 1891.

The Crossing of the Jordan—The Command to go Forward—How the Perilous Passage Should be Celebrated—Joshua's Command to Raise a Memorial of Stones—The Church in the Wilderness—The Promised Land of the New Tabernacle—The Four Stones in the Wall—How they were Secured—Their Meaning—Law, Sacrifice, and Gospel—Stones for a Residence for Christ—All Denominations United—Salvation, Emancipation, Consecration.

"What mean ye by these stones." Joshua 4: 6.

THE Jordan, like the Mississippi, has bluffs on the one side and flats on the other. Here and there a sycamore shadows it. Here and there a willow dips into it. It was only a little over waist-deep in December as I waded through it, but in the months of April and May the snows on Mount Lebanon thaw and flow down into the valley, and then the Jordan overflows its banks. Then it is wide, deep, raging, and impetuous. At this season of the year I hear the tramp of forty thousand armed men coming down to cross the river. You say, why do they not go up nearer the rise of the river at the old camel ford? Ah! my friends, it is because it is not safe to go around when the Lord tells us to go ahead. The Israelites had been going around forty years, and they had enough of it. I do not know how it is with you, my brethren, but I have always got into trouble when I went around, but always got into safety when I went ahead.

There spreads out the Jordan, a raging torrent, much of it snow-water just come down from the mountain-top; and I see some of the Israelites shivering at the idea of plunging in, and one soldier says to his comrade, "Joseph, can you swim?" And another says: "If we get across this stream we will get there with wet clothes and with damaged armor, and the Canaanites will slash us to pieces with their swords before we get up the other bank." But it is no time to halt. The great host marches on. The priests carrying the ark go ahead, the people follow. I hear the tramp of the great multitude. The priests have now come within a stone's throw of the water. Yet still there is no abatement of the flood. Now they have come within four or five feet of the stream; but there is no abatement of the flood. Bad prospect! It seems as if these Israelites that crossed the desert are now going to be drowned in sight of Canaan. But "Forward!" is the cry. The command rings all along the line of the host. "Forward!" Now the priests have come within one step of the river. This time they lift their feet from the solid ground, and put them down into the raging stream. No sooner are their feet there than Jordan flies. On the right hand God piles up a great mountain of floods; on the left, the water flows off toward the sea. The great river, for hours, halts and rears. The back waters, not being able to flow over the passing Israelites, pile wave on wave, until perhaps a sea-bird would find some difficulty in scaling the water cliff. Now the priests and all the people have gone over on dry land. The water on the left hand side by this time has reached the sea; and now that the miraculous passage has been made, stand back and see this stupendous pile of waters leap. God takes his hand from that wall of floods, and like a hundred cataracts they plunge and roar in thunderous triumph to the sea.

How are they to celebrate this passage? Shall it be with music? I suppose the trumpets and cymbals were all worn out before this. Shall it be with banners waving? Oh! no; they are all faded and torn. Joshua cries out: "I will tell you how to celebrate this: build a monument here to commemorate the event;" and every priest puts a heavy stone on his shoulder, and marches out and drops that stone in the divinely-appointed place. I see the pile growing in height, in breadth, in significance; and, in after years, men went by that spot and saw this monument, and cried out one to another, in fulfilment of the prophecy of the text: "What mean ye by these stones?"

Blessed be God, he did not leave our church in the wilderness! We have been wandering about for a year and a half worshipping in the the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, and Academy of Music, New York. And some thought we would never reach the promised land. Some said we had better take this route and others that. Some said we had better go back, and some said there were sons of Anak in the way that would eat us up; and before the smoke had cleared away from the sky after our Tabernacle had been consumed, people stood on the very site of the place and said: "This church will never again be built." We came down to the bank of Jordan; we looked off upon the waters. Some of the sympathy that was expressed turned out to be snow-water melted from the top of Lebanon. Some said: "You had better not go in; you will get your feet wet." But we waded in, pastor and people, further and further, and in some way, the Lord only knows how, we got through; and to-night I go all around about this great house, erected by your prayers, and sympathies, and sacrifices, and cry out in the words of my text: "What mean ye by these stones?" It is an outrage to build a house like this so vast, and so magnificent, unless there be some tremendous reasons for doing it; and so, my friends, I pursue you to-night with the question of my text, and I demand of these trustees and of these elders and of all who have contributed in the building of this structure, "What mean ye by these stones?" But before I get your answer to my question you point to the memorial wall at the side of this pulpit, and say to me, "Explain that unusual group of memorials. What mean you by those stones?" By permission of the people of my beloved charge I recently visited the Holy Lands, and having in mind by day and night during my absence this rising house of prayer, I bethought myself, "What can I do to make that place significant and glorious." On the morning of December the third we were at the foot of the most sacred mountain of all the earth, Mount Calvary. There is no more doubt of the locality than of Mount Washington or Mont Blanc. On the bluff of this mountain which is the exact shape of the human skull, and so called in the Bible "The place of a skull," there is room for three crosses. There I saw a stone so suggestive I rolled it down the hill, and transported it. It is at the top of this wall, a white stone, with crimson veins running through it, the white typical of purity, the crimson suggestive of the blood that paid the price of our redemption. We place it at the top of the memorial wall, for above all in this church for all time, in sermon, and song, and prayer shall be the Sacrifice of Mount Calvary. Look at it. That stone was one of the rocks rent at the Crucifixion. That heard the cry, "It is finished." Was any church on earth honored with such a memorial?

Beneath it are two tables of stone which I had brought from Mount Sinai, where the Law was given. Three camels were three weeks crossing the desert to fetch them. When at Cairo, Egypt, I proposed to the Christian Arab that he bring one stone from Mount Sinai, he said, "we can easier bring two rocks than one for we must balance them on the back of the camel," and I did not think until the day of their arrival how much more suggestive would be the two because the law was written on two tables of stone. Those stones marked with the words "Mount Sinai," felt the earthquake that shook the mountains when the Law was given. The lower stone of the wall is from Mars Hill, the place where Paul stood when he preached that famous sermon on the brotherhood of the human race, declaring, "God hath made of one blood all nations." Since Lord Elgin took the famous statuary from the Acropolis, the hill adjoining Mars Hill, the Greek government makes it impossible to transport to other lands any Egyptian antiquities, and armed soldiery guard not only the Acropolis but Mars Hill. That stone I obtained by special permission from the Queen of Greece, a most gracious and brilliant woman, who received us as though we had been old acquaintances, and through Mr. Tricoupis, the Prime Minister of Greece, and Mr. Snowden our American Minister Plenipotentiary and Dr. Manatt our American Consul, that suggestive tablet was sawed from the pulpit of rock on which Paul preached. Now you understand why we have marked it "The Gospel." Long after my lips shall utter in this church their last message, these lips of stone will tell of the Law, and the Sacrifice and the Gospel. This day I present them to this church and to all who shall gaze upon them. Thus you have my answer to the question, "What mean ye by these stones?"

But you must not divert me from the question of the text as I first put it. I have interpreted these four memorials on my right hand, but there are hundreds of stones in these surrounding walls and underneath us, in the foundations, and rising above us in the towers. The quarries of this and transatlantic countries at the call of crowbar and chisel have contributed toward this structure. "What mean ye by these stones?"

You mean among other things that they shall be an earthly residence for Christ. Christ did not have much of a home when he was here. Who and where is that child crying? It is Jesus born in an out-house. Where is that harp breathing? It is Jesus, asleep on a rock. What is that in the back part of the fishing-snack, with a sailor's rough over-coat thrown over him? It is Jesus the worn-out voyager. O Jesus! is not time that thou hadst a house? We give thee this. Thou didst give it to us first, but we give it back to thee. It is too good for us, but not half good enough for thee. Oh! come in and take the best seat here. Walk up and down all these aisles. Speak through these organ-pipes. Throw thine arm over us in these arches. In the flaming of these brackets of fire speak to us saying: "I am the light of the world." O King! make this thine audience-chamber. Here proclaim righteousness and make treaties. We clap our hands, we uncover our heads, we lift our ensigns, we cry with multitudinous acclamation until the place rings and the heavens listen: "O King! live for ever!"

Is it not time that he who was born in a stranger's house and buried in a stranger's grave should have an earthly house? Come in O Jesus! not the corpse of a buried Christ, but a radiant and triumphant Jesus, conqueror of earth, and heaven, and hell.

He lives, all glory to his name,
He lives, my Jesus, still the same
Oh, the sweet joy this sentence gives—
I know that my Redeemer lives.

Blessed be his glorious name for ever! Again, if any one asks the question of the text: "What mean ye by these stones?" the reply is, we mean the communion of saints. Do you know that there is not a single denomination of Christians in Brooklyn that has not contributed something toward the building of this house? And if ever, standing in this place, there shall be a man who shall try by anything he says, to stir up bitterness between different denominations of Christians, may his tongue falter and his cheek blanch, and his heart stop! My friends, if there is any church on earth where there is a mingling of all denominations, it is our church. I just wish that John Calvin and Arminius, if they were not too busy, would come out on the battlements and see us. Sometimes in our prayer-meetings I have heard brethren use the phrases of a beautiful liturgy, and we know where they came from; and in the same prayer-meetings I have heard brethren make audible ejaculation, "Amen!" "Praise ye the Lord!" and we did not have to guess twice where they came from. When a man knocks at our church door, if he comes from a sect where they will not give him a certificate, we say: "Come in by confession of faith." While Adoniram Judson, the Baptist, and John Wesley, the Methodist, and John Knox, the glorious old Scotch Presbyterian, are shaking hands in heaven, all churches on earth can afford to come into close communication: "One Lord, one faith, one baptism." Oh my brethren—we have had enough of Big Bethel fights—the 14th New York Regiment fighting the 15 Massachusetts Regiment. Now let all those who are for Christ and stand on the same side, go shoulder to shoulder, and this church instead of having a sprinkling of the Divine blessing, go clear under the wave in one glorious immersion in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. I saw a little child once, in its dying hour, put one arm around its father's neck, and the other arm around its mother's neck, and bring them close down to its dying lips, and give a last kiss. Oh, I said, those two persons will stand very near to each other always after such an interlocking. The dying Christ puts one arm around this denomination of Christians, and the other arm around that denomination of Christians, and he brings them down to his dying lips, while he gives them this parting kiss: "My peace I leave with you. My peace I give unto you."

How swift the heavenly course they run,
Whose hearts, and faith and hopes are one.

I heard a Baptist minister once say that he will take the best parts of all denominations of Christians, and weave them into one great ecclesiastical harmony, broad as the earth, and high as the heavens, and that will the church of the future. Or, as mosaic is made up of jasper, and agate, and many precious stones cemented together—mosaic a thousand feet square in St. Marks, or mosaic hoisted in colossal seraphim in St. Sophia—so I suppose God will make, after awhile, one great blending of all creeds, and all faiths, and all Christian sentiments, the amethyst, and the jasper, and the chalcedony of all different experiences and belief, cemented side by side in the great mosaic of the ages; and while the nations look upon the columns and architraves of that stupendous church of the future, and cry out: "What mean ye by these stones?" there shall be innumerable voices to respond—"We mean the Lord God omnipotent reigneth."

Still further, you mean by these stones the salvation of the people. We did not build this church for mere worldly reforms, or for an educational institution, or as a platform on which to read essays and philosophical disquisitions; but a place for the tremendous work of soul-saving. Oh, I had rather be the means in this church of having one soul prepared for a joyful eternity, than five thousand souls prepared for mere worldly success. All churches are in two classes, all communities in two classes, all the race in two classes—believers and unbelievers. To augment the number of the one and subtract from the number of the other, we built this church; and toward that supreme and eternal idea we dedicate all our sermons, all our songs, all our prayers, all our Sabbath hand-shakings. We want to throw defection into the enemy's ranks. We want to make them either surrender unconditionally to Christ, or else fly in rout, scattering the way with canteens, blankets, and knapsacks. We want to popularize Christ. We would like to tell the story of his love here until men would feel that they had rather die than live another hour without his sympathy, and love and mercy. We want to rouse up an enthusiasm for him greater than was felt for Nathaniel Lyon when he rode along the ranks—greater than was exhibited for Wellington when he came back from Waterloo—greater than was expressed for Napoleon when he stepped ashore from Elba. We really believe in this place Christ will enact the same scenes that were enacted by him when he landed in the Orient; and there will be such an opening of blind eyes, and unstopping of deaf ears, and casting out of unclean spirits—such silencing bestormed Gennesarets as shall make this house memorable five hundred years after you and I are dead and forgotten. Oh, my friends, we want but one revival in this church, that beginning now and running on to the day when the chisel of time, that brings down even St.

thought in the Millennium it would be all one great Baptist Church; and I heard a Methodist minister say that he thought in the great Millennial day it would be all one great Methodist church; and I have known a Presbyterian minister who thought that in the Millennial day it would be all one great Presbyterian church. Now I think they are all mistaken. I think the Millennial church will be a composite church; and just as you may take the best parts of five or six tunes, and under the skilful hands of a Handel, Mozart, or Beethoven, entwine them into one grand and overpowering symphony, so, I suppose, in the latter days of the world, God

Paul's and the Pyramids, shall bring this house into the dust.

Oh, that this day of dedication might be the day of emancipation of all imprisoned souls. My friends, do not make the blunder of the ship carpenters in Noah's time, who helped to build the ark; but did not get into it. God forbid that you who have been so generous in building this church, should not get under its saving influence. "Come thou and all thy house into the ark." Do you think a man is safe out of Christ? Not one day, not one hour, not one minute, not one second. Three or four years ago, you remember, a rail-train broke down a bridge on the way to Albany, and after the catastrophe, they were looking around among the timbers of the crushed bridge and the fallen train, and found the conductor. He was dying, and had only strength to say one thing, and that was: "hoist the flag for the next train." So there come to us to-night, from the eternal world, voices of God, voices of angels, voices of departed spirits, crying: "Lift the warning. Blow the trumpet, give the alarm. Hoist the flag for the next train."

Oh! that to-night my Lord Jesus would sweep his arm around this great audience, and take you all to his holy heart. You will never see so good a time for personal consecration as now. "What mean ye by these stones?" We mean your redemption from sin, and death, and hell, by the power of an omnipotent Gospel.

Well, the Brooklyn Tabernacle is erected again. We came here to-night not to dedicate it. That was done this morning. To-night we dedicate ourselves. In the Episcopal and Methodist Churches they have a railing around the altar, and the people come and kneel down at that railing and get the sacramental blessing. Well, my friends, it would take more than a night to gather you in circles around this altar. Then just bow where you are for the blessing. Aged men, this is the last church that you will ever dedicate. May the God who comforted Jacob the Patriarch, and Paul the aged, make this house to you the gate of heaven; and when, in your old days, you put on your spectacles to read the hymn or the Scripture lesson, may you get preparation for that land where you shall no more see through a glass darkly. May the warm sunshine of heaven thaw the snow off your foreheads! Men in mid-life, do you know that this is the place where you are going to get your fatigues rested, and your sorrows appeased, and your souls saved? Do you know that at this altar your sons and daughters will take upon themselves the vows of the Christian, and from this place you will carry out, some of you, your precious dead? Between this baptismal font and this communion table, you will have some of the tenderest of life's experiences. God bless you, old, and young, and middle-aged. The money you have given to this church to-day will be, I hope, the best financial investment you have ever made. Your visible life was absolutely dependent upon the hidden. There are many Christians in our churches to-day who have some worm of sin gnawing at the tap root of their life.

A BRAHMIN'S SPEECH.

AT a meeting in the American Arcot Mission in India when a large number of natives were present to hear a lecture by Dr. Chamberlain, a Brahmin rose and politely asked permission to make a few remarks. He said: "Many people have asked why missionaries come here. I have watched them and I know what they are.

What tempts them to leave their parents, friends, and country, and come to an unhealthy clime? Is it for gain or profit they come? Some of us who are clerks in government offices, receive larger salaries than they. Is it for an easy life? See how they work, and then tell me. Look at this missionary. He came here a few years ago, leaving home and friends to tell us of this religion. He was met with cold looks and suspicious glances, and was shunned and malign-ed. He sought to talk with us of what, he told us, was the matter of most importance in heaven and earth; but we would not listen. He was not discouraged. He opened a dispensary, and we said, 'Let the pariahs [lowest class] take his medicines, we won't,' but in the time of our sickness and distress and fear we were glad to go to him, and he welcomed us. We complained at first if he walked worldly investments may depend upon the whims of the money market, or the honesty of business associates; but the money you have given to the house of the Lord shall yield you large percentage, and declare eternal dividends long after the noon-day sun shall have gone out like a spark from a smitten anvil and all the stars are dead.

WHY THE PEAR-TREE DIED.

In the course of an address at Dr. Cullis's Convention in Boston, Mass., the Rev. O. E. Mallory said: "Some years ago I planted three very beautiful pear-trees and watched them with anxiety and tended them with care, and the spring came when I thought to find fruit thereon. I saw they were loaded with blossoms, and one of them especially seemed to be loaded. I went down looking at it a few days after and I saw the blossoms were all falling off, and the little pears forming were falling off, and at last there was not a pear or blossom to be found on the tree. The trouble was at the root. The through our Brahmin streets; but ere long, when our wives and our daughters were in sickness and anguish, we went and begged him to come, even into our inner apartments; and he came, and our wives and our daughters now smile upon us in health. Has he made any money by it? Even the cost of the medicine has not been returned to him. Now what is it that makes him do all this for us? It is the Bible! I have looked into it a good deal, at one time and another, and I declare there is nothing to compare with it in all our sacred books, for goodness, and purity, and holiness, and love, and for motives of action. Where did the Christian people get all their intelligence, and energy, and cleverness, and power? It is their Bible that gives it."

"I could not," adds Dr. Chamberlain, "but be surprised at this testimony. Some time ago I had attended in his zenana, his wife, a beautiful girl, through a dangerous illness, but I was not prepared to hear him give such a powerful testimony to the power and excellence of the Bible."

THE TABERNACLE DEDICATED.

BROOKLYN'S GREAT TEMPLE THE SCENE OF A MOST IMPRESSIVE CEREMONY.

Unprecedented Crowds at the Opening Service Last Sunday—The Dedication Programme—Many Distinguished Preachers Present—A "Union Service" in the Afternoon, and a Grand Evening Sermon.

SUNDAY, April 26th., will long be a memorable day in Brooklyn, as indeed it deserves to be everywhere in America. On the forenoon of that day was dedicated to God's service the splendid new Tabernacle that has been raised from the ruins of the old Tabernacle, destroyed by fire eighteen months ago. After many set-backs and unforeseen delays, this great Temple, in which every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has a warm personal interest, stands before the world, a peerless triumph of architectural skill and beauty, and a powerful witness to the enduring popularity of a pastor who has been upheld by Divine guidance and a loving people, amid many vicissitudes.

Long before the hour set for the opening service in the forenoon, the neighborhood of the Tabernacle, on Clinton and Greene Avenues, was besieged by crowds clamoring for admittance. This the trustees had anticipated, and they had wisely arranged that the invited guests should be admitted by ticket at the pewholder's entrance. When the massive doors swung open, the building was quickly filled. The vast audience gazed with rapt interest on the beauties of the interior—the grand organ, with its lofty pipes and delicate traceries of fretwork; the great deep windows, through whose richly-stained panes the April sunshine streamed in mellow radiance, shedding a flood of subdued color over the scene; the memorial wall, with its four entablatures of stone, from Calvary, the Mount of Sacrifice; Sinai, the Mount of the Law; and Mars Hill, the Mount of the Gospel. Their eyes lingered appreciatively a moment over the beautiful staircases, and followed the high curves of the great ceilings and the broad sweep of the galleries.

On the Platform.

On the platform with the pastor, Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., were many distinguished divines who had arranged to assist at the dedication of the largest Protestant church in the Union, among them being the Rev. Thomas Hastings, D. D., of the Union Theological Seminary; Rev. Wendell Prime, D. D., son of the late Rev. S. Irenaeus Prime, D. D., who laid the corner stone of the former Tabernacle; Rev. Teunis S. Hamlin, D. D., of the Church of the Covenant, Washington, (President Harrison's pastor), Rev. Talbot W. Chambers, D. D., Rev. Lyman Abbott of Plymouth Church, Rev. Rev. Charles F. Deems, D. D., of the Church of the Strangers, N. Y., Rev. A. B. Kendig of Brooklyn, and the Rev. A. C. Dixon, of Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn, and until recently a prominent preacher in Baltimore, Md.

The service opened with the singing of the long metre doxology, the clear, silvery tones of Professor Ali's cornet and the deep diapason of the grand organ at which Prof. Eyre Browne presided, lending a richness and volume to the singing of the audience, who rendered the fine old air with a fervor suited to the occasion. The Rev. Mr. Hastings then offered the prayer of invocation, eloquently addressing the Throne in behalf of pastor and people. The Dedication prayer was offered by Rev. Dr. Prime, both gentlemen being introduced to the congregation by Rev. Dr. Talmage, in a few characteristic sentences. The Dedication sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. Hamlin, who chose for his text: "He who hath builded the house hath more honor than the house." (Hebrews 3: 3.) In the course of his sermon, which was delivered in a most impressive and eloquent manner, claiming the attention of his hearers to the end, he said:

The Dedication Sermon.

The inventor is greater than his inventions; Galileo than the telescope; Watt than the steam engine; Henry than the electric telegraph; Field than the ocean cable, Bell than the speaking telephone. The artist is greater than his pictures and his statues; Leonardo than the Last Supper; Raphael than the Sistine Madonna; Michelangelo than the frescoes of the Vatican.

Of this house Christ is the builder. Of this household Christ is the founder. Not the designer. The conception was our Heavenly Father's, who "so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son." But that Son's atoning blood ransomed all the innumerable multitude of souls that, "fitly framed together, are growing unto an holy temple in the Lord;" redeemed the whole family that, in earth and heaven, is named for him. All these Christ claims as his. He hath built the house. He hath both furnished the material and done the work. The house is his by the best possible title. And he "hath more honor than the house." To him "every knee doth bow, and every tongue confess." The Redeemer is greater than all the redeemed. The Captain of our salvation is greater than all his hosts.

A Christian Church.

This is a Christian Church. We abjure all lesser names, that speak of sects and divisions, that we may place this church in fraternal relations to the whole household of faith. We baptize this edifice into the name of Christ alone. It belongs to him. We are here this morning to give it to him, to devote it to his service. It is right that a structure offered in loyal homage to such a Saviour should be beautiful and costly. "You have a worthy pride in this noble building; but your joy in it would be immeasurably less had you not put into it anxious thought and genuine self-denial. You have been building yourselves into those walls. Many of you have done this now for the third time. Yours has been a trial by fire. But under the splendid leadership that God has given you, you have never faltered. Tribulation hath wrought patience; and patience, experience and hope. You have been strong, and of good courage, and God hath strengthened your hearts. Each time you have built larger and finer than before, impelled to it by the great prosperity God hath given you. Eight hundred thousand dollars is a vast sum of money for any congregation to raise within twenty-two years for building sanctuaries for its own worship. But the trials and the giving, even the temporary homelessness, have all done you good, confirming your individual faith, cementing your mutual love. You have proved yourselves worthy of this magnificent edifice.

And the edifice is worthy of you. Massive, imposing, beautiful, without; spacious, comfortable, elegant, within; the Brooklyn Tabernacle of 1891 is a glory and crown even in this city of stately churches. There are those, no doubt, who will say you have wasted money in needless ornamentation; but the Master knows that it is your ointment poured forth for him, and he approves.

But they that have builded the house must have more honor than the house. It is for them, not they for it. The law that Christ laid down in another connection is equally applicable here;—"The Sabbath was made for man not man for the Sabbath." Man is of more worth than the institution, which was founded solely for his good. The moment it takes the precedence, it becomes a tyrant. As soon as we think more of honoring it than of helping men, we have fallen away from God's purpose. The Lord's question is always pertinent; "Is it not lawful to do well on the Sabbath day?" So here. This edifice must not become the master of those who have built it, not of the multitudes for whom they have built it, in hospitable spaciousness and comfort. It has been built for man; for his use and service. If it proves too elegant for this, it will prove just elegant enough to be torn down until not one stone is left upon another. We all know churches that deserve this fate, for the congregations that have built them prize them more than they prize man. They are thought too good to use. They are held more sacred than man. They are kept so very choice that one is always prompted to ask; "Is it not lawful to do well in this magnificent building?"

A Tribute to the Pastor.

This church is unique in the person of its pastor, whose fascinating eloquence has given it and him international renown. Metropolitan in its location; cosmopolitan in its thronging audiences; it is world-wide in its influence. For more than a score of years, the voice of this Tabernacle pulpit has been heard in America, in Australia, in New Zealand, in Europe, in Asia, from Brooklyn to San Francisco, from Calcutta to Peking. Twenty-five millions of the copies of the sermons here preached are read each week in all the principal languages of the civilized world. More than fifty volumes from this fertile brain enrich the religious literature of Christendom. The more than five thousand converts that have here confessed Christ are but a fraction of the multitude that the same faithful preaching, either heard or read, has brought in penitence and faith to the Cross of Jesus. How great the number, and from how many lands, only the last great day will disclose. Every true pulpit is a throne of influence and power; this pulpit has a dominion that circles the globe. May you long be spared, my dear brother, to extend, in unflinching loyalty to Christ, the reign of his glorious grace over human hearts and lives!

We are dedicating this church to-day not consecrating it. We cannot thus consecrate it. No form of words, pronounced here can make this house holy, or give it any new claim upon your reverence and love. But we have already begun a process that will, by-and-by, make this sanctuary indescribably sacred and precious. These walls have no phonographic powers; but in years to come they will echo hundreds of sermons and thousands of prayers. Here your sons and daughters will pledge their troth to each other in marriage. Hence you will carry the sacred dust of your beloved dead. Here you will bring your children for baptism, and, like Hannah, lend them to the Lord as long as they shall live. Around this communion table you will hold sweet fellowship with each other and with your common Lord, as you renew your vows of loyalty to him. Before this pulpit will stand many "young men and maidens, old men and children" to confess their Saviour, while it is recorded on high: "This and that man was born there." I esteem it a great privilege to preach the first sermon in this, the largest Protestant Church of America. But the privilege involves a responsibility. I dare not fail to proclaim, if in only a sentence, the glorious Gospel of the Son of God. Pardon through his atoning blood; Pardon for you, fellow-sinner, whatever the load of guilt you have brought in here this morning. Immortal life for you, dear friend, whom fear of death has held all your life-time in bondage. The bread of life for you that hunger. Living water for you that thirst. Divine comfort for you that mourn. An Almighty Friend for you that are friendless. Heaven for you that are homeless. Purity for you that blush in secret as you think of your soiled and stained souls. Grace for you tempted ones that will enable you to resist and overcome. And all free! All for the asking! Whosoever will, may come! Whosoever cometh, Christ will in no wise cast out! See in his outstretched hands pardon, peace, purity, heaven! All for you, beloved, all for you! O that this Church may be consecrated this very hour by every unsaved man and woman here turning in penitence and faith to the waiting Redeemer.

The Afternoon Service.

At the "Union Service" in the afternoon, Dr. Talmage personally led the exercises. About fifteen pastors of leading churches of various Christian denominations shared in these services. In the evening Dr. Talmage preached (see sermon on page 258), on the text: "What mean ye by these stones?" (Josh. 4: 6), to a phenomenally large attendance, many of whom were unable to gain entrance at the earlier services.

Our illustrations to-day show the interior of the new Tabernacle (the exterior having been shown in last week's issue), the scene at the close of the forenoon service, when Dr. Talmage was overwhelmed with congratulations, not only from members of his own congregation but from a host of others, who have watched the splendid efforts of the Tabernacle pastor and people, now happily culminated. Another illustration shows a corner on one of the staircases—the artistic workmanship being faithfully reproduced. Perhaps the most interesting of all is the illustration of the Memorial wall with its four inlaid stones, which were fully described and explained by Dr. Talmage in his evening sermon.

A ROWER WASTING HIS STRENGTH.

A MINISTER recently used the following illustration to show how Christians who are praying and striving after growth in grace, may be hindered by a secret attachment to the world:

Some young men in our town went out fishing a year ago or more, and one fellow was bragging on the way, of being an excellent oarsman, and he wanted to row the boat. So they unlocked the boat and got in, and he was showing his dexterity in making the boat go. But they began to laugh at him; the boat was moving scarcely at all. They began to think there was some trouble and looked around, to find the anchor was dragging on the bottom. The trouble with many Christian people is that they have struck out from the shore, but they have got the anchor down in the mud, and they are dragging it all the time. Oh, cut the rope.

ISRAEL'S OVERTHROW.

S. S. LESSON FOR MAY 10, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
AMOS 8: 1-14. GOLDEN TEXT, LUKE 8: 18.

God's judgments on the Nations Often Sudden—Foreseen by His Prophets—A Series of Visions—A Culmination—The Significance of the Plumb-Line—The Burden of the Prophet—What Looking for the Appearing of the Lord Involves—Scattering and Restoration.

OD'S judgments do not take his prophet-children by surprise. Those who live for this world, buying and selling, eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, do not see the signs of a coming storm. It was such a generation who "knew not, until the flood came and took them all away." (Matt. 24: 39.) The men of Sodom "did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded. But the same day that Lot went out of Sodom it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all." (Luke 17: 28, 29.) Perhaps, even in our own day, the word may be fulfilled, "The day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night, for when they shall say, peace and safety, then Sudden Destruction Cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child, and they shall not escape." (1. Thess. 5: 2, 3.) But Noah knew and Abraham knew, what God was about to do in their days. These men were more at home with God than with their fellow-men; they had more in common with him than with those whose lives might be summed up in the words: "Who mind earthly things." Surely those "who love his appearing" are of the same order. What can the words mean: "For our citizenship is in heaven, from whence also we wait for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ," if they do not indicate such a relation to the upper world that the eating and drinking, buying and selling, planting and building, marrying and giving in marriage, take a secondary place in the heart, enabling heaven's citizens to say of earth's advantages and trials alike: "None of these things move me." Amos was a man who he saw God and things unseen where other men saw only outward circumstances; therefore to him the Lord could reveal his purposes of judgment upon backsliding Israel, sure that the prophet would understand, and lay to heart for himself, and for his people, what his God would reveal to him. Amos was a countryman and he noticed grasshoppers (or locusts, R. V.) destroying the second hay harvest; "the latter growth after the king's mowings." It was no uncommon thing, but God showed him through it the coming destruction of his people, yet no one else would have understood the significance of this thing. It led the prophet to prayer, he cried: "O, Lord God, forgive, I beseech thee, by whom shall Jacob stand? for he is small." This time his intercession prevailed, and the Lord repented. Amos next saw, probably in a dream, the Lord calling to contend by fire, "and it devoured the great deep, and did eat up a part." Again the prophet interceded, and a second time the Lord repented, and neither of those judgments came upon the land.

But the lull was only temporary, the people went on sinning, and judgment hastened. The prophet saw the Lord with a plumb-line in his hand. This was enough; the unerring test of the righteousness of God would discover the smallest deviation from rectitude in the crooked heart of man. How could Israel stand? "Then said the Lord: Behold I will set a plumb-line in the midst of my people Israel; I will not again pass by them any more: And the high places of Isaac shall be desolate, and the sanctuaries of Israel shall be laid waste; and I will rise against the house of Jeroboam with the sword." Why was this? What had the plumb-line discovered? Men "that swallow up the needy, even to make the poor of the land to fail, saying, when will the new moon be gone that we may sell corn? And the Sabbath that we may set forth wheat? Making the ephah small, and the shekel great, and falsifying the balances by deceit." God abominates oppression, deceit, and unrighteous dealing. "The way of the just is uprightness: thou, most Upright, dost weigh the path of the just." (Isa. 26: 7.)

Again, Amos saw "a basket of summer fruit," probably the last of the season. "Then, said the Lord unto me, the end is come upon my people of Israel, I will not again pass by them any more." Amos saw the coming trouble; he heard howlings in the place of song, and saw dead bodies in every place; it was more than a presentiment; it was a God-given warning of evil to come. Amos had been faithful: the burden upon his soul had been the sin of

The Golden Calf at Bethel.

He declared for his God. "In the day that I shall visit the transgressions of Israel upon him, I will also visit the altars of Bethel." "Come to Bethel and transgress." "Thus saith the Lord unto the house of Israel, seek ye me, and ye shall live: but seek not Bethel, nor enter into Gilgal, and pass not to Beersheba: for Gilgal shall surely go into captivity, and Bethel shall come to naught. Seek the Lord, and ye shall live; lest he break out like fire in the house of Joseph, and devour it, and there be none to quench it in Bethel." This sin of substituting the golden calf for the actual presence of the living God in the midst of his people was unbearable to Amos; his heart almost broke with the burden of it, "I am pressed under you as a cart is pressed that is full of sheaves." (2: 13.) He knew the burden of the Lord. There were some who professed to desire "the day of the Lord," it was the correct thing, but the prophet saw the superficiality of these people, and said to them: "Woe unto you that desire the day of the Lord! To what end is it for you? The day of the Lord is darkness, and not light. As if a man did flee from a lion, and a bear met him; or went into the house and leaned his hand on the wall, and a serpent bit him. Shall not the day of the Lord be darkness and not light? Even very dark, and no brightness in it?"

But how solemnly these words speak to us in this day! There are many who talk quite fluently of the coming of the Lord whose loins are not girded, and whose lights are not burning, and who are by no means like men that wait for their Lord. Some of these very men are ready to take every advantage of others in business matters: as greedy after gain in the world as though they had no expectation to be taken away when Jesus comes. Can we do otherwise than doubt whether, after all, they will be found ready, whether the oil in their lamps may not fail at the coming of the Bridegroom, and they be shut out? (Matt. 25: 10.) How terrible to find out such a mistake just too late!

There was yet another thing which stirred up the anger of the Lord: there were those who in these days of sin were while sin unrepented of, unforgiven, lay between them and God! They put far away the evil day, indulged in the greatest self-indulgence; beds of ivory, luxurious furniture, good dinners, music, wine-bibbing, perfume; "but they are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph. Therefore now shall they go captive with the poor that go captive, and the revelry of them that stretched themselves shall pass away." No ivory bed for Amos, no wine drinking for the prophet, no putting far off of the evil day, the man who had eyes for the invisible world saw the heavens darkening over Israel. Whichever way he looked, he saw sin which called for vengeance. There was no hope from king, or priest, or people; all were alike sinful. How could he cry to God? When he looked heavenwards, he discovered wrath.

"At Ease in Zion"

The Evil Day Must Come,

there was no help for it. He saw that the land trembled because of her sins, and that the day of mourning would surely come, and he foretold an awful famine, not of bread, but of hearing of the words of the Lord. That which they had despised would be taken from them, man cannot lightly neglect the Word of his God. Let us take heed lest in the increasing power of Rome in our land, such a famine may not visit us also.

And the prophet saw God pursuing his people in his just displeasure; from hell, from heaven, from the top of Carmel, from the bottom of the sea, he would hunt them out! O how vain to seek to escape God! Finally, he would sift them as in a sieve, and not one grain of his true wheat should fall to the ground. Then the tide of judgment turns, and the same hand which has been so strong in discipline and punishment will raise them again, restore them, bring again their captivity, and plant them in their land. It is the same God who chastens his people now. He is as intolerant of sin now as then: at any cost, his people must be holy: "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth."

EARTH'S RE-GENESIS.

What Agencies will Effect this Radical Change?

BY REV. GEORGE C. NEEDHAM.

ILL a slow progressive conversion of the world bring about the predicted consummation? If not, has the Gospel of Christ lost its power? Verily, no! The Gospel is still the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. The question, however, does not concern the power, but rather the purpose of the Gospel. It will surely accomplish that whereunto it has been sent. But not by preaching will the planet be regenerated, nor yet by preaching will millennial blessedness be consummated.

Will Peace Societies, and Reforming Societies, and Nineteenth Century Clubs elevate the world to Paradise conditions? Will Elmsereism and Bellamyism introduce the Golden age? The scare which frightened the clergy when these airy sentimentalities intruded themselves has passed away, and with it also the utopian plans for universal righteousness. Thank God, I never read these books. Am I much the worse off for this dereliction? May we ask, are the ministers who spent their precious hours reading and discussing, and preaching on them any better for it? Were the churches helped, and the nation benefited by the hopeful visions spread before them? No, in no wise. We have humane societies, but cruelty stalks through the land. We have medical societies, but spite their science and skill, disease asserts its dread power and men die. Do I forget the alleviating results of modern civilization, inventions and discoveries? No; nor do I forget their alarming results in cannons, mitrailleuses and the terrible dynamite. Am I forgetful of the onward march of medical knowledge, and the almost miraculous feats of modern surgery? Nay: I thank God for the alleviation of pain and woe, nevertheless, I think with profound sorrow of that great soldier, General Grant, whose iron constitution and firm hand became the sport of disease, while consummate skill was baffled by a merciless messenger from the "king of terrors." Nor could the martyred Garfield be saved to the country and family he so dearly loved, when injury challenged science. So, also, Frederick, the royal German, of grand physical proportions, is buffeted and battered to death by germs and atoms of infinitesimal proportions. Oh! are there not pains, and diseases, and physical evils which laugh at skill and defy science. Yea, more, are there no sighs and groans wrung from the very heart

Taking his motto from a wooden cross planted on an adjoining grave, our colleague told of man's sinful state and of God's infinite love in the gift of his Son. His words, emphasizing these vital truths, drew tears from many eyes. When he had concluded, the family and comrades of the deceased gathered round him. One man then addressed him, in the name of all, as follows:—"Sir, we thank you; you have done us good. It is true that we have broken entirely with the ceremonies of religion (Romanism), but these have nothing in common with what you have said to us. We approve it, and, like you, we are and shall remain religious men."

CHRISTIAN WORK.

AN enterprising Church will not hold back its help from any good cause. It will send its members down through the dark lanes, and into squalid cellars, and among pestiferous fumes, to prophesy in God's name over the riven, scalded, mangled, and decaying carcasses of the morally dead. It will send its box of clothing to the colporteur in the West, and with its prayers help fill the sails of the clipper that carries Christian missionaries to Japan. It will rejoice over a blind girl taught to read in the asylum, and the throwing open of heathen ports to the Gospel. It will teach the black boy in the Sabbath class his A, B, C, and pray that Ethiopia may soon stretch forth her hands to God. It will light a taper in a sick man's room, and by prayer help roll up the Sun of righteousness to the noonday glory of the millennium. The prayer-meeting of such a Church will be crowded with worshippers, and long, dull prayers will be cut off at both ends, and set on fire in the middle. The psalmody will be buoyant and rapturous; old "Coronation" will ring out as though all the crowns of heaven were that moment thrown down at the feet of Jesus.

The field is white to the harvest! Men with the sickles, come on and lay to the work! In this age of the world, with so many Gospel advantages, and so many grand incentives to work, a dead Church ought to be indicted as a nuisance. Invention and discovery have quickened the world's pace. The age, no more a-foot, is on wheels and wings. Quiet villages have been roused up by the hum of machinery, the clang of foundries, and the shriek of steam-whistles. We rise, after a short night's sleep, and find that the world has advanced mighty leagues. The pulse of the world beats stronger, the arm of industrious achievement strikes harder, the eye of human ingenuity sees farther, the heart of Christian philanthropy throbs warmer. The earth shakes under the quick tread of scientific, moral, and religious enterprises. In such a time, a torpid, lethargic, timid Church is both a farce and a blasphemy. If it do not march when God commands it to march; if it do not strike when God commands it to strike; if, when the mountains round about are full of horses and chariots of fire, it shrinks back from the conflict, God will mark it for ruin, and Christians will become inconsistent, and the minister will sleep in the pulpit, and the choir will quarrel in the gallery, and the shingles will rot, and sinners will perish, and the cause of God will be dishonored. One enterprising Church! How many tracts it might scatter! How many hungry mouths it might feed! How many poor churches it might help! How many lights it might kindle!

BEWARE!

IT is more and more demonstrated that polluted literature is a marked hindrance to Christian life. Bad books never pressed so mightily on the hearts and consciences of men as to-day. There was a time—some of us remember it—when every book that came into the house was scrutinized. The index was examined, the pictures looked over, and the general structure, bearing, make-up of the book was known by the father and the mother. It is not so now. A half dozen new books might come into some of our houses in a day, and we would hardly ask: What is this book? Who reads it? Where did it come from? Who published it? What is it all about? The influence is most tremendous. It comes in upon the newspapers, and it comes in upon the printed volume. There is no one who is independent of that influence. It touches in one direction or in another direction. And it seems impossible for a man in this day to serve God when he is seeing so many influences that attempt to shake his faith in Christ, and to overthrow his religious and eternal interests. This depressing influence of a polluted printing-press, I consider the most blasting and damnable of all influences, and that parent who allows a child to read a bad book might as well consent that his boy carry a heap of rattlesnakes in his satchel to school. It will sting him to death. I simply believe that nine out of ten of the novels of this day are reeking with pollutions.

Printing-presses, that in other days would have scorned to publish nefarious books, halt not now at the literary crime, and the most pernicious volumes are pouring out from the finest printing-presses in America, and it is high time that every Christian man looked out for himself and for his family.

The press is a mighty engine for good, but Satan uses it to an alarming extent. At home and abroad he is scattering his wares. How few religious publications are offered for sale on railroads, but what a mass of light literature is exhibited and sold! This we see; but who has any idea of the traffic in demoralizing publications which is carried on secretly? The few facts and figures brought to light are startling. If Luther threw the ink-bottle at the devil, it seems as though he must have picked it up and have been using it ever since.

GYMNASIUMS.

IKNOW of nothing more free from dissipation or more calculated to recuperate the physical and mental energies. While there are a good many people who have made use of the gymnasium, there is a vast number who are ignorant of its excellences. There are men with cramped chests and weak sides and despondent spirits, who through that institution might be roused up to exuberance and exhilaration of life. There are many Christian people despondent from year to year who might through such an institution be benefited in their spiritual relations. God will hold you responsible for your invalidism if it is your fault, and when through right exercise and prudence you might be athletic and well. O, it seems to me outrageous that men, through neglect, should allow their physical health to go down beyond repair, spending the rest of their life, not in some great enterprise for God and the world, but in studying what is the best thing to take for dyspepsia! When you may through the gymnasium work off your spleen and your querulousness and one-half of your physical and mental ailments, do not turn your back upon such a grand medicament. In our cities life is so unhealthy and unnatural that when the census taker represents a city as having four hundred thousand inhabitants there are only two hundred thousand, since it takes at least two men to amount to one man, so depleting and unnerving and exhausting is city life.

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. James H. Cannon, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Evangelist, has been much blessed in his labors at Bethany Church, New York. Rev. George N. Compton, the pastor, speaks in the highest terms of the benefits which the church is enjoying. Among those who have been brought to the Saviour was a man who, before these meetings, had not been in a church for fifteen years.

Mrs. Mary E. Gough, widow of John B. Gough, the renowned temperance orator, died at Hillside Farm, Boylston, Mass., on April 20, at the age of seventy-one years. The immediate cause of death was paralysis. Mrs. Gough has been helpless for some months past.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond is holding services in the Bloomingdale Church Boulevard, and West 68th St., New York. An afternoon service for children and young people is held at four o'clock, and a general meeting in the evening. Last week he was laboring in the St. Andrews M. E. Church. One of the most gratifying features of the services is the fact that some of Mr. Hammond's helpers are men and women who were converted under his preaching when they were children.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's services at Haverhill, Mass., have terminated in a grand jubilee meeting to thank God for the blessing that has come. No less than 517 cards have been received from persons who have received a blessing at these meetings, and have resolved in the strength of Christ to live henceforth for him. At the Convention of Christian Workers, held at the close of the meetings, Mr. D. L. Moody, Mr. George C. Needham, and other eminent evangelists, discussed the methods of evangelistic work.

The International Convention of Young Men's Christian Associations will be held at Kansas City, Mo., May 6th-10th. The first meeting will be at eleven o'clock, on Wednesday, May 6, in the Y. M. C. A. Building on the corner of Ninth and Locust Streets. Delegates should take their credentials with them and exchange them on their arrival for delegates' tickets entitling them to entertainment and to admission to the floor of the Convention. Information about special rates of railroad fares may be obtained by writing to the International Committee, 40 East 23rd St., New York.

Rev. C. H. Yatman has closed his meetings on the South Side, at Findlay, O. The Republican of that city speaks of the revival as the most successful the city ever had. Every day there were two services, and on some days there were six. On Sundays the day commenced with a sunrise prayer-meeting at 6.30 A. M. which was well attended. At all the later services the house was crowded. At the men's mass meeting, at four o'clock, there was a very deep interest, the men listening spell-bound to the words of the preacher and the singing of Mrs. Kress. Mr. Yatman is now laboring on the North Side with great success.

A statement of the work being done for the rescue of boys from the streets has just been issued by the Committee for Christian Workers in the United States and Canada. The work has been in operation chiefly in Massachusetts and Connecticut for three years and half, and during that time no less than thirteen thousand boys have availed themselves of the help of the organization. Twenty clubs have been formed having rooms well warmed, lighted and ventilated and supplied with wholesome literature. Penny savings-bank have been established in which eleven hundred boys have deposited sums aggregating $2,000. The boys are visited in their homes and invited to come to Sunday School and their parents encouraged to attend church. It appears that it costs only $200 to establish one of these clubs and the General Committee is willing to aid with its experience any person or church willing to engage in the good work. Further particulars may be obtained from Rev. J. C. Collins, New Haven, Conn.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Ratifying the Congo Treaty—Transvaal Troubles—Old Foes as Friends—Our New U. S. Treasurer—The Land Commissioners—President Harrison in California—Riotous Hungarian Coke Miners in Pennsylvania.

OUR Minister at the Court of Belgium has secured an extension of the time allowed for the ratification of the Congo treaty. Last July the Plenipotentiary of the United States joined in the Conference of Brussels with the representatives of other powers in negotiating this treaty. It pledged each of the powers to refrain from countenancing the slave trade in Africa and from selling intoxicating liquors or fire-arms within a defined belt of territory in that continent. The treaty was signed by our Plenipotentiary, subject to the approval of the Senate, and one clause of the treaty stipulated that certificates of ratification must be deposited in Brussels before July 2nd of this year. As the Senate separated without taking definite action on the matter, it appeared that the treaty would fail for lack of the ratification of our government. Mr. Blaine felt that this result would be a calamity for Africa and a disgrace to us. He therefore instructed our representative at Brussels to ask that an opportunity might be afforded the government to ratify the treaty by extending the time to a reasonable period after the next regular meeting of the Senate. It is gratifying to learn that the concession has been granted and it may be hoped, in the interest of humanity, that the Senate will avail itself of the opportunity.

Rioting and Disorder Have Prevailed During the week in the coke regions of Pennsylvania, as a sequel to the recent labor strike. On the 22nd, so violent had the disturbances grown that the State militia was sent to Adelaide, in Fayette County. Futile attempts had been made to evict a large number of Hungarians, whose sheds and shanties were wanted for the new workmen. A desperate resistance was offered, and during a fight between a sheriff's posse and a band of Hungarians, fifty persons were more or less seriously hurt. A Hungarian girl, who was frantically opposing the deputies, was also shot. There is a large force of Pinkerton detectives on hand in the disturbed district, besides military and local officers, as much trouble is still looked for. Hundreds of Italians are arriving to take the strikers' places.

An Educator of National Fame has been Honored in the offer of the Presidency of the new University established by Senator Leland Stanford, at Palo Alto, Cal., to David Starr Jordan, President of the Indiana State University at Bloomington. The office carries with it a salary of $10,000 a year and, in view of the splendid endowment of the institution, affords magnificent possibilities. President Jordan was born in New York State in 1851, and studied at Cornell, where he became an instructor of botany. During his career he has served in various professorships at the leading colleges of half a dozen states. He is possessed of remarkable executive and administrative abilities, and his influence has been widely felt in educational affairs. He will assume charge of the Palo Alto College next September. A portrait of Prof. Jordan is here given.

One of the Greatest of German Warriors, Field Marshal Count Helmuth Von Moltke, died at Berlin on April 24th. Although 90 years of age, he has continued to perform many public duties to the last, and on the afternoon of the day of his death, he was in his seat in the Reichstag. He died the same evening of heart failure.

He was born at Parchim, in Mecklenburg, Oct. 26th, 1800, and got his first taste of military life in a Cadets' Academy at Copenhagen. The slender, little fellow, with thick blond hair and blue eyes, was destined to be the leading figure in many a sanguinary battlefield. He entered the Prussian service when he was 22, without influence or recommendation but such was the genius of Moltke that promotions came thick and fast. He served in Bohemia, France, Asia Minor, Turkey, and Austria and was on the field at the battles of Sadowa and Koniggratz. In the Austro-Prussian Campaign, and almost every battle of importance during the Franco-German war. He planned the bombardment of Paris, and was one of the four men who brought about the unification of Germany, all of whom are now dead, except Bismarck. Moltke was never conquered on the field; he never quarreled with his Royal Master, and it is recorded of him that he was an unwavering Christian from first to last, recognizing the hand of Omnipotence in all the events of life, whether dealing with nations or individuals. A portrait of the General is given above.

President Harrison got his First Glimpse of the Rocky Mountains and the slopes of the Pacific on Wednesday, April 22nd. At El Paso, on the border, the party had been saluted by the Mexican authorities and had sent its compliments to President Diaz and the Governor of Chihuahua. The party entered California after a long and dusty ride over the plains, reaching Fort Yuma at half-past four in the morning, where a fine collection of flowers and fruit was presented to the travellers. As they were sound asleep at the time they did not appreciate the gift till several hours afterward. Speeches were made at a number of stopping points. The President expressed his pleasure at the great beauty of the scenery of Lower California and the fertility of the country. At Indio, Chief Cabason of the Indio tribe, over a hundred years old, was introduced to Mr. Harrison and presented a petition asking for justice and assistance for his people. At Riverside, Cal., the horses drawing the President's carriage bolted at the risk of his life, Secretary Rusk leaped to the heads of the frightened animals and checked them.

A Renewal of the Trouble between England and the Boers of the Transvaal in Southern Africa was threatened last week. Its nature was the more serious because Portugal was involved in it, and the relations between that country and England were already strained to a dangerous point. News reached London that a party of Boers proposed to settle in Mashonaland or Manicaland and establish a republic. The possession of those territories has been one of the matters in dispute between England and Portugal. The British Foreign Office suspected that Portugal was conniving at this in-cursion of the Boers and promptly notified that power that it would be held responsible if the settlement took place. A notice was also sent to Paul Kruger, the President of the Transvaal that it would be regarded as an act of hostility to England. For some days it seemed probable that a conflict such as that which humiliated England in 1880 would take place, with the additional complication of a war with Portugal. Assurances, however, have now been given by the Portuguese government that it will not countenance a Boer incursion, and by the government of the Transvaal that the Boers have been warned against the project. The Boers may decide to act in defiance of their government, as they are a bold, independent race, but they would not be able to maintain a settlement without the support of the Transvaal.

Twice within the Year has a Successor been chosen to United States Treasurer Huston, whose resignation has been in abeyance for some months. Some time ago, as announced in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, State Treasurer Lemcke, of Indiana, was selected for the post; but he declined, and now Edward H. Nebeker, of Fountain County, Indiana, formerly

Chairman of the Republican State Central Committee, has been chosen to fill the place. A portrait of the new Treasurer is given above.

A Significant Meeting of Former Enemies took place in New York on April 20. The famous Third Georgia Regiment came north to join the Ninth Regiment of New York Volunteers, known as Hawkins' Zouaves, in celebrating the thirtieth anniversary of the organization of the latter regiment. The walls of the hotel in which the celebration was held were decorated with the battle-flags of the two regiments, and underneath were inscribed the names of the battles in which the regiments met in deadly conflict. Gen. Hawkins, "the father" of the New York Regiment, gave a cordial welcome to the Southern visitors, and Col. Snead on behalf of the Georgians, congratulated all on the better times in which the two regiments met again after so many years.

The Last Congress Provided for the Establishment of a Land Court, for the adjudication of all questions affecting the public lands. Its members have not yet been appointed, but in all probability will soon be. Meanwhile, ex-Congressman Lewis E. Payson, of Illinois is talked of as the successor of Mr. Groff, as Commissioner of the General Land Office. He will also be a member of the Land Court. Mr. Payson is a Rhode Islander, where he was born in 1840. He studied and practised law at Ottawa, Ill. He has been elected to four Congresses and has sat upon the bench in Illinois for several years. His portrait is given above.

NEWNESS OF LIFE.

A NEW SERMON PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

The Believer Identified with his Lord—The Model of Conduct—I. The Resurrection of Christ a Type of the New Life—In Itself a Marvel—Glorious in Cause and Effects—II. The Parallel—The Death and Corruption of Sin—The Quickening—Security of Perfection—III. The Life Given—New Life—Imparted not Developed—New in Principle—The Old Self an Undesirable Acquaintance—IV. The Walk Changed—Mammon Service Given Up.

"Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life." Romans 6: 4.

I HAVE aforetime preached upon the whole verse, so that this morning I shall take the liberty to dwell chiefly upon the latter part of it—
"Like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life."

The idea that the grace of God should lead us to licentiousness is utterly loathsome to every Christian man. We cannot endure it. The notion that the doctrines of grace give license to sin, comes from the devil, and we scout it with a detestation more deep than words can express. "How shall we, that are dead to sin, live any longer therein?"

Every believer is, in the purpose of divine grace, identified with Jesus. His life is the model of our experience: he makes us to be conformed to his image now, and we shall be like him when we shall see him as he is. O my hearer, if you are not in Christ you have nothing. Out of Christ you are in the wilderness: with him you are in a paradise. In Christ believers possess all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and grace, and power, and love. All things are yours, if you are Christ's. From our union to Christ follows our sanctification: we cannot follow after sin, for Christ does not follow after it. He died unto sin once, and we are henceforth dead to it. He is risen by the glory of the Father, and we are risen with him into righteousness, and acceptance, and joy.

I. Follow me in the text, taking as your first thought the fact that

The Resurrection of our Lord was attended with glory. In itself it was a great marvel. Our Lord was assuredly dead: the Roman guards at the cross took care that no condemned person escaped the death penalty; in our Lord's case his heart was pierced with the spear to make sure that no life remained in him. Joseph begged his body, and by the loving hands of those who were sure that he was dead he was wrapped in spices and fine linen, and laid in the rocky tomb. There lay our Lord in the grave, with a stone rolled at the cave's mouth, and a seal set upon it by those in authority, whose envy made them take double precautions. As when a prince lies slumbering in his pavilion he is watched by a guard, so was our Lord's sepulchre, watched by a guard of Roman soldiers, that no man might steal his body. There he lay in the heart of the earth, for a portion of three days and nights. He was really dead, and in the grave he wore all the marks of decease: a napkin was bound about his head, and the linen clothes enwrapped his limbs.

On the morning of the third day it was truly said, "The Lord has risen indeed"; for he actually, literally, and in very fact awoke to life, unbound the napkin and laid it by itself, leisurely folded his grave-clothes, and when the angel had rolled away the stone from the mouth of the sepulchre, the First-begotten from the dead came forth in a material body to live among his disciples for forty days. During the time of his sojourn, his resurrection was established by many infallible proofs: he was seen, and heard, and touched, and handled. One of his disciples put his finger into the print of the nails, and thrust his hand into his side. He possessed a real body, for he ate a piece of a broiled fish and of a honeycomb before them all. It was Jesus of Nazareth, and none other than he, who met his disciples at Galilee. On this firm basis of fact we build our holy faith; but, certain as it is, it is none the less a marvel. All glory be to him "that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant."

The resurrection of our Lord is glorious in contrast with his humiliation. It has in it sufficient of glory to redeem his passion from the shame which gathered about it. We celebrate Gethsemane and Calvary, and find no bitterness in all their grief, because death is swallowed up in the victory of resurrection. His resurrection is glorious in its effects. He was "delivered for our offences," but "he was raised again for our justification." In death he discharged our debt: in resurrection he exhibited the receipt of all our liabilities.

He was Surety for Us, and therefore he smarted and went down to the prison of the grave; but by death he discharged his suretyship and was set free. Our Lord has risen, and therefore we shall rise in the day of his appearing. When we say one to another, "The Lord is risen indeed," we feel like singing all the time, for now our faith is not in vain, we are not in our sins, and those who have fallen asleep have not perished.

Our Lord's resurrection was glorious as to its cause, for it was a display of the glory of the Father. For "glory" you may read "power," if you please; for it was a great work of power to raise Jesus from the dead. To the child of God death furnishes a couch of rest, and is no longer a dark and noisome prison-cell. Death is the refining pot for this poor flesh and blood: the body is sown in corruption, but it is raised in incorruption and immortality. We shall with these eyes behold our Lord when he shall stand in the latter day upon the earth. O glorious resurrection, which has turned our poison into medicine! O miracle of love, which has made death to be the gate of life!

II. Let me introduce you to our second point, which is this—is also full of glory. It is a blessed thing that we should be made alive in Christ. As many of you as have believed in the Lord Jesus have been raised from among the dead. You were once without faith and without feeling. You had no sense of sin; you had no desire after holiness; you had no confidence in Christ; you had no love for the Father: but "you hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins." You live now even as Jesus lived when he was "declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead."

Being thus quickened you are partakers of a new life. You are not like Lazarus, who, when he was raised from the dead, had the same life restored to him. True, you have that same life about you. Alas, that you should have it! for it will be your burden and plague. But your true life has come to you by your being born again from above. "This is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life." The Holy Ghost hath wrought in us a higher life than nature possessed.

In this parallel of our history with the story of Christ, in our being spiritually raised from the dead, we have a pre-eminent security for future perfection. "He that hath wrought us for the selfsame thing is God, who also hath given unto us the earnest of the Spirit." If he raised us up when we were dead in sin, will he not keep us alive now that we live unto him? If he called us out of our graves when we were under the bondage of death, will he not preserve us now by the life of him that dieth no more? If the life of God has really been infused into us, who shall destroy it? Hath not our Master said, "I give unto my sheep eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand"? He would never have given us this life unless he had intended to bring it to perfection. As surely as you live by the Father, you live as Jesus does, beyond the range of further death.

III. But now I want your special attention while I notice, in the third place, that is emphatically new. Read our text: "Like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father"—I expected that we should then read, "even so we also should be raised by the glory of the Father;" but it is not so. Paul sometimes takes great leaps of thought. It is in his mind that we are raised together with Christ; but his thought has gone further, even to the activity which comes of life; and we read "that we also should walk in newness of life." As much as to say, "I need not tell you that you have been quickened as Christ was; but since you have been made alive, you must show it by your walk and conduct."

"Newness of life"—what does it mean? It means this. When we are born again, and believe in the Lord Jesus Christ—which things take place at the same time—we receive a life we never before possessed. We begin to feel, to think, and to act as we never did before. The new life is something foreign to our fallen nature; an exotic,

A Plant of another Clime.

It is not a development of something hidden in our constitution; it is not the evolution of a principle which already exists, only it is hampered and hindered. No: it is not written, "You hath he fostered, who had the germs of dormant life;" but, "You hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins." You had no life, you had nothing out of which life could come. Fostered you might have been; but all the fostering possible would only have developed your corrupt nature, and caused the evil within to grow at a greater rate. No seeds of eternal life lie buried in the dunghill of fallen nature. Eternal life is the gift of God.

This novel life is new in its principles. The old life at its very best only said, "I must do right that I may win a reward." Wage-earning is the principle of the old legal life when it tries to be obedient. Now you are moved by gratitude, and not by mercenary motive. Now, you serve not as a hired servant, but as a loving child. Grace reigns. The love of Christ restraineth you. It is your joy to obey out of love, and not from slavish fear.

New Motives in Life.

This life is swayed by new motives. You live now to please God; aforetime you lived to please yourself, or to please your neighbors. Once you lived for what you could get for yourself; you lived for the passing pleasures of a fleeting life; but now you have launched upon eternal seas. Eternity holds your treasures; eternity excites your efforts; eternity elevates your desires. You live as seeing him who is invisible, and your conduct is controlled, not by the judgment of fallible men, but by the rule of a heart-searching God.

Your inner life has made you conscious of new emotions. You feel now as you were not wont to feel. Your fears are new, your hopes are new; your sorrows are new, and your joys are new. If you were to meet your old self you would not wish to strike up an acquaintance with him, but would rather walk on the other side of the street. When I meet my former self I always quarrel with him, and he with me. I grieve to confess that I find another law in my members warring against the law of my mind, and seeking to bring me again into captivity. Behold, all things are new to us. One said to me, when I asked her what kind of change she had undergone—"Either the world is quite altered, or else I am." Yes, friends, the light is changed, because our eyes are opened to it. We feel the very opposite of what we felt by nature.

Now are we cheered by new hopes, we have a hope of immortality; a hope so glorious, that it causes us to purify ourselves in preparation for its realization. We wait for the glorious appearing of our Lord. We look for new heavens and a new earth. We have a lively hope which defies death.

IV. I must close, though the subject is absorbing, and one would like to go further into it. Our fourth point is this—

The Walk Which Comes out of this Life is new. The new life that God gives us is exceedingly active. I have never read that we are to lie down and sleep in the newness of life. It is true I have met with persons who professed to have been saved, and therefore they took matters easily, and made themselves religiously comfortable in idleness. I greatly question whether you have new life if you do not walk. The new life in a Christian is quick, energetic, forceful. The new life produces a holy walk as soon as it is created. If you have been born unto God, you have cast off your lethargy, and are ready to run the race set before you. You may happen to be dull and sleepy occasionally through disease; but you will not choose this. When in spiritual health, you will glow with divine ardor, and burn with holy fervency, delighting yourself in serving the Lord.

This activity of life induces progress. If we are really quickened, we are to walk in newness of life: that is to say,

We Shall Move on.

We are not to grow in the energy of the old life, but in newness of life. But, alas, all professors are not of this sort! I see a Christian man coming back one evening from a place of questionable amusement. Did he go there in newness of life? The old man used to go in that direction. When a man is doubtfully honest, and has made a bargain which will not bear the light; is that done in newness of life? When an employer grinds down the workman to the last farthing; is that done in newness of life? Surely, you will see what I am aiming at. Brethren, have done with the things of the flesh. Put off the old man. If Christ has quickened you, walk in newness of life. Say to the old man, "Down with you, sir! I have done with walking in your way."

What a change is wrought by the perception and possession of better things! Dr. Chalmers, in his Exposition of Romans, pictures a man engaged with full and earnest ambition on some humble walk of retail merchandise. He cares about petty things, and makes great account of his little stock-taking. His hopes and fears range within his circumscribed trading; and he aspires to nothing more than to reach a few shillings a week to retire upon. But a splendid property is willed to him, or he is introduced into a sublime walk of high and honorable adventure. Henceforth

Everything is Made New.

The man's cares, hopes, habits, tastes, desires, are all new. His expenditure alters; his valuation of money alters; his fear about the state of the stock disappears; his joy in the prospect of a small competency is no more before his eyes. He has risen to a different level altogether. New conditions have silently changed all things. The whole man is built on a bigger scale: his house, his table, his garments, his company, and his speech, are all of another sort. In the same way the Lord, by all that he has done for us, and in us, has changed everything. No point is unaffected. Newness of life affects our manhood from head to foot. The Lord has made us rich in himself, by the gift of Jesus, and by the work of his Spirit, and he would not have us grieving and fretting about the little matters which once were so exceedingly great to us. "After all these things do the Gentiles seek." Let us have higher cares and diviner aspirations. Let us seek to live the life of heaven on earth. We are called unto righteousness; let us not follow after mammon. We are new creatures; may the Lord renew us day by day!

The Christian life should be one of joyful vivacity. We cannot always be what we should like to be, especially if we have a sluggish liver or an aching head; but I would now speak of our normal condition. The Christian man, living in newness of life, should find life fresh about him. Our inner man is #### Renewed Day by Day.

A healthy Christian is one of the liveliest creatures on earth. When he is at work you may hear him sing. He cannot help it; do not blame him for a little noise. Let him sing, and laugh till he cries. Sometimes he cannot help it; he will burst if his soul may not have vent. When he begins to talk about his Lord his eyes flash fire. Some people hint that he is out of his mind; but those who know best assure us that he was never before so sane as now. Of course, the world thinks religion is such poor stuff that nobody could grow excited about it. To my mind, cold religion is the nastiest dish ever brought to table. True godliness is served up hot. Newness of life means a soul aglow with love to God, earnest, zealous, happy.

Come, my soul, if Christ has raised thee from the dead, do not live after the fashion of the dark grave which thou hast quitted. I am not so enamored of the sepulchre as to return to it. Walk after the fashion of the new life, and it will conduct thee to God from

Whence it Came.

Live a God-like life; let the divine principle in thee sit on the throne, and tread the animal beneath his feet. "It is easier said than done," cries one. That depends upon the life within. Life is full of power. I have seen an iron bar bent by the growth of a tree. Have you never heard of great paving-stones being lifted by fungi, which had pushed up beneath them? Life is a mighty thing, especially the divine life. If you choose to contract your souls by a sort of spiritual tight-lacing, or if you choose to bend yourselves down in a sorrow which never looks up, you may hinder your life and its walk: but give your life full scope, and what a walk you may have! Yield yourselves fully to God, and you shall see what you shall see. There is a happiness to be enjoyed by truly whole-hearted believers which some even of God's own children would think to be impossible.

Let me finish by a picture, which will show you what I mean by

Whole-Heartedness.

I have seen boys bathing, in the morning. One of them has just dipped his toes in the water, and he cries out, as he shivers, "Oh, it's so cold!" Another has gone in up to his ankles, and he also declares that it is fearfully chilly. But see! Another runs to the bank, and takes a header. He rises all in a glow. All his blood is circulating, and he cries "Delicious! What a beautiful morning! I am all in a glow. The water is splendid!" That is the boy for enjoying a bath! You Christian people who are paddling about in the shallows of religion, and just dipping your toes into it—you stand shivering in the cold air of the world which you are afraid to leave. Oh, that you would plunge into the river of life! How it would brace you! What tone it would give you! In for it, young man! In for it! Be a Christian, out and out. Serve the Lord with your whole being.

Oh, this is life! Oh, this is joy,
My God, to find thee so!
Thy face to see, thy voice to hear.
And all thy love to know.

May we thus walk in newness of life! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

The Jew's Idea of Wisdom.***

PROVERBS belongs to a group of works in the Hebrew literature, the subject of which is Wisdom. It is probably the earliest of them all, and may be regarded as the stem of which they are the branches. Without attempting to determine the relative age of these compositions, the ordinary reader can see the points of contact between Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, and a little careful study reveals that the book of Job, though fuller and richer in every respect, belongs to the same order. Outside the canon of Holy Scripture we possess two works which avowedly owe their suggestion and inspiration to our book, namely, The Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach, commonly called Ecclesiasticus, a genuine Hebrew product, and The Wisdom of Solomon, commonly called The Book of Wisdom, of much later origin, and exhibiting that fusion of Hebrew religious conceptions with Greek speculation which prevailed in the Jewish schools of Alexandria.

Broadly speaking, the Wisdom of the Hebrews covers the whole domain of what we should call Science and Philosophy. It is the consistent effort of the human mind to know, to understand and to explain all that exists. It is, to use the modern phrase, the search for truth. The "wise men" were not like Moses and the Prophets, inspired legislators and heralds of God's immediate message to mankind; but rather like the wise men among the earlier Greeks, Thales, Solon, Anaximenes, or like the Sophists among the later Greeks, Socrates and his successors, they brought all their faculties to bear in observing the facts of the world and of life and in seeking to interpret them, and then in the public streets or in appointed schools endeavored to communicate their knowledge to the young.

The Structure of the Book.

The main body of Proverbs is the collection which begins at the tenth chapter, the Proverbs of Solomon and ends at Chapter 22: 16. This collection has certain distinct features, which mark it off from all that precedes, and from all that follows. It is strictly speaking, a collection of proverbs, that is, of brief pointed sayings, sometimes containing a similitude, but more generally consisting of a single antithetical moral sentiment, such as spring into existence and pass current in every society of men. As the form is the same in all, so the general drift of their teaching is quite uniform; the morality inculcated is of no very lofty type; the motives for right conduct are mainly prudential; there is no sense of mystery, or wonder, no tendency to speculation or doubt; be good and you will prosper; be wicked and you will suffer, is the sum of the whole. A few scattered precepts occur which seem to touch a higher level and breathe a more spiritual air; and it is possible, as has been suggested, that these were added by the author of the first nine chapters when he revised and published the compilation.

An entirely new collection is that comprised in chapters twenty-five to twenty-nine, which was made, we are told, in the literary circle at the court of Hezekiah, two hundred and fifty years, or thereabouts, after the death of Solomon. In this collection there is no uniformity of structure such as distinguished the proverbs of the former collection. Some distichs occur, but as often as not the proverb is drawn out into three, four, and, in one case (25: 6, 7) five clauses. The social condition reflected in these

*From The Expositor's Bible: The Book of Proverbs, by R. F. Horton, M.A. The author has well maintained in this volume the high character of this series of works on the books of the Bible. He classifies under various headings such as Wealth, Friendship, Forgiving, Conduct, Freedom, the various gems of thought scattered through the Proverbs, and brings out of them a consistent system of philosophy. chapters is not very attractive; it is clear that the people have had experience of a bad ruler; we seem to have hints of the many troubled experiences through which the monarchy of Israel passed of divided rule, injustice, incapacity and oppression.

The two collections which have been described, with their several appendices, were at some favorable point in religious history, possibly in those happy days of Josiah, when the Deuteronomic law was newly promulgated to the joyful nation, brought together, and, as we should say now, edited with an original introduction by an author who, unknown to us by name, is among the greatest and noblest of Biblical writers.

THE BRITISH DISASTER IN MANIPORE.

THE disaster to the British forces in Manipore, India, described in these columns last week, appears, from later and fuller reports now received, to have involved a smaller sacrifice of life than was at first stated. It was believed that the whole of the native Goorkha force, which escorted the British Commissioner, had been annihilated, but it is now learned that about two hundred men succeeded in effecting a retreat to a place of safety. Unhappily the news is confirmed that Commissioner Quinton has been killed as were also Lieut. Col. C. McDowel Skene, Lieut. L. W. Brackenbury (whose portraits appear on this page), and several other British officers.

The catastrophe was evidently the result of rashness on one side, and treachery on the other. Commissioner Quinton on his arrival in the territory of Manipore, found that the throne was occupied by a weak prince, a brother of the deposed Maharajah, but the real power in the State was wielded by the Senapati or regent, who was a half-brother of the deposed monarch, and had become the Jubraj or heir-apparent. Mr. Quinton summoned a durbar, or conference of chiefs, in the hope of arranging for the restoration of the rightful Maharajah to the throne. The Jubraj declined to attend the durbar, and Mr. Quinton thereupon directed Lieut. Col. Skene to attack the palace.

Skene's force consisted of the 470 men whom he had brought with him as an escort, and about eighty men who formed the permanent guard of the British representative at Manipore. Opposed to this little force of about 550 men were over 6000 native Manipuris, who were massed around the palace. The attack was met with vigor, the little British force was driven back and took refuge in the Residency. Then the Manipuris assumed the offensive and attacked the Residency. The Goorkhas defended it bravely, but their ammunition becoming exhausted, a truce was arranged.

Lieut. Col. Skene.

Manipuris assumed the offensive and attacked the Residency. The attack on the Residency was then renewed. Lieut. Brackenbury who was in command was killed. The Goorkhas, finding their position untenable, cut their way through the besieging force and retreated, still fighting as they went, toward the hills. There they fell in with a small detachment under Col. Cowley. A consultation was held as to the possibility of rescuing the three prisoners from the palace, but it was clear that there was no hope of success, owing to the lack of ammunition. The retreat was, therefore, continued as far as Gherighat, where they were safe.

Troops are now being hurried forward to Manipore from Burmah and Assam in numbers sufficient to insure success. The usurping Maharajah has also been notified that it is the

The Jubraj announced himself willing to treat with the Commissioner. Firing ceased, and Mr. Quinton, accompanied by Col. Skene and Mr. Grimwood, the British representative at Manipore, went out into the open land to meet the Jubraj. They were at once seized and carried intention of the British to restore the deposed monarch to the throne. It appears that the present is not the first of these troubles. For years past there have been plots for getting rid of the Maharajah. They have not been successful before this, because the factions were divided, one party being headed by the Senapati, who was commander-in-chief, and the other by the Jubraj, who is now the usurping Maharajah. It was only when they were united by the arrangement that the Senapati should be recognized as next heir to the throne that the revolution succeeded. The country has long been torn by the contests of those rival chiefs, and will be vastly benefited if the British take possession of it and maintain peace and order. Our illustration is taken from a photograph of the native Manipuri village of Kohima.

A TOWN OF SWEET ODORS.

The Industry of Extracting Perfumes from Flowers which brings Grasse its Wealth.

(See Illustration.)

THE ancient little town of Grasse, in the South of France, is just now enjoying an unaccustomed honor in being a royal residence. Its chief hotel was engaged in March for the exclusive accommodation of Queen Victoria and her relatives and attendants. The aged monarch, it appears, was advised to seek change of climate for the benefit of her health and Grasse was recommended to her. She has been there since March 25, and is expected to remain till the end of the month if not later. Whether she will be benefited by her visit remains to be seen, but there is no doubt that the visit will benefit the town, which will henceforth have a European reputation as a health-resort.

Hitherto the only notoriety the town has had has come from its odoriferous industry. It is a veritable garden of fragrant flowers and its people thrive on the use they make of them. Large factories are filled with work-people busily engaged in distilling essences from roses, jasmine, heliotrope, verbena, violets, and other sweet-smelling flowers. In other factories there, the distillation of medicinal essences from herbs is carried on. Thousands of acres around the town are laid out in vast gardens in which the flowers grow and are carefully tended. In some sections one comes on whole acres of thyme, rosemary, eucalyptus and other plants from which the essences are extracted. Orange and lemon trees are also cultivated for the sake of their blossoms. Thus the town at this season is filled with delicious perfume brought by every wind that blows. So largely has this industry developed that no less than twelve hundred tons of orange-blossoms are annually used by the large factories. With these are eight hundred tons of roses, two hundred tons of jasmine and one hundred tons of violets, besides the more useful but less agreeable herbs which supply the drug-stores of Europe with their products. The gardens have gradually extended as the business has increased, so that now they reach almost to the shores of the Mediterranean, ten miles away. The illustration on page 268 represents one of the most important processes—that of sorting the roses.

Of the perfumes manufactured at Grasse the most precious are the attar of roses and the "neroli," which latter is made from the flowers of the bitter orange tree, and is used principally in the manufacture of eau-de-cologne. Extracts for scenting pocket-handkerchiefs are made from freshly gathered flowers laid between two sheets of glass. On each side of the glass is a layer of lard, which, in twelve to twenty-four hours, completely absorbs the odoriferous oil. When the flowers are abundant they are renewed every twelve hours, sometimes every six hours. The operation is repeated a different number of times on the same lard with different flowers. The lard is melted in a large iron vessel, and mixed with spirits made from grain, which, combining with the volatile oil, rises to the top; the fluid is then filtered.

ROMA.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

Written expressly for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

BY JENNIE FOWLER WILLING.

HE next point of interest was a sculptor's studio, near the Piazza dell'Indipendenza. Camilla had chosen that one because she was acquainted with a young man there, a son of one of her father's old friends.

There were some fine pieces in the studio, among them as bas-relievo, the figures of which were full of the daintiest, airiest grace.

"You first model your piece in clay, do you not?" asked Margaret. "And the master, himself, does that."

"Yes, yes, yes, Signorina," replied the student. "There is where his genius shows its power. The figure is first in his brain, which has to be trained to expression, so that the thought can be formed in clay. Then we make a plaster cast of the clay model, like that one," pointing to a figure that stood beside a young man who was at work upon a block of marble with his mallet and chisel.

"The sculptor employs cheaper hands than his own for most of the work, does he not?" asked Camilla.

The Native Village of Kohima, Manipore.

"Yes, yes, Signorina. We beginners get our hand in so that we can find out if it is in us to do good work. Many cut marble who can never do anything but imitate the casts. They never could be sculptors. After all is cut," he added passing his hand carelessly over the bare arm of a statue, "the smooth parts, like the faces and arms, have to be worked over patiently and well polished."

"Beautiful work," said Margaret. "But suppose you come to a discolored spot in the marble, that spoils it all."

"Indeed it does," replied the young man. "I will show you one," stepping out into the court whither the young ladies followed. "Now you see that piece of marble is like the cast that Boroldo is copying. The hands were to have been crossed as in the cast. When he had gone so far he found that dark vein in the marble. He cut and cut, trying to get by it without spoiling the piece; but he had to give it up. All his work on that goes for nothing."

"We find people like that," said Margaret. "The secret flaw or stain spoils the work of the Divine Artist."

"Yes, yes, yes, Signorina." The face of the Italian glowed responsively. "But the Divine Artist, as you call our Lord, can make the secret stains whiter than snow with his own blood."

"You have learned that wonderful and beautiful lesson," said Margaret, the Divine gladness lighting the depths of her eyes.

"I learned it of a countryman of yours, Signorina, an American. If I were given to the worship of saints, as I used to be, I should make a shrine for him:—though—his artistic sense stumbling over an incongruity, 'we never make saints in military costume. He is an officer in our army.'"

The blood surged from Margaret's face to her heart, which gave a great bound.

"He is out of the city now," the young sculptor went on, while he brushed a little dust from the cheek of a Sibil. "He loves our art; and spends time with us when he can. He and the Signor are great friends. We are all very proud to do anything for him. He does not care to become a sculptor. He works upon the finer material, the costlier, the human soul:—but—I have wondered if all Americans can turn their hand to anything that strikes their fancy. I have a mind to show you his piece in bas-relievo. You see, he was wounded at Dogali, where he rendered special service, for which he was promoted. While he was recovering his strength, though he studied hard, writing, and doing all good things for our people, he took up the chisel for recreation. The Signor helped with the modelling and I, with the cutting; but the faces came out of his own head. I am sure he wouldn't care if I showed it to a countrywoman of his. If you will kindly step into his room. He used to study and work in this little alcove. The Signor and I fitted it up for him."

He led the young ladies across the court, in which was a gently splashing fountain surrounded by beds of bright bloom. The alcove was partitioned from the garden by glass doors, a few feet before which was a light trellis, supporting a lemon tree, whose dark leaves, and yellow fruit contrasted prettily with the large, full, red and white roses, with which a bush in the corner of the grey stone wall of the old building, seemed quite ablaze.

"Our Major is something of a recluse," remarked the young sculptor, as he led them toward that curtain. "Not gloomy, but some great grief has made him serious. This is the piece," pushing the crimson curtain to one end of the rod. "We regard it as excellent for an amateur. He worked upon it 'con amore' I have always thought that it had something to do with his past life."

When Margaret passed into Jerome's room, a half score of birthdays seemed to roll off her head. The sun of youthful hope that seemed to have set ages before, sent the sweet tender rays of its rising again, across a heart that had humbly accepted loneliness as its lot, choosing to forget its own loss in the gain of others. When her eyes rested upon Jerome's thought in marble, her face was redder than the roses, and then whiter than the lilies in the garden outside. The room seemed suddenly hushed, as by a death, or a birth. The splash of the fountain floated in from the garden, and the glad trill of a bird. His bas-relievo represented the sacrifice of Iphigenia, and in the sad, patient, brave, self-forgetful face of the main figure, Margaret recognized her own, while her father stood beside the altar as Agamemnon, proud and stern.

The young sculptor glanced at the marble and then at her face; but Camilla, with an apparently careless gesture, partly overturned a light stand near the piece. He sprang to catch it; and when he looked again at Margaret, her eyes were covered by her veil, so that he failed to trace the resemblance.

"Many thanks," said the Italian girl in a voice that was bewildering sweet. "It is very kind of you to show us this piece of your friend's work. Come and see us. We are at the corner of Via Torino and Via Cavour, fifth flat. We will be there a few days yet."

Her matter-of-fact manner braced Margaret's over-wrought nerves, like the tonic of everyday obligation and duty.

Strange as it may seem, though Camilla shared Margaret's joy in finding her lost friend; yet neither spoke of him when they were alone. They were both deeply reticent, and the Italian girl did not care to give the source of her information in regard to Jerome. She had a little secret of her own that she was not quite ready to communicate.

The next day was one of true Italian weather, the clear sky and balmy air seeming to plead with every one to come out-of-doors and renew life.

"Whither away this charming day?" asked Margaret in unintentional rhyme, as they rose from their morning worship after breakfast.

"We are to do the Jewish quarter, are we not?" was Carolyn's responsive question: "It is not a pleasant neighborhood; I am quite sure I should decidedly prefer a bright day for that disagreeable business. The sky is perfect this morning," looking out of the window, and up into the clear, deep azure.

"Vy do ve go at all to ze Jews?" asked Marie in turn, a centuries-old prejudice cropping out in her graceful, little shrug. "Ze church has always—"

"Treated them scandalously," threw in Camilla; "begging your dear little pardon, my Queen, you spoke the other day of the Roman sense of dominance. The Jews have a sense of sacerdotal aristocracy quite as pronounced. They were brought here to Rome as captives and slaves, but you know they conquered their conquerors."

"I do not see—I cannot understand that," said Carolyn looking intently from under her uplifted brows.

"Why, don't you know? The old Romans, though haughty and stern with equals, delighted in their freed people, who were often Jews?"

"They never forget how to make money," said Carolyn. "And they seem to have the secret of avoiding the sicknesses which kill off other people."

"The Lord taught them that," said Margaret. "That old Mosaic law is the best sanitary code ever known. It keeps them well to obey it. They have always had the meanest part of the city, yet they escape the fever, and when the cholera comes, it is said that it never touches the Jews' quarter. The old law made them thrifty, because it made them just, and temperate, and industrious."

"We, in England, ought to think well of them," said Carolyn, brushing the dust of yesterday from the skirt of her travelling dress. "We have had one of them at the head of our government: and there is no end to the primrose knights and dames, who wear his flower, and carry out his conservative principles."

"What was that that Beaconsfield said?" queried Camilla, "about Christendom honoring the Jews, because half of them worshipped a Jew, and the other half a Jewess?"

"Don't you remember, my dear," said Margaret, "he speaks in Coringsby about their baffling the Pharaohs, Nebuchadnezzars, and Romans? He says something about the mixed races of persecutors disappearing, while the pure, persecuted race remains: and then their personal influence, not only their literature saturating the Christian mind, but living Hebrews monopolizing the professional chairs in European Universities, and ruling courts and ministers of finance."

"I will run away from you wise people for my hat!" exclaimed Marie, tossing up her vivacious, little hands. She had been listening intently and drawing her own conclusions. She stopped at the door, and turned to throw back: "Ze church do pairsecute zem, ever, ever, ever; and yet our Lord was a Jew; and ven he had all nations to choose from he took ze beautiful Jewess to be his mozzer. O, my poor, leetle head!" striking her forehead tragically. "It cannot hold all ze contradictions. I vill let it all go! Ze church may say vat it zinks best; I vill love zem all—all—Jews and all!"

The young ladies drove into the Ghetto through the passage where the old gates used to be that shut the Jews up in their narrow quarters every night.

"Here they had to stay, packed as closely as possible," recited Carolyn, "and if they went out into the city during the day, the men had to wear yellow hats, and the women yellow veils. That inscription on the wall just before we came in—what was it, cousin?—in Latin—you read it."

"Yes," replied Margaret, "a prayer to Christ: 'Saviour of the world, save us!'"

"And then the church over there near the bridge of Quattro Capi, with the crucifix on the front, and those words from Isaiah, 'I have spread out my hands all day, unto a rebellious people.' Besides, you know, they used to drive them into this church just back of the grand portico ruin, and stand over them with scourges to make them worship in the Christian's way."

"Not much Christianity about all that," said Camilla, indignantly. "I don't wonder they hated the whole thing."

"Pius IX. took down the gates of the Ghetto," said Carolyn, "and let the Jews live where they please."

"Zat vas vone good zing of him," laughed Marie, a little nervously.

"Yes," said Margaret. "You know he was a gay, benevolent, young, cavalry officer, before he became a priest. He did not take up intolerance easily."

"He disappointed my poor people execrably," exclaimed Camilla with warmth. "His family was so good, that the old pope before him said that even its cats were liberal. Everybody thought that Pius IX. would be a reformer: but I suppose he found himself in an iron cage, and helpless."

"We are passing some wonderful ruins," said Carolyn most seriously. "Do you not think you ought to give them proper attention?"

"Yes, yes my lady Professor!" cried Camilla. "These magnificent columns are a part of the Porticus-Livia-et-Octavia," reading slowly. "O, I see! Augustus Caesar built this in honor of his wife, and of Octavia, his sister, who married Mark Antony—poor thing!"

"It occupies the site of the old temples of Jupiter Stator, and Juno Regina," said Carolyn, in her zeal for facts quite ignoring sentiment. "They were built by Romulus, just think of their antiquity! In that church across the way, Sant' Angelo Pescheria"—

"The angel of the fish-market," interpreted Camilla.

"Rienzi the Tribune took his stand against Roman oppression," Carolyn persevered. "In it he kept the vigil of the Holy Ghost, and on that wall he painted his allegory."

After looking about the Ghetto and leaving their cab long enough to run up some wretched stone flights for a look into a neat dispensary, a part of the Scotch mission, they drove around by the theatre of Marcellus.

"And who was he?" asked Maria. "I never can tell zose two zousand years old people zi vone from zi ozzer."

"Augustus' nephew and son-in-law," replied Carolyn, "Augustus meant him for his successor, but he died early. This magnificent building was his monument."

Marie gave a sigh of relief when they left the Ghetto, and were soon winding their way up the old Janiculum.

"The wall that was here before this one, said Margaret, calling attention to the picturesque boundary of the roads, "was paid for by poor Beatrice Cenci. She was burned before the high altar in the church up there," pointing toward San Pietro in Montorio, "though it is said that there is not even an inscription to mark her grave. They persecuted her to the death, and then buried her in one of their grandest churches!"

"Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain built this church," said Carolyn as the cab stopped before the edifice.

"A thank-offering for their success in robbing the Incas and Montezumas," said Camilla, dryly.

"We must go in," said Carolyn getting out of the cab.

"I do not care for it," said Marie. "I know I will not remember half of ze churches, and zui zousand of years! and zui great people! zey are now all dust and nonsense! I will not go in."

"I prefer the view," said Margaret looking off over the city, her thoughts busy, you can easily guess upon what.

"Why, cousin!" exclaimed Carolyn, "your art hero, Michelangelo, did a lot of the work here. Don't you remember he and Vasari had a contest over the ornamentation of the Barbarini chapel, and he carried the day?"

"Yes," replied Margaret, "and what was better, he was great enough to acknowledge his mistake, when he found that his love of Greek simplicity had carried him into too great plainness."

Carolyn did her duty faithfully by the tombs and inscriptions while the others enjoyed the superb view of the city, the hills, and the sky. Then they drove toward the Convent of St. Onofrio, where Tasso spent his last days, and was buried. The green hill down which they wound, was ornamented with statues and busts of the heroes of 1849 and 1870, and everywhere they were resplendent with spring flowers, snowy with daisies and golden with buttercups.

"There is all that is left of Tasso's oak," said Carolyn, pointing across the way from the convent.

"There is nothing that we care for in the church except his monument, is there, Lyn?" asked Margaret as they walked toward the old building.

"Perhaps not," was the dubious reply: "but your American avidity for the antique ought to interest you in the church itself. It was built before your continent was discovered. I believe:—in honor of an Egyptian hermit,—one who lived in a cave sixty years, never hearing a human voice except his own."

"I wouldn't have built a church for him," said Camilla. "No matter how good he was. He ought to have gone about to help other poor sinners, if he had found the way to please God."

"Anozzer mistake," said Marie, shaking her pretty head. "Let us hear about zis great Tasso. Ze Lord vill have to take care of his saints; zey do make so many mistakes."

"Tasso was one of our noble, unselfish poets," replied Camilla; "no time-server but brave and true:—a seer."

"You can see it in his face in this fresco," said Margaret, stopping before the one on the wall, "and better still from that bust taken from a cast of his dead face."

"It is a pity he died just when they were ready to give him the laurel crown," said Carolyn, when they stood before the poet's monument in the church.

"No:" said Margaret, "that mattered little; whatever he did by God's dear grace to make people better is his real crown; and it is unfading."

"To be sure," assented Camilla.

"What do you say, girls, asked Margaret, after they had driven home and had luncheon, "shall we try another church this afternoon."

"My poor, little head is quite tired out," replied Marie with spoiled child grace, "but let us get zrough zem all vile ve can."

So they started for San Paolo fuori le Mura, taking on the way, the temple of Vista or Hercules, whichever it is,—the round "run," the model of which makes such a pretty, bronze inkstand—and the "Bocco della Verita," the large stone face, the jaws of which are said to snap together when one who has told a falsehood thrusts his hand between them,—and the temple of Fortuna Virilis, supposed to have been built by Servius Fullius,—and the house of Rienzi. All in on short drive; no wonder Marie's head was tired.

When they neared the Porta San Paolo, Carolyn reminded them that Attila and Genseric came in at that gate to conquer Rome, and Paul went out by it to his martyrdom.

"To conquer Rome, also," said Margaret. The Protestant cemetery was near the gate. They had been through it before, looking for the grave in which Leigh Hunt buried Shelley's heart. So they inquired of the costodian the way to the old cemetery which was near by; and went up along the path among the violets and daisies to the grave of poor Keats, whose name was "writ on water."

SONG OF THE BURDEN-BEARER.

"I'll drop my burden at His feet
And bear a song away."

OVER the narrow foot-path
That led from my lowly door,
I went with a thought of the Master,
As oft I had walked before.
My heart was heavily laden,
And with tears my eyes were dim;
But I knew I should lose the burden
Could I get a glimpse of Him.

It was more than I could carry,
If I carried it all alone;
And none in my house might share it—
Only One upon the throne.
It came between me and pleasure,
Between my work and me;
But our Lord could understand it,
And His touch could set me free.

Over the trodden pathway,
To the fields all shorn and bare,
I went with a step that faltered,
And a face that told of care.
I had lost the light of the morning,
With its shimmer of sun and dew;
But a gracious look of the Master
Would the strength of morn renew.

While yet my courage wavered,
And the sky before me blurred,
I heard a Voice behind me
Saying a tender word.
And I turned to see the brightness
Of heaven upon the road,
And suddenly lost the pressure
Of the weary, crushing load.

Nothing that hour was altered,
I had still the weight of care;
But I bore it now with gladness
Which comes of answered prayer.
Not a grief the soul can fether
Nor cloud its vision, when
The dear Lord gives the spirit
To breathe to His will, Amen.

O friends! if the greater burdens
His love can make so light,
Why should His wonderful goodness
Our halting credence slight?
The little sharp vexations,
And the briers that catch and fret,
Shall we not take them to the Helper
Who has never failed us yet?

Tell Him about the heartache,
And tell Him the longings, too;
Tell Him the baffled purpose,
When we scarce know what to do.
Then, leaving all our weakness
With the One divinely strong,
Forget that we bore the burden,
And carry away the song!

—M. E. Sangster.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON PREACHED IN THE NEW BROOKLYN TABERNACLE LAST SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 3, 1891.

"Of spices great abundance; neither was there any such spice as the Queen of Sheba gave King Solomon." II. Chron. 9: 9.

WHAT is that building out yonder, glittering in the sun? Have you not heard? It is the House of the Forest of Lebanon. King Solomon has just taken to it his bride, the princess of Egypt. You see the pillars of the portico, and a great tower, adorned with one thousand shields of gold, hung on the outside of the tower—five hundred of the shields of gold manufactured at Solomon's order, five hundred were captured by David, his father, in battle. See how they blaze in the noonday sun!

Solomon was not like some of the kings of the present day—crowned imbecility. All the splendor of his palace and retinue were eclipsed by his intellectual power. Why, he seemed to know everything. He was the first great naturalist the world ever saw. Peacocks from India strutted the basaltic walk, and apes chattered in the trees, and deer stalked the parks and there were aquariums with foreign fish, and aviaries with foreign birds; and tradition says these birds were so well-tamed, that Solomon might walk clear across the city under the shadow of their wings as they hovered and flitted about him.

More than this, he had a great reputation for the conundrums and riddles that he made and guessed. He and King Hiram, his neighbor, used to sit by the hour and ask riddles, each one paying in money if he could not answer or guess the riddle. The Solomonic navy visited all the world, and the sailors, of course, talked about the wealth of their king, and about the riddles and enigmas that he made and solved; and the news spread until Queen Balkis, away off south, heard of it, and sent messengers with a few riddles that she would like to have Solomon solve, and a few puzzles which she would like to have him find out. She sent among other things, to King Solomon, a diamond with a hole so small that a needle could not penetrate it, asking him to thread that diamond. And Solomon took a worm and put it at the opening in the diamond, and the worm crawled through, leaving the thread in the diamond. The queen also sent a goblet to Solomon, asking him to fill it with water that did not pour from the sky, and that did not rush out from the earth; and immediately Solomon put a slave on the back of a swift horse and galloped him around and around the park until the horse was nigh exhausted, and from the perspiration of the horse the goblet was filled. She also sent King Solomon five hundred boys in girls' dress, and five hundred girls in boys' dress, wondering if he would be acute enough to find out the deception. Immediately Solomon, when he saw them wash their faces, knew from the way they applied the water that it was all a cheat.

Queen Balkis was so pleased with the acuteness of Solomon, that she said: "I'll just go and see him for myself." Yonder it comes—the cavalcade—horses and dromedaries, chariots and charioteers, jingling harness and clattering hoofs, and blazing shields, and flying ensigns, and clapping cymbals. The place is saturated with the perfume. She brings cinnamon, and saffron, and calamus, and frankincense, and all manner of sweet spices. As the retinue sweeps through the gate, the armed guard inhale the aroma. "Halt!" cry the charioteers, as the wheels grind the gravel in front of the pillared portico of the king. Queen Balkis alights in an atmosphere bewitched with perfume. As the dromedaries are driven up to the king's storehouses, and the bundles of camphor are unloaded, and the sacks of cinnamon, and the boxes of spices are opened, the purveyors of the palace discover what my text announces: "Of spices, great abundance; neither was there any such spices as the Queen of Sheba gave to King Solomon."

Well, my friends, you know that all theologians agree in making Solomon a type of Christ, and making the Queen of Sheba a type of every truth-seeker; and I shall take the responsibility of saying that all the spikenard, and cassia, and frankincense which the Queen of Sheba brought to King Solomon are mightily suggestive of the sweet spices of our holy religion. Christianity is not a collection of sharp technicalities, and angular facts, and chronological tables, and dry statistics. Our religion is compared to frankincense and to cassia, but never to night shade. It is a bundle of myrrh. It is a dash of holy light. It is a sparkle of cool fountains. It is an opening of opaline gates. It is a collection of spices. Would God that we were as wise in taking spices to our Divine King as Queen Balkis was wise in taking the spices to the earthly Solomon!

What many of us most need is to have the humdrum driven out of our life, and the humdrum out of our religion. The American, and English, and Scottish church will die of humdrum unless there be a change. An editor from San Francisco a few weeks ago wrote me saying he was getting up for his paper a symposium from many clergymen discussing among other things, "Why do not people go to church?" and he wanted my opinion and I gave it in one sentence: "People do not go to church because they cannot stand the humdrum." The fact is that most people have so much humdrum in their worldly calling, that they do not want to have added the humdrum of religion. We need in all our sermons and exhortations and songs and prayers more of what Queen Balkis brought to Solomon, namely more spice.

The fact is that the duties and cares of this life, coming to us from time to time, are stupid often, and inane, and intolerable. Here are men who have been bartering, and negotiating, climbing, pounding, hammering for twenty years, forty years, fifty years. One great long drudgery has their life been. Their face anxious, their feelings benumbed, their days monotonous. What is necessary to brighten up that man's life, and to sweeten that acid disposition, and to put sparkle into the man's spirits? The spicery of our holy religion. Why, if between the losses of life there dashed a gleam of an eternal gain; if between the betrayals of life there came the gleam of the undying friendship of Christ; if in dull times in business we found ministering spirits flying to and fro in our office, and store, and shop, every-day life, instead of being a stupid monotone, would be a glorious inspiration, penduluming between calm satisfaction and high rapture.

THE QUEEN OF SHEBA'S VISIT.

How any woman keeps house without the religion of Christ to help her, is a mystery to me. To have to spend the greater part of one's life, as many women do, in planning for the meals, in stitching garments that will soon be rent again, and deploring breakages, and supervising tardy subordinates, and driving off dust that soon again will settle, and doing the same thing day in and day out, and year in and year out, until their hair silvers, and the back stoops, and the spectacles crawl to the eyes, and the grave breaks open under the thin sole of the shoe—oh, it is a long monotony! But when Christ comes to the drawing-room, and comes to the kitchen, and comes to the nursery, and comes to the dwelling, then how cheery become all womanly duties. She is never alone now. Martha gets through fretting and joins Mary at the feet of Jesus. All day long Deborah is happy because she can help Lapidoth; Hannah, because she can make a coat for young Samuel; Miriam, because she can watch her infant brother; Rachel, because she can help her father water the stock; the widow of Sarepta because the cruse of oil is being replenished. O woman, having in your pantry a nest of boxes containing all kinds of condiments, why have you not tried in your heart and life the spicery of our holy religion? "Martha! Martha! thou art careful and troubled about many things; but one thing is needful, and Mary hath chosen that good part which shall not be taken away from her."

I must confess that a great deal of the religion of this day is utterly insipid. There is nothing piquant or elevating about it. Men and women go around humming psalms in a minor key, and culturing melancholy, and their worship has in it more sighs than rapture. We do not doubt their piety. Oh, no. But they are sitting at a feast where the cook has forgotten to season the food. Everything is flat in their experience and in their conversation. Emancipated from sin, and death, and hell, and on their way to a magnificent heaven, they act as though they were trudging on toward an everlasting Botany Bay. Religion does not seem to agree with them. It seems to catch in the wind-pipe and become a tight strangulation instead of an exhilaration. All the infidel books that have been written, from Voltaire down to Herbert Spencer, have not done so much damage to our Christianity as lugubrious Christians. Who wants a religion woven out of the shadows of the night? Why go growling on your way to celestial enthronement? Come out of that cave, and sit down in the warm light of the Sun of Righteousness. Away with your odes to melancholy and Hervey's "Meditations among the Tombs."

Then let our songs abound,
And every tear be dry;
We're marching through Emmanuel's ground
To fairer worlds on high.

I have to say, also, that we need to put more spice and enlivenment in our religious teaching; whether it be in the prayer-meeting, or in the Sabbath School, or in the Church. We ministers need more fresh air and sunshine in our lungs, and our heart, and our head. Do you wonder that the world is so far from being converted when you find so little vivacity in the pulpit and in the pew? We want, like the Lord, to plant in our sermons and exhortations more lilies of the field. We want fewer rhetorical elaborations, and fewer sesquipedalian words; and when we talk about shadows, we do not want to say adumbration; and when we mean queer-ness, we do not want to talk about idiosyncrasies; or if a stitch in the back, we do not want to talk of lumbago; but, in the plain vernacular preach that Gospel which proposes to make all men happy, honest, victorious, and free. In other words, we want more cinnamon and less gristle. Let this be so in all the different departments of work to which the Lord calls us. Let us be plain. Let us be earnest. Let us be common-sensical. When we talk to the people in a vernacular they can understand, they will be very glad to come and receive the truth we present. Would to God that Queen Balkis would drive her spice-laden dromedaries into all our sermons and prayer-meeting exhortations.

More than that, we want more life and spice in our Christian work. The poor do not want so much to be groaned over as sung to. With the bread, and medicines, and the garments you give them, let there be an accompaniment of smiles and brisk encouragement. Do not stand and talk to them about the wretchedness of their abode, and the hunger of their looks, and the hardness of their lot. Ah! they know it better than you can tell them. Show them the bright side of the thing, if there be any bright side. Tell them good times will come. Tell them that for the children of God there is immortal rescue. Wake them up out of their stolidity by an inspiring laugh, and while you send in help, like the Queen of Sheba also send in the spices. There are two ways of meeting the poor. One is to come into their house with a nose elevated in disgust, as much as to say: "I don't see how you live here in this neighborhood. It actually makes me sick. There is that bundle—take it, you poor miserable wretch, and make the most of it." Another way is to go into the abode of the poor in a manner which seems to say: "The blessed Lord sent me. He was poor himself. It is not more for the good I am going to try to do you than it is for the good you can do me." Coming in that spirit, the gift will be as aromatic as the spikenard on the feet of Christ, and all the hovels in that alley will be fragrant with the spice.

We need more spice and enlivenment in our church music. Churches sit discussing whether they shall have choirs, or precentors, or organs, or bass-voils, or cornets; I say, take that which will bring out the most inspiring music. If we had half as much zeal and spirit in our churches as we have in the songs of our Sabbath Schools, it would not be long before the whole earth would quake with the coming God. Why, in most churches, nine-tenths of the people do not sing; or they sing so feebly that the people at their elbows do not know they are singing. People mouth and mumble the praises of God; but there is not more than one out of a hundred who makes "a joyful noise" unto the Rock of our Salvation. Sometimes when the congregation forgets itself, and is all absorbed in the goodness of God, or the glories of heaven, I get an intimation of what church-music will be a hundred years from now, when the coming generation shall wake up to its duty.

I promise a high spiritual blessing to any one who will sing in church, and who will sing so heartily that the people all around cannot help but sing. Wake up! all the churches from Bangor to San Francisco, and across Christendom. It is not a matter of preference; it is a matter of religious duty. Oh, for fifty times more volume of sound. German chorals in German cathedrals surpass us, and yet Germany has received nothing at the hands of God compared with America; and ought the acclaim in Berlin be louder than that in Brooklyn? Soft, long-drawn-out music, is appropriate for the drawing-room and appropriate for the concert; but St. John gives an idea of the sonorous and resonant congregational singing appropriate for churches when, in listening to the temple service of heaven, he says: "I heard a great voice as the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings. Hallelujah, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth."

Join with me in a crusade, giving me not only your hearts, but the mighty uplifting of your voices, and I believe we can, through Christ's grace, sing fifty thousand souls into the kingdom of Christ. An argument, they can laugh at; a sermon, they may talk down; but a vast audience joining in one anthem is irresistible. Would that Queen Balkis would drive all her spice-laden dromedaries into our church-music. "Neither was there any such spice as the Queen of Sheba gave King Solomon."

Now I want to impress this audience with the fact that religion is sweetness and perfume, and spikenard, and saffron, and cinnamon, and cassia, and frankincense, and all sweet spices together. "Oh," you say, "I have not looked at it as such. I thought it was a nuisance; it had for me a repulsion; I held my breath as though it were malodor; I have been appalled at its advance; I have said, if I have any religion at all, I want to have just as little of it as is possible to get through with." Oh, what a mistake you have made, my brother. The religion of Christ is a present and everlasting redolence. It counteracts all trouble. Just put it on the stand beside the pillow of sickness. It catches in the curtains, and perfumes the stifling air. It sweetens the cup of bitter medicine, and throws a glow on the gloom of the turned lattice. It is a balm for the aching side, and a soft bandage for the temple stung with pain. It lifted Samuel Rutherford into a revelry of spiritual delight, while he was in physical agonies. It helped Richard Baxter until, in the midst of such a complication of diseases as perhaps no other man ever suffered, he wrote, "The Saint's Everlasting Rest." And it poured light upon John Bunyan's dungeon—the light of the shining gate of the shining city. And it is good for rheumatism, and for neuralgia, and for low spirits, and for consumption; it is the catholicon for all disorders. Yes, it will heal all your sorrows.

Why did you look so sad to-day when you came in? Alas! for the loneliness and the heart-break, and the load that is never lifted from your soul. Some of you go about feeling like Macaulay when he wrote: "If I had another month of such days as I have been spending, I would be impatient to get down into my little narrow crib in the ground like a weary factory-child." And there have been times in your life when you wished you could get out of this life. You have said: "Oh, how sweet to my lips would be the dust of the valley," and wished you could pull over you in your last slumber the coverlet of green grass and daisies. You have said: "Oh, how beautifully quiet it must be in the tomb. I wish I was there." I see all around about me widowhood, and orphanage, and childlessness; sadness, disappointment, perplexity. If I could ask all those to rise in this audience who have felt no sorrow, and been buffeted by no disappointment—if I could ask all such to rise, how many would rise? Not one.

A widowed mother, with her little child, went West, hoping to get better wages there; and she was taken sick, and died. The overseer of the poor got her body and put it in a box, and put it in a wagon, and started down the street toward the cemetery at full trot. The little child—the only child—ran after it through the streets, bare-headed, crying: "Bring me back my mother! bring me back my mother!" And it was said that as the people looked on and saw her crying after that which lay in the box in the wagon—all she loved on earth—it is said the whole village was in tears. And that is what a great many of you are doing—chasing the dead. Dear Lord, is there no appeasement for all this sorrow that I see about me? Yes, the thought of resurrection and reunion far beyond this scene of struggle and tears.

Some one could not understand why an old German Christian scholar used to be always so calm, and happy, and hopeful, when he had so many trials, and sicknesses, and ailments. A man secreted himself in the house. He said: "I mean to watch this old scholar and Christian;" and he saw the old Christian man go to his room and sit down on the chair beside the stand, and open the Bible and begin to read. He read on and on, chapter after chapter, hour after hour, until his face was all aglow with the tidings from heaven, and when the clock struck twelve, he arose, and shut his Bible, and said, "Blessed Lord, we are on the same old terms yet. Good-night. Good-night." Oh, you sin-parched and you trouble-pounded, here is comfort, here is satisfaction. Will you come and get it? I cannot tell you what the Lord offers you hereafter so well as I can tell you now. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be."

Have you read of the Taj Mahal in India, in some respects the most majestic building on earth? Twenty thousand men were twenty years in building it. It cost about sixteen millions of dollars. The walls are of marble, inlaid with cornelian from Bagdad, and turquoise from Thibet, and jasper from the Punjab, and amethyst from Persia, and all manner of precious stones. A traveller says that it seems to him like the shining of an enchanted castle of burnished silver. The walls are two hundred and forty-five feet high, and from the top of these springs a dome thirty more feet high, that dome containing the most wonderful echo the world has ever known; so that ever and anon travellers standing below with flutes, and drums, and harps, are testing that echo, and the sounds from below strike up and then come down as it were the voices of angels all around about the building. There is around it a garden of tamarind, and banyan, and palm, and all the floral glories of the ransacked earth. But that is only a tomb of a dead empress, and it is tame compared with the grandeurs which God has builded for your living and immortal spirit. Oh, home of the blessed! Foundations of gold! Arches of victory! Cap-stones of praise! And a dome in which there are echoing and re-echoing the hallelujahs of the ages. And around about that mansion is a garden—the garden of God—and all the springing fountains are the bottled tears of the Church in the wilderness, and all the crimson of the flowers is the deep hue that was caught up from the carnage of earthly martyrdoms, and the fragrance is the prayer of all the saints, and the aroma puts into utter forgetfulness the cassia and the spikenard, and the frankincense, and the world-renowned spices which the Queen Balkis, of Abyssinia, fung at the feet of King Solomon.

When shall these eyes thy heaven-built walls
And pearly gates behold,
Thy bulwarks, with salvation strong,
And streets of shining gold?

Through obduracy on our part, and through the rejection of that Christ who makes heaven possible, I wonder if any of us will miss that spectacle? I fear! I fear! The queen of the South will rise up in judgment against this generation and condemn it, because she came from the uttermost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and behold, a greater than Solomon is here! May God grant that through your own practical experience you may find that religion's ways are ways of pleasantness, and that all her paths are paths of peace—that it is perfume now and perfume forever. And there was an abundance of spice; "neither was there any such spice as the Queen of Sheba gave to King Solomon."

A CRY FOR SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

ONE MILLION WHITE CHILDREN IN THE SOUTH-WEST WITHOUT RELIGIOUS PRIVILEGES.

Rev. Dr. W. P. Paxson, Son of the Pioneer American Western Sunday School Founder, Describes the Work of the A. S. S. Union, Among the Whites and Civilized Indians—An Inviting Mission-Field—Christian Co-operation Needed.

(See illustrations on the first pages.)

CHRISTIAN patriots cannot learn the real truth about any section of our land, without feeling deep concern about its future. Whether we study the condition of the people in the urban or the rural districts, we find elements which are grounds for apprehension.

Social, political and religious problems cause concern to every thoughtful man. What hope is there that out of this seething turmoil we shall reach to better things? The one hope is in the young. If our boys and girls can be Christianized now, there is hope for the future.

That fact renders the work of every man who is laboring among the young as a teacher in a Sunday School, or in any other way, a work of national moment. The readers of this journal must have realized this truth and they will therefore be interested in the portrait we give this week of a representative worker in this field with some account of what he has done and what he is trying to do.

A Grand Record.

The Rev. W. P. Paxson, D. D., is the Superintendent of the Southwestern Department of the American Sunday School Union. His district includes the States of Missouri, Arkansas, Texas and Louisiana, and the Indian Territory. This field he organized at the close of the Civil War, and he has now a corps of fifteen assistants whose labors, as shown in the latest report of the Southwestern Department, have been the means of gathering into these Sunday Schools 22,366 neglected children, in the year from March 1889 to March 1890. During that time, 572 new schools were organized.

The father of Dr. Paxson was Stephen Paxson, the pioneer American Missionary in Missouri and Illinois. Some thirty-eight years ago, when young Paxson was about fifteen years old, he spent his vacations in the field then occupied by his father in Illinois and Missouri, and assisted him in the work. During his lifetime, the elder Paxson planted 1,311 new Sunday Schools, and gathered into them 83,000 scholars and teachers. The seed then sown by the devoted missionary has borne fruit a thousand-fold, as is shown by the report above quoted.

Thousands of Schools Planted.

"I was born in Alabama, among the Cherokees," said Rev. Dr. Paxson, yesterday. "After the war, I went, under the auspices of the American Sunday School Association, to re-organize the schools in Missouri, and when this was done, Arkansas, Texas and the Indian Territory were added to my field. Since that time, with the aid of my associates, we have planted 7,586 schools, containing 37,555 teachers, and 311,295 scholars, besides visiting and aiding 10,312 other schools, containing 60,018 teachers and 655,431 scholars. During our travels we have distributed 70,813 Bibles and Testaments. Our schools are scattered all over the Southwest, and besides schools among the whites, we have a number among the colored people.

"Then we have 176 schools among the five civilized Indian tribes, the Cherokees, Choctaws, Seminoles, Creeks and Chickasaws. Rev. J. P. Lane, one of our missionaries who lives at Norman, Oklahoma Territory, superintends this sphere. The work is very difficult because there are three distinct languages spoken among the five civilized nations of Indians, besides many dialects. The Creeks can understand the Seminoles, the Choctaws and Chickasaws can understand each other, because their languages, though differing, come from the same stem, but the other nations cannot converse, and the work among them, involves learning all three languages or using an interpreter.

Missionary Methods.

"Our missionaries," explained Dr. Paxson, "are supported by contributions from Sunday Schools, churches and other sources. There are several instances where a mission is supported by a single individual, the total cost being about $700 a year. The Board of Managers, of whom Judge Strong is President, has its headquarters in Philadelphia, where the vice-President has associated with him thirty-six business men, representing various denominations, yet all contributing to the work. One dollar, in the Southwestern districts, about which I know most, secures the instruction of two children in our Sunday Schools. Our method of working is to assign to the missionary several counties, and he takes steps to ascertain what religious element there is in his district. When we learn definitely about these matters, the next step is the planting of a Sunday School and the supplying of Bibles and Testaments. Wherever there is a day-school, there is generally an available building; but we do not stop looking for fine quarters. I have organized one Sunday School in Texas in the shade of a live oak tree, and it is going yet. Sometimes we build an arbor and hold school in that. You can get the air there. We make use of any building of a public character that may happen to be empty on Sunday. I remember one occasion where we organized in the kitchen of a man's house. Then we build log school-houses at suitable points, and leave them in charge of the most reliable man in the neighborhood. We send the people literature; selling it to them where they can pay, and if not, then giving it to them free. After a time, we begin preaching there; and so the work progresses, step by step.

"It should not be forgotten," Dr. Paxson added, "that government lends no hand in this work of ours. It does not contribute to religious schools; when Grant was President, that was turned over to the different denominations. Moreover, government has nothing to do with the civilized Indian tribes. The latter have their own administration in their territory, including a Governor, Cabinet and Council. They hold their land in common."

Indian Peculiarities.

Some of the peculiarities of these tribes among whom Rev. Dr. Paxson and his associates labor, are extremely interesting.

"Old Keokuk," said the Superintendent, "a member of the Sac-Fox tribe, was a blanket Indian and a bad Indian, too. He heard a missionary telling a dying Indian the story of the Cross, and that was the first time Keokuk knew that anybody ever died for him. He was so struck with the story that he travelled two hundred miles to be baptized, and is now preaching among his people." (His picture in his old Indian costume, appears on the first page.)

"Then there was another—old man 'Journey-Cake' they called him. He belonged to the Delaware tribe. He also became a preacher of the Gospel. The Rev. Allan Wright, who lately died, was a Choctaw Indian. His son—a half-Indian—is now preaching in New York City. These civilized Indians, I should explain, became Christians before they got any education. The Indians who are educated before being Christianized sometimes make the biggest villains in the whole country. Leave the heart untouched, and you have got a rascal, whether he be white, black or red!

Roley Macintosh's Idea of Justice.

"A notable illustration of Indian character is the case of 'Roley Macintosh,' a Creek. There are no jails among the civilized Indians. Capital punishment is administered by shooting, as a general thing, though they occasionally hang a man for the third offence at horse-stealing. The first offence secures the culprit fifty lashes; the second a hundred, and the third hanging. When 'Roley Macintosh' was judge, a fellow was brought before him charged with stealing a horse. The evidence was conflicting, but 'Roley' after hearing the evidence of one man who spoke positively, gave the order: 'Take him out and whip him.' The man received fifty lashes. Next morning the horse came up; he had been caught on an island where he had strayed. 'Roley' was perplexed. It was quite clear that the man was innocent and had been wrongfully punished. The judge called the chiefs together, and then the Indian whose evidence had turned the scale was brought in.

"Give him fifty lashes," said the Creek Solon. 'And you,' he added, turning to the victim of the judicial blunder, 'you can steal another horse.'

How an Indian Meets Death.

"The Indian has no fear of death, and he never breaks his word even though his life be the stake. I recall a case in point which shows what reliance may be placed upon the faith of an Indian. An execution was about to take place and a friend of mine—a stranger in the Territory—said he would like to see it.

"Where do you keep the prisoner?' he asked. 'The prisoner went home after hearing the verdict.'

"What! A condemned man at liberty? Impossible! You have no guard and no jail? Won't he run away? That's what any white man would do.'

"He's no white man,' they told him, contemptuously.

"Well, if he comes up, I'll be disappointed—that's all.'

"Sure enough, the man came up. 'I'm ready,' said he to the sheriff. That official told him to choose a friend to shoot him. This was customary among these tribes, it being regarded as a privilege to die by the hand of your best friend. The man made his choice and pointed with his finger to a spot on his breast, right over his heart, indicating where he desired the bullet to be lodged. The friend stepped back with his Winchester levelled and there was a puff of smoke and a report. The Indian died, true to his word."

The first Sunday School at Vinita, I. T., was organized by the Rev. Dr. Paxson. There are now two colleges and several churches there. Regarding the stories frequently circulated about the dangers of travel in the Indian Territory, he says that, as far as his observation goes, they are without foundation. He has travelled all over the territory, preaching, teaching, and organizing schools, and never experienced the slightest trouble.

An Inviting Mission Field.

In Missouri, Arkansas, Texas and Louisiana, there is a very large rural population. There is where the Sunday School influence most needs to be extended. There is where the children are who stand in greatest need of Sunday Schools. In these States, there are to-day one million white children without Sabbath Schools and with no religious privileges whatever. The number of schools established is wholly inadequate to the needs of more than a fraction of this vast army of little ones. The good that has been already done by these schools is incalculable. One of the best men in the United States Senate—a Senator remarkable for his statesmanship, eloquence and Christian principle—was converted in one of the log cabin Sunday Schools of the Union. In the pulpits, and in a thousand other honorable posts, are to be found men whose faith was first kindled when, as boys, they went to these Sunday Schools. In all the range of Christian effort there is no work more worthy or more urgent than this that brings to the children of the Southwest the Gospel message and fits them for the life that now is and that which is to come.

The section is growing rapidly and its influence on the course and destiny of the whole nation will soon be enormous. Will it be a beneficent influence? That depends on the children who are now growing up there. Dr. Paxson and the men who are laboring under his superintendence are endeavoring to give them the Christian training that will fit them to become intelligent God-fearing men and women. The parents welcome the Sunday School missionary and gladly co-operate with him in his effort but they seldom initiate the movement. The field is white to the harvest but the laborers are few. Strange to say, they are few, not because men are lacking but because funds to support them are lacking. Dr. Paxson says he could place in most promising fields several men who are well fitted for the work, if he had the necessary funds. One man especially, a noble, indefatigable consecrated worker, is ready to go and Dr. Paxson could send him to a district where, in a year, he could organize from thirty to forty Sunday Schools containing from 1200 to 1600 children. To do this would require seven hundred dollars. The man is there, the work is waiting, but there is no money for the purpose. Seven hundred dollars is not a large sum to accomplish a work so beneficent with a prospect so glorious. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would like to furnish it and if its readers will co-operate with the publisher in doing it, he will gladly give $200 of the amount required. We shall be pleased to hear from any who will avail themselves of the privilege.

TA-CHIEN-LU.

THE village, a picture of which appears on page 285, is one of the most remarkable in the whole world. It is situated in a nest of mountains and is no less than 8400 feet above the level of the sea. Our picture is reproduced from a photograph taken by Mr. A. E. Pratt, the famous naturalist, who lived in the village for several weeks in 1889 and again in 1890. Its name is Ta-Chien-Lu and it is situated in Western China among the mountains which separate it from Eastern Thibet.

Mr. Pratt travelled thither from Shanghai, the first twelve hundred miles of his journey being on the great river Yang-tze which is said to be three thousand miles long. After leaving the river he bought a horse and travelled overland, having first shaved his head and put on Chinese costume to avoid the hostility which the inhabitants show to foreigners. His course was over high mountains and through deep ravines, his path leading him to higher altitudes until at last he found himself on the Fei-Yu-Ling pass, 9020 feet above the sea. Descending by a slippery path so dangerous that every step must be in a hole cut for the foot to rest in, he came suddenly upon the village of Ta-Chien-Lu. There he found some French missionaries who hospitably entertained him during his stay. His object in visiting the place was to make a collection of moths. He spent most of his time on the mountains, sheltering himself in a Thibetan tent, made of Chinese cloth embroidered with blue.

THE COURT OF THE MOSQUE OF OMAR.

AN important feature of the Mohammedan Mosque is the spacious court surrounding the main building. It generally contains several small edifices. These often comprise a school in which the Koran is read and explained; a library; a hospital; a khan for the reception of pilgrims; a public bath; and a place in which a pilgrim, a widow or a minor may leave treasure for safe keeping, the sacredness of the place being a sufficient protection. Our illustration, which is reproduced from a photograph brought by Dr. Talmage from the Holy Land, represents some buildings of this kind in the Court of the Mosque of Omar, in Jerusalem. The Mosque itself is one of the most ancient and most venerated of all Mohammedan edifices. It stands on the site once occupied by Solomon's Temple, and is said to have been founded by the Caliph Omar, who is revered by all Mohammedans, next to the prophet himself. He captured Jerusalem in the year 627.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

FIFTEEN Hundred Puzzled immigrants have been detained nearly three weeks on an island off the coast of New York. They came here on two steamers—the Fulda and La Burgoyne. The former had a case of malignant small-pox on board, and the latter a case of typhus. Very few of the passengers could speak a word of English. They are chiefly Germans, French, Swiss, and Italians. It was very difficult to make them understand why they were carried off to the island to be quarantined instead of being landed in New York. Interpreters explained to them that, though none of them were sick at the time, some might have taken the infection and would become sick. They would have to wait on the island eighteen days, and then if they were all well they would be admitted. We understand how, in the interest of a great city such precautions are necessary and some have thought that God acts on the same principle before admitting his children to heaven. Happily there is no Scriptural basis for the idea of Purgatory. The Christian is in this life "made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light." (Col. 1:12.)

An Invitation Given Twenty-nine Years Ago. was accepted in New York recently. The invitation was given in camp immediately after the second battle of Bull Run, in 1862. General di Cesnola, who commanded the cavalry, was sitting down to a meal of macaroni after the battle, when General Sigel, the commander of the Eleventh Army Corps, passed by and smelled the dish. He poked his head in the tent, and General di Cesnola invited him in. Generals Stahl and Carl Schurz, who were division commanders in the corps, were sent for to join in the repast. After it was finished the three guests expressed their satisfaction with the meal. General di Cesnola said: "Wait till we meet in New York and I will give you an Italian dinner that will prove to you that Italian cooking is the best in the world." The four men did not meet in New York until two months ago, when General di Cesnola renewed the invitation. It was promptly accepted, and a few days ago he had the pleasure of entertaining his three friends, at a noted Italian restaurant on Fifth Avenue, at the feast to which he had invited them twenty-nine years before. The long delay did not imply any negligence on the part of the host, nor any disrespect on the part of the guests; but how different is the conduct of those whom God invites to the Gospel feast! Their delay in accepting the invitation is an affront to him and may involve their eternal ruin. (Luke 14:24.)

A Snake-Charmer's Fight for his Life is Described in a despatch from Chicago published last week. The man was particularly careful on his arrival in the city to have a long blue box carried to his room in the Grand Palace Hotel. The box contained a number of fine snakes one of which was a python, seven feet long. Several friends called on him that evening and the professor took the snakes out of the box and fondled them for his friends' gratification. When the party adjourned to the bar-room he put the snakes back in the box but omitted to secure the lid. An hour or two later the professor returned and went to bed. In the course of the night the occupant of the adjoining room was aroused by cries for help. He went into the professor's chamber and there saw a horrible sight. The gigantic python had forced its way out of the box and had tightly coiled itself around its owner's body. The man was being choked but could not move a limb. Help was summoned and then while one man grasped the snake by the neck close to the head two others with difficulty untwisted the coils of the tail. It was then securely fastened in the box and restoratives were administered to the bruised man. He had a narrow escape. Some who have fallen into the power of the great enemy of souls, who in the Bible is likened to a serpent, have not been so fortunate. Though they knew his power, as the professor did that of the python, they did not dread it until they awoke helpless in his grasp. (Prov. 23:32.)

A Remarkable Application for Divorce has been rejected by a Judge of the Supreme Court at Albany, N. Y. It was made by the husband who alleged that since the marriage he had discovered facts reflecting on his wife's character, which she had concealed from him when he married her. The Judge in denying him relief observed that, "if false representations of personal characteristics would justify a judgment annulling a marriage it would be impossible to say to just what qualities the rule would apply. Applications might be made on the ground of temper, religious belief, education, or concealed physical defects." Though the decision gives the victory to the wife she is not likely to enjoy much happiness with her husband. It might have been better for her if she had told him of the facts before the marriage, though in that case he evidently would not have married her. Happily for the believer there is no such barrier to union with Christ. He accepts the most unworthy and makes them fit to be his bride. (Eph. 5:25-27.)

The Adoption of a Lady into an Indian Tribe which recently took place at Carrollton, N. Y., is said to be an event unprecedented in our history. It appears that a bill was before the Legislature at Albany which if it had passed would have been detrimental to the interests of the Senecas. The measure was defeated mainly through the earnestness and eloquence of Mrs. Converse, the valiant and long-tried friend of the Indians. She appeared with the Indian delegation before the Senate Committee and so ably argued against the bill that it was rejected. The Indians were deeply grateful to her for the service and as the highest mark of their gratitude, they have formally adopted her into the Indian community and have conferred upon her an Indian name. Not every white lady would consider it an honor to become an Indian, but such a lady as Mrs. Converse who loves the race and has served it so faithfully, doubtless, is proud of the distinction. It is thus that Jesus glories in the name of the "Son of Man." By his life and death he identified himself with the race and counts it no humiliation to be so known. (Heb. 2:9.)

A Search for Gold Among the Ashes of a burned house has been carried on at Absecon, N. J., for several days. The owner of the house was a man of considerable wealth, but he had a profound distrust of banks, and safe-deposit vaults. He kept his mortgages, bonds and valuable papers in a barrel which stood near his desk in his office, but his money, consisting of gold eagles and double eagles to the value of over ten thousand dollars, he secreted in his cellar. He put the coins in baking-powder cans. These cans were set in large square boxes with sand filled in to make them solid. After his house had been burned down and the smouldering debris which fell into the cellar had been extinguished a search was made for the property. The precious barrel of papers had of course been consumed. The boxes in which the coin had been set had shared the same fate, but many of the coins were recovered uninjured. A large number, however, had been melted by the intense heat; but when the ashes were carefully sifted the metal of which they were made, was found. If before the fire the owner thought the barrel of papers the most valuable part of his estate, as he probably did, he must have changed his mind when the flames had done their work. The day is coming when there will be a similar change in the estimate which men now place on the relative value of their achievements. Then, too, the trial is to be by fire and the Apostle warns us that it will "try every man's work of what sort it is" and there is much that will be destroyed (1 Cor. 3:12-15).

SIN THE CAUSE OF SORROW.

S. S. LESSON FOR MAY 17, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
HOSEA 10: 1-15. GOLDEN TEXT, ISAIAH 59: 2.

Sorrow to Continue as Long as Sin Remains—Nothing Accidental in the Believer's Life—A Widow's Dream of Happiness Unrealized—Men Thwarted who Live for Themselves—The Idolatry in Israel—Hosea Raised up to Reprove the People—The Christian's Wilderness Experience—Sorrow a Means, Not an End.

UNTIL sin came into the world, sorrow was unknown. Only when sin has ceased to be will tears be all wiped away. As a rule, men look upon trouble as accidental, or as caused by the wrongdoing of someone else than the party himself.

They are slow to perceive, acknowledge, sometimes even to allow, that there is any connection between sin and sorrow; and few there are who see the direct hand of God in his permission of the trouble and sorrow which there is upon earth. David knew his tears were marked, and calls his God to put them into his bottle, and note them in his book. Our Lord himself tells us that every hair of our heads is numbered, and Zechariah declares, that "Whoso toucheth God's children toucheth the apple of his eye." It is a heathenish idea that things happen by chance; a true believer knows that God has to do with all which happens, that "All things work together for good to them that love God," and therefore looks instinctively to discover in all things what God is saying and doing. "Israel is an empty vine; he bringeth forth

Fruit Unto Himself."

God's purpose for Israel was quite another. "As the girdle cleaveth to the loins of a man, so have I caused to cleave unto me the whole house of Israel and the whole house of Judah, saith the Lord; that they might be unto me for a people, and for a name, and for a praise, and for a glory." No wonder there crept in friction, misunderstanding, and trouble, between Israel and their God. "Behold the Lord's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save; neither is his ear heavy, that it cannot hear: but your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have hid his face from you, that he will not hear."

But is this state of things peculiar to Israel of old? Look on the sad, disconsolate faces which meet us at every turn of the street, and enquire into their history. What is the secret of that poor woman's sorrow, who never seems to have a smile, or a look of joy, upon her face? She will tell you she is a widow, she had looked forward to years of happy life with her husband in a comfortable home, with her children a comfort to her, and all that heart could wish around her. This was her picture of life. It was for herself, her husband must live for her, her children minister to her, her comfortable house must gratify her, and so time and eternity, family and circumstances, must revolve round her! And where is God to be found in all this? What place does she leave for him? He is reduced to the level of a relieving officer, to come in when some unforeseen calamity may arise! No wonder God upset such a plan for life, and the castle in the air fell in ruins. God has never led men to expect this kind of life, and yet thousands pity themselves, blame God, and think themselves hardly used if they cannot procure it; and thousands more are doing all they can to provide for such a life: they are bringing forth fruit unto themselves.

We were not sent into the world for ourselves, but for our God; "This people have I formed for myself; they shall show forth my praise." (Isa 43: 21.) We were not redeemed for our own sake, but that we might be "to the praise of the glory of his grace," and if God is pulling one way, and we are pulling another, it is no wonder if trouble and sorrow are the result. God says, "The spirit should fail before me." But man lifts up his puny arm against God, as though he expected God to yield before him! Man's great trouble is that he wants to be rich, and in numberless instances, he is thwarted; and sorrow follows. Why? Because it is a sin to live with no higher motive than to be rich; God created man for something better. A man who seeks to be rich for the sake of riches, becomes a monster of selfishness; and his very riches become his trouble, "he bringeth forth fruit unto himself." Another man may seek to be great. He is ambitious, he covets power for the sake of being somebody, he must be a centre of attraction. With many men, it does not matter so much in what way, or by what means, they secure popularity so long as they obtain it in some way. Even the very work of God is made use of by some as a means to an end, a pedestal on which to place their own statue, a candlestick to carry their own light. But it is our own way which Christ came to save us from. "We have turned everyone to his own way and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." (Isa 53: 6.) Is it not the truest, tenderest love in our heavenly Father that he stops us, thwarts us, lets us suffer? "The way of a man is not in himself." "There is a way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death." (Prov. 16: 25.) There is mercy in the severe discipline of our God. And how many there are who must be thwarted, broken, humbled, brought to nothing in themselves, until they learn, like Paul, that the treasure we have is not the fruit which we bring forth unto ourselves, but "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ;" and "We have this treasure in earthen vessels that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us." (II. Cor. 4: 6, 7.)

Cain lived to himself; there was fruit unto himself in the very offering he brought to God, but it was not accepted. Lot lived for himself; and succeeded in getting a position and a name among the ungodly men of Sodom; but before his soul could be really secure, sorrow and trouble must visit him; and the nest, which he had so well feathered, had to be broken up. Balaam had his own plans for advancement in life but he failed in his attempt to bring God into them at the cost of cursing his own people; and sorrow and trouble came on Balaam. What brought sorrow upon King Saul but his own sin? What made David, the man after God's own heart, so grievously suffer in his own family? It was sin.

The religion of Israel in the time of Hosea, during the reign of the wicked Ahaz, was rank idolatry; the king "burned his children on the fire," "sacrificed, and burnt incense in the high places," "cut in pieces the vessels of the house of God," "shut up the doors of the house of the Lord," so that no one else should worship the true God, "made him altars in every corner of Jerusalem. And in every several city of Judah he made high places to burn incense unto other Gods." No wonder Ahaz himself was brought into sore distress! No wonder "The Lord brought Judah low because of Ahaz, king of Israel!"

God raised up Hosea to bear witness to them that he was unchanged. Israel had left him, but he had not forsaken Israel. But how make for her a way of return? "Behold, I will allure her, and bring her and speak to her heart." (Hos. 2: 14, margin.) Yes, in the wilderness, the loneliness of a sick-room, the humiliation of poverty, when business losses have visited us, in bitter disappointments and humiliations in the work of God,—in such wilderness times, he gains the ear of his people. "I will go and return to my place, till they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face; in their affliction they will seek me early." (Hos. 5: 15.) Sorrow is not the end, not the goal of the Lord's dealings with his people, it is but a means to an end. There is a way back to our God when we have wandered. Let sorrow lead to confession, to a complete break with sin and selfishness, and then the precious blood of Jesus cleanses from all sin. But there is no permanence in simple cleansing if we stop there. Newness of life, a life out of self, must be the result, or the old idolatry, the old self-life, will return. "Sow to yourselves in righteousness, reap in mercy; break up the fallow ground, for it is time to seek the Lord, till he come and rain righteousness upon you." It is as though the Lord would say to Israel, If you must be self-seeking, then know that the best way to serve yourselves is to serve your God; sow to yourselves, not in idolatry, but in righteousness; break up instead of treading down, your fallow ground. How? By this; "it is a time to seek the Lord, till he come and rain righteousness upon you," which will be a fruit unto God in which ye shall have your share. Learn to wait upon your God until you know that the end you seek is gained. "He that soweth to the flesh shall of his flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting." (Gal. 6: 8.) Let God have his rights as the true Centre of our being, of our life, and then sorrow will be turned into joy as sin and self give way to righteousness, and to the service of our God. Whose are the faces which know no wrinkles and wear no trace of care? Those who truly walk with God, who know "no condemnation" who have no will but his, who make him the end of all they do and say. Looking on such a face as Stephen's, we see as it were "the face of an angel."

A DARKENED HOUSEHOLD.

A Story of the Golden Text for May 17, "Your iniquities have separated between you and your God." Is. 59: 2.

BY J. B. McLOY.

H! Harry, do not be so cruel. The poor horse does not deserve to be so ill-treated." "Well, then, why does he not do what I tell him? He always wants his own way; but he can't have it with me, that you may depend on."

Thus spoke to his sister a beautiful boy of twelve years: his eyes flashed and his whole body shook with excitement. But the distress, which his cruelty to the horse had caused his sister, evidently produced some effect upon him; for all at once he rushed from the courtyard into the house, and with sobs and tears threw himself on his couch.

Harry and Cora were the only children of a wealthy farmer in one of our Eastern States. Their parents were good people who attended church regularly, and saw to it that the children went punctually every Sabbath to the Sunday School in the village church. The father's business took up all his time during the week; and as the facilities for getting an education were not in those early days what they are now, the whole training of the children devolved almost exclusively on the fond mother. In her eyes her darlings were perfection. She could see no fault in them. Cora was indeed the gentlest of creatures; but Harry was naturally of a quick, headstrong disposition. The good mother could only see manliness and independence in her boy, and resented any word from a neighbor who might insinuate the advisability of correcting faults which others could not see in the same light that she did.

"Now, Harry," said his mother on this particular occasion, "you really must not be cruel to the poor horse. You have not a bad heart, I know: but you are too hasty, and you grieve me very much when you excite yourself so unduly. Promise me this will not happen again."

Harry gave the promise; and the mother was fully satisfied that her whole duty had been performed.

Years rolled on: and a very great change had taken place in that family. The farmer and his wife were now old and feeble; their faces showed clearly signs of grief and suffering. The children they loved so dearly were far away from them. Cora had made a good marriage, and had her home in a distant city. But Harry—what had become of him?

At the age of twenty-one, he had accepted a position in a mercantile house in one of the Eastern cities. Before leaving home, his mother, whose eyes had been opened as to his disposition, spoke to him in a very earnest manner.

"Harry, my dear son, you are leaving us and going out into a very wicked world. Promise me, before you go, that you will never forget to ask God's blessing on you every day; and also that you will associate only with Christian people." Harry with tears in his eyes made the promise, and after an affectionate farewell left the house.

For a time everything prospered with him, and his conduct was such as to command the esteem and full confidence of his employers. His attendance at church was regular; and everybody believed that he was leading a genuine Christian life.

In an evil hour a new clerk was introduced into the same office with Harry. He was a fine young man with a good appearance and the happiest of dispositions. He had travelled much and knew the world like a book. Poor Harry was literally fascinated by his new companion, as the thoughtless bird is fascinated by the bright eyes of the snake. He began to sigh for that knowledge of the world in which he was deficient, and gradually became remiss in his religious duties. The grace of God, however, was following him up, and many an effort did he make to tear himself loose from the influence of his fellow clerk. But the poison had entered his soul, and his efforts in the right direction began to grow feeble and more feeble. Four years have elapsed since we last saw the fond mother's darling, spoiled boy; and surely no one could recognize in the swaggering bully at the race-track and in the saloon, the young man who started so well.

Harry was now flashily dressed, and always had plenty of money, although he had no visible means of support, since he had dropped all correspondence with his family. True, his conscience frequently reproached him for the life he was leading; but he had long since learned to stifle that small still voice; and his iniquities had evidently "separated between him and his God."

But the end was at hand. A dispute took place in a bar-room one evening. A man covered with wounds was carried out and soon breathed his last. Harry was accused and afterwards convicted of having used a knife; he was condemned to spend the remainder of his days behind the bars of a State prison. How truly his iniquities had separated between himself and his God!

Can you wonder that the poor old father and mother in their distant home were dwelling, at the time of our story, in a darkened household.

AN ORIENTAL PIPE SURRENDERED.

A STORY of the conversion of an aged Greek is told in a letter to the Missionary Herald by Mr. Bartlett who is laboring at Boordoor, a town 175 miles south-east of Smyrna, where the American Board has a station. He says: "Yesterday we celebrated the Lord's Supper and received to the church a man seventy years old. His two sons, both young men, had united with the church before. They are Greeks, and he has been a leading man in the Greek church for many years; but he has been very intemperate, and a most inveterate slave to the nargileh, which he would smoke almost incessantly, declaring that he should die if he were obliged to give it up. He had for some time known the truth, and had occasionally attended the service on the Sabbath. One day while listening to a sermon from the pastor, in which he narrated the story which had suggested the hymn, 'Over the line,' he was led to a decision that he would not leave his seat till he had decided the contest, and then and there yielded his proud heart and stubborn will to Christ, and from that hour, for now three months, has never smoked his nargileh nor drunk any ardent spirits. He is constant in attendance upon all the services, and his wife also, in full sympathy, always accompanies him, though she says that for forty years they have never walked together, oriental custom forbidding. From the day of his decision he has had no desire to smoke or drink, so completely has grace conquered his appetite."

THE NEARING ADVENT.

An Address at the London Prophetic Conference by Bishop Richardson, D.D., of the Reformed Episcopal Church.

IN reference to various criticisms upon the prophetic views which have been set forth by the Rev. M. Baxter, which have appeared in many papers, we are obliged to these papers for calling attention to his expositions, and knowing the good he is doing by his preaching, and by the evangelists, numbering more than one hundred, belonging to his organization called the Gospel Union, we should be willing to stand by his side on occasions of this kind. I wonder if the writers who carp at prophetic expositions, ever heard of one who had a little knowledge of the starry heavens, and who rejoiced in his day in the name of Sir Isaac Newton, and if they did not know, they may read, that he believed in the Word of God and the prophecies of Daniel, and that he spoke very definitely on some of that prophet's predictions. Good Bishop Newton also wrote a great work on "Prophecy," and some of the ablest clergymen of the church of England, such as the Revs. E. Bickersteth, T. R. Birks, E. B. Elliott, G. S. Faber, Thomas Scott, the Commentator, Dr. Hales, and others, have held that great troubles and trials will befall the Christian Church in the closing years of this nineteenth century, in connection with the Second Coming of Christ. So that Mr. Baxter, in publicly proclaiming his views is substantially setting forth what these divines have

Written in Their Expositions.

Most of you who are students of prophecy will be aware that there are two great schools of interpreters. One class of persons, the Historical Expositors, who consider that the fulfilment of the Book of Revelation has been going on ever since it was written, and that the time of the end is near. The other school is called the Futurist, who hold that a very large portion of the symbols of Revelation will be fulfilled within a short period of the end of the present age. Though these two schools apparently differ, both are at one on this point, they all believe that the end of the age is near at hand, so that even if we cannot absolutely agree to every figure that Mr. Baxter puts down, we may rest assured that he is very near the truth at any rate. Nothing astonishes me more than when I see intelligent men saying that these prophetic students predict the end of the world. I never knew students of prophecy put the thing in that way. What we do say is that the times of the Gentiles are nearly fulfilled, and that the conversion of the Jews and of the heathen, will soon be effected by the Coming of Christ in connection with the close of our Gentile dispensation and the beginning of

The Millennial Dispensation.

Prophetic students who look for the return of the Lord to this earth, know that the great tribulation must come first, as set forth in Matthew 24: 21, and as predicted in the last chapter of Daniel in the words, "At the Time of the End, there shall be a Time of Trouble, such as never was since there was a nation, even to that time and at that time, many who sleep in the dust of the earth shall arise, some to everlasting life and some to shame and everlasting contempt."

We are never taught in the Word of God that the preaching of the Gospel, as at present carried on, is going to convert the world, because the Gospel is to be preached for a witness to every nation, and God shall gather out from the nations a people prepared for himself, but until the coming kingdom the nations will not be gathered into his blessed fold.

Then again, some newspapers speak lightly with respect to the translation of the saints, and the resurrection of the dead. How few people understand what the Bible says on these subjects. If we believe that Enoch was translated, and that our blessed Lord was raised from the tomb, we must believe that God will manifest similar divine power on another occasion, if he says he will do it. People believe one resurrection, and think a second resurrection incredible. What did Christ teach? The New Testament abounds in wonders, and not the least is that where Christ is regarded as the first fruits of them that slept.

Christ Rose From the Dead,

and afterwards they that are Christ's. He is coming again. There is a long interval between the resurrection of Christ and those who are Christ's, and then there will be another interval before the general resurrection at the end of the millennium. Then in the third chapter of Philippians, St. Paul speaks of an earnest desire, one supreme longing that fills his heart, that is constantly with him, and that longing is that he may be permitted to take part in the resurrection of the dead, that is to say, an eclectic resurrection of the righteous from out of the mass of the dead.

That is a beautiful passage where he comforts mourners with these words, "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and the dead in Christ shall rise first," only the dead in Christ, not others, "and then we which are alive shall be caught up to meet the Lord in the air, and so we shall ever be with the Lord." Therefore we can cheer one another with these words, knowing that it beckons us onward to so glorious a meeting with the blessed Redeemer. We have a distinct promise that Satan shall be bound for a thousand years, and unable to do his evil work for that period, and those that have died believing in Christ, and those who are watching for the translation of the saints will live and reign with him for 1,000 years. This is the first resurrection. It is easy to be understood. All the teaching of Scripture is easy to be understood. If this is the Word of God we should believe it whether we understand it or not. There is one great miracle which God has been carrying on through all the ages. I am thinking now of the wonderful Jews—God's ancient people. His promises and threatenings in connection with them are most marked and carried out most literally.

The Jew

for over 1,800 years has not been allowed to hold land in his own country; he has had his teeth drawn to make him give up money; and his children taken from him upon the slightest pretence, and now he is persecuted by Russia. There is one thing to be fulfilled, and that is, he is to possess his own land, and God is to come to his defence. Judæa has been the battle ground of the nations. Men have fought for it, but none have possessed it. When you see the Jew returning to his own land you see the last link in the chain of prophecy being fulfilled. What do you see to-day? That the land is being re-peopled with thousands of Jews. Their persecution in Russia is bringing them back in great numbers to their own land. I am right in saying that there are nearly 100,000 Jews in Palestine to-day. I look upon these things as indications from God of what is going to happen. The Lord said, "When ye see these things come to pass, lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh." This redemption is for the Jew as well as for the Gentile, and when you see him going back in a widening stream to his own land, we may feel sure that God is working out his purposes, and that the time is short, and we ought to be thoroughly in earnest as men who watch and wait for the coming of their Lord.

OUR INFIRMITIES.

THERE is no warmer Bible phrase than this: "Touched with the feeling of our infirmities." The divine nature is so vast, and the human so small, that we are apt to think that they do not touch each other at any point. We might have never so many mishaps, the government at Washington would not hear of them; and there are multitudes in Britain whose troubles Victoria never knows; but there is a Throne against which strike our most insignificant perplexities. What touches us, touches Christ. What annoys us, annoys Christ. What robs us, robs Christ. He is the great nerve-centre to which thrill all sensations which touch us, who are his members.

He is touched with our physical infirmities. I do not mean that he merely sympathizes with a patient in collapse of cholera, or in the delirium of yellow fever, or in the anguish of a broken back, but in all those annoyances that come from a disordered nervous condition. In our excited American life, sound nerves are a scarcity. Human sympathy in the case we mention amounts to nothing. Your friends laugh at you and say that you have "the blues," or "the high strikes," or "the fidgets," or "the dumps." But Christ never laughs at the whims, the notions, the conceits, the weaknesses of the nervously disordered. Christ probably suffered in the same way, for he had lack of sleep, lack of rest, lack of right food, lack of shelter, and under this his finely strung temperament must have become (as we say) nervous.

Chronic complaints,—rheumatism, neuralgia, dyspepsia,—cease to excite human sympathy. But with Christ they never become an old story. He is as sympathetic as when you felt the first twinge of an inflamed muscle, or the first pang of indigestion. When you cannot sleep, Christ keeps awake with you. All the pains you ever had in your head are not equal to the pains Christ had in his head. All the acute sufferings you ever had in your feet are not equal to the acute suffering Christ had in his feet. By his own hand he fashioned your every bone, strung every nerve, grew every eyelash, set every tooth in its socket, and your every physical disorder is patent to him and touches his sympathies.

He is also touched with the infirmities of our prayers. Nothing bothers the Christian more than the imperfection of his prayers. His getting down on his knees seems to be the signal for his thoughts to fly every-whither. While praying about one thing he is thinking about another. Could you ever keep your mind ten minutes on one supplication? We never could. While you are praying your store comes in, your kitchen comes in, your losses and gains come in. The minister spreads his hands for prayer, and you put your head on the back of the pew in front, and travel round the world in five minutes. A brother rises in prayer-meeting to lead in supplication. After he has begun, the door slams, and you peep through your fingers to see who is coming in. You say to yourself, "What a finely-expressed prayer!" or "What a blundering specimen!" "But how long he keeps on! Wish he would stop! He prays for the world's conversion. I wonder how much he gives towards it? There! I don't think I turned the gas down in the parlor. Wonder if Bridget has got home yet. Wonder if they had thought to take that cake out of the oven?" or "What a fool I was to put my name on the back of that note! Ought to have sold those goods for cash, and not on credit!" And so you go on thinking over one thing after another until the gentleman says "Amen!" and you lift up your head saying, "There! I haven't prayed a bit. I am not a Christian!" Yes, you are, if you have resisted the tendency. Christ knows how much you have resisted, and how thoroughly we are disordered of sin, and he will pick out the one earnest petition from the rubbish and answer it. To the very depth of his nature he sympathizes with the infirmity of our prayers.

BRIGHT HOMES.

MAKE your home the brightest place on earth if you would charm your children into the high path of rectitude and religion. Do not always have the blinds turned the wrong way. Let God's light, that puts gold on the gentian and spots the pansy, stream into your windows. Do not expect your children to keep step to a dead march. Do not cover up your walls with West's "Death on the Pale Horse," and Tintoretto's "Massacre of the Innocents;" but rather let there be on your walls some simpler pictures,— "The Hawking Party," "The Old Mill, by the Mountain Stream," "The Fox Hunt," "The Harvest Scene," "The Children amid Flowers," and "Saturday Night Marketing." Get you no lesson of cheerfulness from grasshopper's leap, and lamb's frisk, and squirrel's chatter, and quail's whistle, and garrulous streamlet which, from the rock on the mountain-top to the meadow fern under the shadow of the steep, comes looking for the steepest place to leap off at, and talking just for the sake of hearing itself talk? If all the skies hurtled in thunder tempest, and storms perpetually wandered across the sea, and all the streams were raving mad, frothing at the mouth with mud foam, and there were eternal simooms, throbbing among the hills, and the world had neither lark's carol, nor humming-bird's trill, nor waterfall's dash, but only bear's bark, and panther's scream, and wolf's howl—then you would do well to bother and plague yourself all through life, gathering around you only the shadows; but when God has strewn our path with so many blessings, it is high time we took into our homes more of the brightness, more of the innocent hilarity, more of the good cheer. A dark home makes bad boys and bad girls to be bad men and bad women.

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. E. P. Telford has consented to remain another week at Plainfield, N. J. During the past two weeks there has been a rich harvest of blessing. The Baptist and Methodist Churches are uniting in the work.

Professor J. H. Hyslop of Columbia College, read a paper yesterday before the American Institute of Christian Philosophy. The Summer School of this Institution will be held this year at Avon-by-the-Sea in August.

The One Hundred and Third General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States will meet in the Fort Street Presbyterian Church, Detroit, Mich., Thursday, May 21, 1891, at 11 A. M., and will be opened with a sermon by the retiring Moderator, the Rev. William Eves Moore, D. D.

Mr. James H. Cannon, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD evangelist commenced a series of services last Sunday in the Bedford Street M. E. Church, New York. Three services were held on Sunday, and they are to be continued every evening this week and next. Mr. Cannon's meetings in the Bethany Church were wonderfully blessed.

Eleven dollars have been received at this office from a correspondent at Hunters Hot Springs, Mont., whose signature is "A Laborer." He desires the money to be expended in sending copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to persons who may be benefited by the perusal. "This," as he justly says, "is a good way to do missionary work among people who can be reached in no other way."

Bishop William Taylor writes from the steamer Gaboon: "We are in sight of Accra. We are a loving party of eight missionaries, including myself. Brother Rasmussen, who has come on board, is in good health. He is going to prospect for new stations on the north bank of the Congo. I have seen all our missionaries except two, in the Snive and Cape Palmas districts. All well except Miss Dingman, who must have a change of air. Our work is progressing all along the line."

The approaching National Conference of Charities and Correction, which will be held at Indianapolis, May 13 to 20, is one of the most important assemblies of the year. Its object is to collect, compare, and diffuse information respecting every kind of charitable, penal and reformatory work, and eminent men of experience in this sphere, will be there to report on their labors, and discuss the best methods of work. Information as to railroad rates may be obtained from Mr. Alexander Johnson, Indianapolis, Ind.

The Seventy-fifth Anniversary of the American Bible Society will be celebrated May 13th and 14th. A public meeting will be held in Chickering Hall, New York, on the evening of Wednesday, May 13th, at which addresses will be delivered by Rev. John Burton, D.D., of Toronto, Representative of the Upper Canada Bible Society; by the Rev. James Stalker, D.D., of Glasgow, Representative of the National Bible Society of Scotland; by the Rev. T. Aston-Binns, of London, Representative of the British and Foreign Bible Society; and by the Rev. Phillips Brooks, D.D., of Boston. Admission to this meeting will be by ticket, which may be secured without cost by application at the Society's salesroom, No. 4 Bible House, after May 4.

General sympathy has been aroused during the past week for the Rev. George W. Bothwell, D.D., pastor of the Church of the Covenant, Brooklyn, N. Y., whose life was imperilled by a remarkable misadventure. About three weeks ago while administering a dose of medicine to a sick child he accidentally swallowed a small cork which he was holding between his teeth. The cork lodged in the bronchial tubes, causing acute suffering. Though skillful surgeons operated twice upon him the cork resisted their efforts to remove it. A third and still more critical operation was ordered in the hope of saving his life.

The Rev. Phillips Brooks, D.D., was on Thursday last elected Bishop of Massachusetts in succession to Bishop Paddock, who died on March 9th, and whose portrait and life were published in this journal at the time. The Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church had been thoroughly canvassed prior to its assembly, by the leaders of the rival parties, Dr. Brooks, being the candidate of one, and Dr. Henry Y. Satterlee, of New York, the candidate of the other. In the clergy house the vote was 92 for Dr. Brooks, and 58 for Dr. Satterlee. Of the lay delegates 55 voted for Dr. Brooks, and 32 for Dr. Satterlee. Dr. Brooks is fifty-six years of age and is one of the most famous pulpit orators of our land.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Southern Exposition Programme—The Eight-Hour Labor Strikes—Samoa's Usurper Dead—The Grant Monument—China Rejects Minister Blair—General Notes.

WHEN the Southern Exposition opens at Raleigh, N. C., on May 15th, fourteen Southern States, and New Mexico and Arizona will be represented. It is intended that the Exposition should be a permanent one, but a special effort will be made, from October to Dec., to have an impressive showing of the farm products and resources of the South. One of the most interesting features will be the exhibit showing the advancement of the colored race. This branch will be managed exclusively by colored men, each State having its own commissioner. Colored people all over the country will be more than ordinarily attracted by this utilitarian demonstration of the progress of their race.

The Great Eight Hour Labor Strikes, which were to be inaugurated on May 1st, did not take place, as anticipated, except in a few cities. There were a few peaceful and orderly parades, followed by evening banquets and speech-making. In the European Capitals socialist disturbances were expected, and troops held in readiness for any outbreak. In Paris, a terrible dynamite explosion occurred in the Champs Elysees, in a private building, breaking windows and alarming the neighborhood. The Anarchists were suspected, and 300 dangerous characters were arrested. Rioting occurred in Marseilles.

China has Refused to Accept the Hon. Henry W. Blair as United States Minister, and the act has excited astir among the diplomats at Washington. Mr. Blair, while in Congress and during the great debate on the Chinese Exclusion Bill, was among the foremost opponents of admission, and his speeches have been the means of influencing Premier Li Hung Chang and the Chinese Government in this decision. When the news of the rejection reached Washington, Mr. Blair had already started for his new post. He frankly admits that he still entertains the same views he held when he spoke and voted for exclusion. Ex-Senator Blair has been one of the most active members of Congress of late years and has been specially prominent as an advocate of public education. He is now about fifty-five years of age, a man of rugged physique and strong character, eloquent and forcible in debate. It is highly probable that the President may nominate him as Minister to Japan, in which event the Pekin mission would probably go to a Western man. Mr. Blair is a native of New Hampshire. His portrait is given in this column.

Ground was Broken at Riverside Park, New York, on Tuesday, April 27th, for the building of the long-deferred monument to the late General Grant. In presence of a most distinguished attendance, including Mrs. U. S. Grant, Mrs. Sartoris and other relatives of the dead hero, half a hundred military and naval officers of high rank, and a large representation from the different posts of the G. A. R., in several states, Commander Charles H. Freeman of the N. Y. State Department G. A. R., turned the first sod with a silver spade, the U. S. S. Yantic fired a salute and General Porter delivered an eloquent oration. The silver spade will be preserved by the Grant Monument Association as a relic. The monument, which is shown in the illustration above, will be in the Doric style of architecture, in the form of a pile of granite one hundred feet square and one hundred feet high, capped by a dome seventy-feet in height. Around the dome will be figures representing four of the generals attached to Grant's staff during the war. The gateless portico will be surmounted by a colossal equestrian statue of Grant. The crypt will contain a memorial hall where 1,000 persons can assemble. On one side will be a granite sarcophagus with a place by the side of the warrior for the body of his wife, when she shall have departed this life. The whole will cost in the neighborhood of $500,000.

Major Wm. McKinley Jr., the Author of the Tariff Bill was the central figure of interest at the Annual Banquet of the American Protective Tariff League, which took place in New York, on the evening of April 29th. Among the noted men present, were vice-President Morton, Secretary Noble, Murat Halstead, Commissioner Porter, of the Census Bureau, Asst. P. M. Gen. Clarkson, and a large array of statesmen in and out of public official life. There were fourteen tables, at which thirty-seven guests sat down, and every article,—food, pottery, napery, glass-ware and crockery was of American manufacture—the coffee and the waiters alone being imported.

The Death of Tamasese, the Usurping Ruler of Samoa, closes the darkest chapter in the history of the unfortunate little kingdom. Although there had been, at different times, revolts of rebel chiefs, against the rule of King Malietoa, arising out of the greedy policy of the various European powers, and their attempts to divide the kingdom, Samoa had a comparatively tranquil government until 1878. For five years she had been under the virtual protection of the United States and her commerce was prosperous. England and Germany were both interested in the Samoan trade, and the latter was desirous of obtaining a station in the Pacific. The two powers disagreed, and despite the protests of the American and English representatives at Apia, the German naval commander took Malietoa prisoner, and carried him into exile. At the same time, Tamasese, a rival chief, was proclaimed king. At the time, there was a very serious prospect of trouble between Germany and this country over the affair, but Bismarck gave assurances that were deemed satisfactory, and the matter was allowed to rest. Samoa was regarded as practically annexed to Germany. Malietoa fled on being released by the warships, and his followers proclaimed Mataafa king. A number of conflicts occurred between the native factions, and peace was finally concluded in 1889, Tamasese being accepted as monarch. Tamasese has been an invalid for some time past. His portrait is given in the preceding column.

Recent Antiquarian Discoveries at Thebes, Upper Egypt, have brought to light two very interesting figures of Isis and Nephthis, two of the leading deities of the ancients, (see illustration.) The figures are wooden statuettes and were found hidden in a temple-gallery among the mummy cases and other funeral accompaniments. Isis (the wife of Osiris) and Nephthis (the spouse of Set), were assigned, under the old heathen mythology, to escort the soul from its mortal tenement and to introduce it to the land of spirits. Figures such as these excavated were placed by the side of the distinguished dead. Although carved possibly about the time of the Israelitish exodus from Egypt, the figures are artistic and almost perfect, with fine anatomical appreciation and expressive attitudes. The wood is painted light yellow, head-dress and robes white, and the jewels on neck, arms and wrists green. The carving is even delicate and is a revelation of the accomplishments of the ancients in these early ages. The statuettes are about 30 inches high.

Little Newfoundland has not Met with Great encouragement in the assertion of her rights on the fisheries question, as the experience of her envoys to the Home Government in England shows. Sir William Whiteway and his ministers are greatly dissatisfied with their treatment, and the Colonial Premier is even quoted as declaring that, unless Newfoundland's claims are considered and justice done her, with a view to the repeal of the coercive enactments and the repression of French influence, the Colony will seriously think of union with the United States. While these words have excited much comment in London, an equally firm attitude is maintained by the people of St. John and other towns throughout the Colony. Public meetings have been held and resolutions expressing dissatisfaction with Lord Salisbury's course adopted. Annexation talk is rampant, and the popular feeling has been intensified by the news of the chary reception accorded to the delegates in England. The excitement seems likely to effect the entire colony.

THE CENSUS OF ISRAEL.

A NEW SERMON PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

The First Census on Emerging from Egypt—The Second Census on the Borders of Palestine—The Men who were Counted—The Kind of Men needed in the Church—I. The Notable Change Death makes in a People—Under Divine Control—The Change Beneficial—II. The Perpetuity of the People—The Nation Living though the Individuals Die—The Gaps Filled—III. The Unchangeable Word of God—IV. The Necessity of Faith.

"These are they that were numbered by Moses and Eleazar the priest, who numbered the children of Israel in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho. But among these there was not a man of them whom Moses and Aaron the priest numbered, when they numbered the children of Israel in the wilderness of Sinai. For the Lord had said of them, They shall surely die in the wilderness. And there was not left a man of them, save Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun." Numb. 26: 63-65.

WE have come in England, to another census, an important halting-place in the march of a nation's history. This carries our thoughts back to the ancient Bible story connected with the chosen people of God. A census was taken of the tribes of Israel in the wilderness two years after they had left Egypt. It only numbered males who were over twenty: the men capable of active service in war. There was good reason for taking the number of the people just as the nation was forming, so that in the wilderness they might be arranged, and marshalled, and disciplined for the conflict which lay before them.

Thirty-eight years had passed away since the first numbering at Sinai, and the people had come to the borders of the Promised Land; for they were in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho. The time had come for ### Another Census.

The Divine wisdom which commanded the counting of Israel at the beginning of the wilderness journey, also determined to count them at the end of it. They were to go forth in their armies to fight giant races, and armies versed in war; they were to dislodge nations from their ancient strongholds, and with the sword, to destroy guilty aboriginal races which God had condemned to destruction; and for this their military strength needed numbering and ordering. Here was good reason for the census, which now, for the second or third time, was carefully carried out.

Our text is from the Book of Numbers, and the book well answers to its title; for it continually deals with numbers and numbering. The numbering on this occasion was not of the women and children or the infirm; for the order ran thus, "Take ye the sum of all the congregation of the children of Israel, from twenty years old and upward, throughout their fathers' house, all that are able to go to war in Israel." If the numbers of our churches were taken in this fashion, would they not sadly shrink? We have many sick among us that need to be carried about, and nursed, and doctored. Half the strength of the church goes in ambulance service towards the weak and wounded. Another diminution of power is occasioned by the vast numbers of believers, who are sadly slow in reaching the fulness of the stature of men in Christ Jesus. How many are quite unable to bear arms against the foe; for they need to be themselves guarded from the enemy! To revise the church rolls so as to leave none but vigorous soldiers on the muster-roll would make us break our hearts over our statistics.

When the second census was taken, it was found that the people were nearly of the same number as at the first. Had it not been for the punishment so justly inflicted upon them, they must have largely increased; but now they had somewhat diminished. It is of God to multiply a nation, or a church. We may not expect any advance in our numbers if we grieve the Spirit of God, and if by our unbelief we drive him to declare that we shall not prosper. Israel's growth ceased for forty years; may it never be so with us as a church!

Concerning the second census of Israel, I would speak with you, since this is the morning of the day on which our British census is to be taken. May we gather lessons of wisdom from the theme!

The Work of Death.

I. First, observe with interest, and with a design to be profited—the notable change wrought among the people by death. "But among these there was not a man of them whom Moses and Aaron the priest numbered, when they numbered the children of Israel in the wilderness of Sinai." They answered to their names, six hundred thousand and more of them, and there they stood in their ranks, full of vigorous life. About forty years had passed away, and if these same names had been read out not a man save Caleb and Joshua could have answered to the roll-call. The entire mass of the nation had been changed. The old ones were all gone; all that stood in their places by the Jordan were men who were under age at the first census, or who were not even born at that time. "Not a man of them" remained, says the text; and it repeats the statement: "There was not left a man of them."

Such changes strike us as most memorable. They must not be passed over without remark. In the course of forty years, my brethren, what changes take place in every community, in every church, in every family! A friend showed me, last Thursday, in the midst of my first deacons. It was taken scarcely thirty-eight years ago, and yet of the entire group only I survive. Those associates of the youthful preacher have all gone to their reward. The going and the coming, the adding and the taking away, have changed the texture of this fabric; and soon no thread will be left. Surely the Lord would have us notice this, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.

A costly operation, involving so many sorrows, is not to be passed over without thought. Beloved, we, too, are passing away. The pastor and his present helpers must themselves be summoned home in due course. The march of the generations is not a procession passing before our eyes, while we sit, like spectators, at the window; but we are in the procession ourselves, and we, too, are passing down the streets of time, and shall disappear in our turn. We, too, shall sleep with our fathers, unless the Lord shall come speedily. I hear a clarion-blast sounding out from the graves which lie behind us: "Be ye also ready." From the last closed sepulchre there comes the prophetic warning, "Set thine house in order; for thou shalt die, and not live."

But let us not forget that all this change was still under the divine control. Though the people must pass away, yet still the Lord's hand would be in each death and its surroundings. If not a sparrow falleth to the ground without our Father's knowledge, we may rest assured that no man dieth without the will of God; no man is carried to his long home unless the Lord hath said, "Return, ye children of men."

What can preserve my life, or what destroy?
An angel's arm can't snatch me from the grave—
Legions of angels can't confine me there.

Moreover, the change was beneficial. It was well that the first generation should die in the wilderness. The people who had been accustomed to servitude in Egypt had acquired the vices of slaves; and when they came out of the house of bondage they were fearful, fickle, the creatures of appetite, and the victims of panic, selfishness, and discontent. They had all the vices of subject races, and were alike destitute of manliness and self-control. They were soon cowed by fear and baffled by difficulty. They were easily persuaded, and as easily dissuaded. They were a people of whom nothing could be made. It was desirable that there should be a people trained in a better school, with a nobler spirit; fit to take possession of the promised land. The change was working rightly; the divine purpose was being fulfilled. Maybe, we do not think thus of the changes that are taking place in the communities to which we belong. We scarcely think that better men are coming on; we even fear that the coming race is weaker than the present; but then, we are not fair judges; for we are prejudiced in favor of our own generation. I do not doubt that God meaneth well to his own church, and that the accomplishment of his eternal purposes requires that men should come and go, and that thus the face of society should be changed.

II. Secondly, we have here before us The Perpetuity of the People of God. There was a change in the constituent elements of the Israelitish nation, but the nation was still there. Not one man was there who was counted thirty-eight years before, save Caleb and Joshua, and yet the nation was the same. Do you ask for Israel? There it is. Balaam can see the people from the top of the hill, and they are the same people whom Pharaoh pursued to the Red Sea. The nation is living, though a nation has died. God has a Church in the world, and he will have a Church in the world till time shall be no more. The gates of hell and the jaws of death shall not prevail against the Church, though each one of its members must depart in his turn.

The gaps were filled up by appointed successors. As one warrior died another man stepped into his place, even as one wave dying on the shore is pursued by another. The men were not all swept away at once, but by perceptible degrees. In the Church of God one dieth in the order of nature, but another is born into the kingdom by the power of Grace. We miss some useful Christian woman, and we lament her; but before many days another sister is prepared of the Lord.

To Serve in Her Stead.

Baptism for the dead workers never ceases among us. An honored brother falls asleep, and we carry him to the grave; and possibly we fear no other can do his work, and fill the vacancy he leaves. Perhaps no one can do the same work; but yet, in some other way or form the work is done; and still the vines are trimmed, and the sheep are feed, and the lambs are cherished. The chosen host still marches on. Even as the stars in their courses, we still move on. God buries his workmen, but his work lives.

At the second numbering, the people stood ready for greater work than they had ever done before. The first numbering found them fit for the wilderness; the second numbering found them ready for the capture of the goodly land and Lebanon. God had been preparing them, by forty years of marching, for their new enterprise, and for development into a nation. May it please the Lord to make his Church ready for the coming of her Lord, and for the salvation of nations! If brighter days are dawning, the Church will be prepared as a bride for her husband; and if tribulation is to come to try all the earth, she shall be strengthened as a martyr for the burning. The Lord doth keep her: lest any hurt her he will keep her night and day.

III. Thirdly, let me bring before your minds The Unchangeableness of the Word of God. This we perceive in the last verse, "For the Lord had said of them, They shall surely die in the wilderness. And there was not left a man of them, save Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun." Note how unchangeable are the threatenings of the Lord. "Among these there was not a man of them whom Moses and Aaron the priest numbered. For the Lord had said of them: They shall surely die in the wilderness." Take note of this, you that think God's word can fail: ye know not what ye dream. The unbelievers were many, yet not one escaped. "Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished." The rebels were in a terribly large majority, but the crowds in the broad way make it none the safer. It was a long time before all the sinners died; but the long-suffering of God had its limit, and in the end every rebel died in the wilderness. They lived on, some of them, for all the forty years; but they could not pass the bound. Do not, I pray you, doubt the terrible certainty of divine threatenings because they are long in taking effect. Say not, "Where is the promise of his coming?" He will come; and when he comes it shall be "in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God and that obey not the Gospel of Jesus Christ."

The Promise Kept.

As the Lord fulfilled his threatenings, so did he cause his promises to come to pass. Caleb lived on, and so did Joshua. They were often in danger. Did not the rebels take up stones to stone them? They were often near to death: Joshua was commander-in-chief of the army, and Caleb was a man of-war from his youth up. They endured the common risks of soldiers; but nothing could kill them, for God had promised that they should enter the land. They believed God and honored him by their conduct, and therefore he kept them until the hour came to go in unto the land to possess it. There were only two of them; but God did not therefore overlook them. He keeps covenant with individuals as well as with nations. If you believe in Jesus, though you should be the only one of your family, yet you shall be saved. Though you know none of your kith and kin that fear the Lord, yet the God of Israel will not forget the lone one who is separated from his brethren. Though the faithful should become so few that all the saints together should only make a handful, yet it is written, "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

IV. Our last point is this: learn from my text

The Necessity of Faith.

Those people came out of Egypt with Moses, and were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea when they came forth into the wilderness. One would have hoped that they all would march to Canaan, but it was not so. The first census is taken, their names are on the roll; but, sad to say, at the next numbering all those names have vanished.

If you profess to be the people of God, we count you among his children: you are written among the living in Zion; but what an awful thing it would be if your name should not be written in the Lamb's Book of Life at the last! What if you should lie on the threshing-floor in the great heap before the winnowing, but should be gone with the chaff as soon as the Lord has come, "whose fan is in his hand!" Oh, that none of us may provoke the Lord to swear in his wrath that we shall not enter into his rest!

Learn, next, that no privilege can supply the lack of faith. We read that they heard, as you do; but "some, when they had heard, did provoke." Their provocation lay mainly in their unbelief. "The word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it." Hearing may lead to condemnation

If the Truth is not Believed.

These people went a certain way with Moses towards the Lord's promised rest. They did come out of Egypt, they were numbered with Jehovah's people, in the numbering at Sinai, they were separated from all the world in the quietude of the wilderness; but we read there was in them "an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God." In heart they went back into Egypt. It is not enough to begin well; "he that endureth to the end shall be saved," and no other. "They could not enter in because of unbelief." Nothing can make up for the absence of faith.

But none perished who had faith; no, not one. All those who believed God, and held fast to him, were made inheritors of the land. Caleb and Joshua—these two saw the land, and took their places in it. If thou believest, whatever thy name may be, thou shalt be saved; for "he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." It is written, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." Caleb and Joshua by faith entered into the land promised to the fathers, and thou, my hearer, canst only enter in by faith. Have faith in God, and thou hast all things; but without faith it is impossible to please God.

The Reward of Faith.

Now, what say you, beloved friends? Do you believe God? Do you believe his Word? Or are you of a captious and a dubious spirit? Do you believe like children? Is God your Father, and therefore is his Word your Father's Word, which you cannot think of questioning? Will you follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, against giants or Canaanites? Will you believe God, whatever may give him the lie? If so, you shall dwell in the land that floweth with milk and honey, and you shall have your portion when the Lord appeareth. But if you do not truly believe, whatever profession you may make, your carcasses must fall in the wilderness. Woe is me that I have to deliver such a prophecy! Greater woe to you if it should be fulfilled in you. Believe the Lord and you shall prosper. This day as you are preparing for the census of the nation, bethink you of the time when God shall make up his last account of natives in his holy city. Will you be numbered with his people, or will your names be left out at the reading of the muster-roll? God give us a place among his redeemed, and to his name shall be glory for ever and ever! Amen.

THE LATE DR. PRESSENSE.

FRANCE has suffered a severe loss in the death of M. Edmond de Pressense, who was precisely the kind of a man she can least afford to lose. Though only a plain Protestant preacher he exerted an influence for good on the people and the councils of the nation which has borne fruit more than once in critical times. So clearly was this recognized and so highly was he esteemed, that he was made a Senator for life and no voice in the highest assembly of the nation commanded more respectful attention than his.

Edmond de Pressense, whose portrait is here given, was born in Paris in 1824. His family was one of the old Huguenot stock, and he was true to the principles of his ancestors. He studied at Lausanne, at Halle and at Berlin, and in 1847 returned to Paris to begin his ministerial work. His profound learning evinced in several historical works soon gave him a European reputation. But it was his labors during the siege of Paris, in 1870, which made him most famous among his own people. The Parisians were astonished at the energy, devotion, and self-sacrifice with which the Protestant pastor labored among the sick and the wounded, and the starving, in that dreadful time. His counsels were sought, and his eloquence used in allaying the passions of the people, and at the end of the struggle he was, in spite of his Protestantism, one of the most popular men in the poorer districts of the city. He continued his preaching, his visits among the poor, and his literary labors after his election to the Senate, and down to a recent period, until a disease of the throat compelled him to discontinue public speaking. A few weeks ago he had an attack of pneumonia, from which he died on April 8. He has left behind many valuable works, chief among them being a Life of Christ, which is a charming work, showing all the brilliance of Renan, and the piety and reverence of an earnest Christian.

The Business End of Broadway.*

USINESS men know Broadway as a street blocked with moving drays and wagons, with pavements which move with unbroken lines of men, and that are shut in on either side by the tallest of tall buildings. It is a place where no one strolls, and where a man can as easily swing his cane as a woman could wear a train. Pedestrians do not walk steadily forward here, or in a straight line, but dodge in and out like runners on a foot-ball field. They all seem to be trying to reach the bank to have a check cashed before three o'clock. The man who stops to speak to a friend, or to gaze into a shop window, is jostled and pushed and shouldered to one side; everyone seems to be trying to catch up to the man just in front of him; and everyone has something to do and something on his mind to think of, too, if his face tells anything.

So intent are they on their errands that they would not recognize their own wives if they passed them by. This is the spot on Broadway where the thermometer marks fever heat. It is the great fighting ground of the city, where the battle of business goes on from eight o'clock in the morning until three in the afternoon, at which time the work flags a little and grows less and less hurried until five, when the armies declare an armistice for the day and march off uptown to plan a fresh campaign for the morrow. The armies begin to arrive before eight and gather from every point of the compass. The ferry-boats land them by thousands and hurry back across the river for thousands more, the elevated roads marshal them from far uptown, gathering them by companies at each station, where they are unloaded and scattered over the business districts in regiments. They come over the Brooklyn Bridge by tens of thousands, in one long endless procession, and cross the City Hall Park at a quickstep. It is one of the most impressive sights the city has to offer.

Shopping on Broadway.

The shopping district begins about Tenth Street, and is bounded on the north by the latitude of Twenty-third, where the promenade begins and continues on up indefinitely to Forty-second Street. The business district is very grim and very real, the shopping district is all color, and movement, and variety. It is not the individual woman one sees here, but woman in the plural. You may have a glance of a beautiful face, or of a brilliant gown, but it is only a glimpse, and the face is lost in a composite photograph of faces, the expression of which seems to be one of decided anxiety. For it is apparently a very serious business, this shopping. The shoppers do not seem to be altogether happy, for they have heard, perhaps, of a place where you can get that same lace flounce for two cents a yard less than at the other place, where you got the last lot, and they are pressing on before it is all gone. They are as keen over their bargains in trimmings and gloves as their husbands down town are over the rise and fall in oil, and they certainly do not look as if they were on pleasure bent. On the contrary, they seem to have much upon their minds. On a sunny, bright morning, when it is possible for them to wear their best bravery without fear of rain, Broadway holds, apparently, every woman of means in the city.

Where Fortunes are Won and Lost.

I never pass Wall Street but I am filled with wonder that it should be such a narrow, insignificant street. One would think it would need more room for all that goes on there, and it is almost a surprise that there is no visible sign of the fortunes rising and falling, and of the great manœuvres and attacks which emanate in that two hundred yards, and which are felt from Turkey to Oregon. But it seems just like any other street, except for the wires which almost roof it over, and that the men one meets in it are different in mien and manner from those one meets on upper Broadway; they wear a sharp, nervous look, and they stoop, as if they had grown so from bending so often and so intently over the momentous strips of paper tape. It is rather interesting to think that the man who brushed past you may have been but a few years back one of the uniformed boys who run with cable dispatches to the floor of the exchange, and that he may in a few weeks time be looking for a clerkship in one of the banks which he did not succeed in breaking. The broad statue of Washington, with its shining knees and dusty coat, always seems to be in the most incongruous position here. Unless it is that he is guarding the Sub-treasury behind him, and that his uplifted hand is meant to say to the bulls and bears—so far can you go, and no further. It is a most suggestive place, is Wall Street, and one feels more easy when one gets out of it into Broadway again. It is worth while to step across into Trinity Church and note how far away the street seems, and how calmly grand the church is, with its high pillars meeting the great arches, and with the sun stealing through the gorgeous window at the west. It is almost like the cathedral of some sunny, sleepy English town, and you are not brought home again until another sight-seer like yourself opens the screen doors, and you can hear the shrill whistle of the car-driver just outside.

THE HERO OF THOBAL.

THE gallant fight of Thobal, mentioned in this journal last week, will not soon be forgotten. Lieut. C. J. W. Grant, with his little band of eighty men, standing at bay against four thousand Manipuri savages would be a fit subject for a great historical painting. Grant and his company were on their way to join Mr. Quinton at Manipore when the Manipuris, having driven the British forces out of the Residency, swept down upon them. Grant seized the old mud fort of Thobal; and the Manipuris, though outnumbering his men fifty to one, could not dislodge him. Finally, with unparalleled daring, he gave the assailants battle and routed them with heavy loss, their commander being among the slain. Lieut. Grant comes of a race of soldiers, his ancestors of several generations back having distinguished themselves by their valor. He is under thirty years of age. During the nine years he has been in the army he has served chiefly in Burmah. An ancestor, Grant of Grant, was the founder of the famous fighting Forty-second Highlanders of the British Army, known as "The Black Watch."

SHEPHERDING THE LAMBS.

EVANGELIST HARRISON GIVES SOME PRACTICAL ADVICE CONCERNING YOUNG CONVERTS.

Guarding and Guiding the Newly-Converted—Three things to be Remembered—They should Join in Christian Work—Value of Sympathy—Enduring Conversions.

BY REV. THOMAS HARRISON.

ONE of the most important elements of revival work is that of shepherding the lambs. By this I mean the guiding and nurturing of the converts, who by the blessing of God on the Evangelist's labors, have been convicted of sin and have found pardon and peace at the foot of the Cross. When the Evangelist's work is closed, there is no duty so essential as that of fulfilling our Lord's injunction to the penitent Apostle, "Feed my lambs." This duty of course devolves mainly on the pastor of the church, though in the Methodist denomination he has excellent and efficient aids in the class-leaders. I have great faith in the "class" as a means of helping the young convert. I always recommend the Methodist pastors to urge every beginner in the Christian life to join a class immediately. Many pastors regard this step as indispensable, and results justify their belief. The Rev. Dr. McChesney, Stephen Merritt, and other ministers, whose churches have been most blessed, always insist upon it. In the class or the "young converts' meeting," the minister, or some experienced Christian, can impart the instruction the young convert needs, can deal with his difficulties can keep up the revival spirit and encourage him to strive after a fuller realization of the blessing. The value of this work was not overlooked even when an Apostle was the preacher; for Paul says: "I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase," and he adds significantly, "now he that planteth and he that watereth are one."

There are three things to be specially impressed upon the minds of young converts, as being of inestimable value to those who sincerely desire growth in grace: the daily reading of the Bible, daily secret prayer, and constant attendance upon the means of grace. These three must be urged upon them with the authority of an imperative duty. Besides, I would advise the pastor to look after them personally and individually, as far as possible. While young and inexperienced, they have so many temptations, that they need a guiding hand and a warning voice to keep them safely within the shelter of the fold and prevent their feet from straying.

It is a good plan for the young converts in a church to unite themselves as an Epworth League, or a Christian Endeavor Society. The work of these societies is a personal work, and does much to strengthen the Christian character in individuals. They should be encouraged to speak at the meetings of their society, to pray and take part actively in all that is done, as well as to visit the sick. If we could only have enough of these meetings, they would be a power to lead to all godly works.

I should endeavor, as far as possible, to give the young convert some kind of public work to do which would make him feel the measure of his responsibility and to realize that he was not a nonentity in the new sphere on which he had entered. Let him both speak and pray publicly and so develop whatever talents he may possess for Christian effort in that direction. Above all he should give public testimony of his faith.

Sympathy Essential.

It must not be forgotten that sympathy is a potent element in this shepherding of the lambs. Lack of sympathy on the part of the Church, or the evident want of it on the part of the minister, will frequently go very far toward driving a young convert back into the world. He will come forward full of joy and enthusiasm, and when he meets with a half-hearted greeting or with indifference from pastor or fellow-members, he loses courage and the flame of love that has been kindled dies down. He was burning with desire to unite with the Church: but now that he is in, amid such surroundings, he does not seem to care much about it.

The stability of the young convert may depend largely upon the pastor. There are some pastors who preach the Greek of holiness to converts, when they ought to begin at the a-b-c of practical religion. As development progresses, the fruits of the Spirit will manifest themselves in Christian activities.

No effort should be spared to make the shepherding of the lambs an efficient shepherding. The test is, of course, to be found in the steadfastness of the converts in the faith. I remember being told by the Rev. Dr. Joyce, of Cincinnati—now Bishop Joyce—something that comforted me greatly. He assured me that ninety per cent. of the converts who had been brought to Christ during the period of my labors there, had kept the faith, and that even after I had been away from there for years, their fires of Christian love were still burning brightly. His unremitting oversight, and the fact that he took pains to know each convert personally by name, made his shepherding effective.

It is not possible for a Church to continually maintain a revival agitation. There is a time for the harvest, and a time for the sowing. To hold a revival every night would be to challenge disappointment.

I have never known a man, woman, or child, who fed their mind with literature of a doubtful character, who lived up to their religious privileges. It is always better in selecting literature to give yourself the benefit of the doubt, remembering that the issues at stake are of everlasting consequence. And it is far better to be on the safe side in the choice of reading matter than to take chances. I am sometimes asked what kind of literature I would recommend. I do not wish to appear prejudiced, but in view of the fact that members of one denomination will not read the papers published by another denomination, I believe it best, on general principles, to prefer a paper that is not bound by denominational lines. Such a paper is found in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whose strictly un-denominational character no less than its pure and admirable Christian tone throughout, has made it a power for Christ in this country and in other lands as well.

I do not attach much importance to "convert cards." While preaching at New Haven, Ct., recently, I stated my views regarding them, and a gentleman came to me and remonstrated. I told him that these cards were superficial and could not be held as evidence of the fact that a man had really been converted. Some evangelists, I know, adopt the card system, and if good is accomplished, I say "Amen;" but as for me and my work, I have no sympathy or sanction for cards and signing promises or what are called "professions."

A Rose-hued Future.

SUMMER seemed blended in its mature richness with the tender, delicate, spring gladness the next morning. Margaret and Camilla were alone in the drawing-room. Carolyn and Marie had gone over to Mrs. Gordon's room in the Continental. The American girl was a little worn by the excitements of the last weeks which she had hid in her heart, breathing them only into the ear of the one Friend who had power to help. She must not leave the city till Jerome's return. She ought to let him know: but how could she do that? He could not have given her up. No knowing what he might have heard those five silent years. A whole winter had passed since that piece of sculpture was made. She caught her breath sharply. Why not tell Camilla? No: she would leave it all with Christ, choosing that it be all and only his way. She settled back in her arm-chair, her high soul conquered, but profoundly at rest. There was a soft, sweet light in her face which the eye of genius sees in the countenance of its saints.

Meanwhile Camilla was fluttering about in a very foolish manner. She had given everything in the room an artistic touch, arranging the curtains so as to let in just enough sunshine, opening the French windows for the genial air, and filling the vases upon the table with flowers. She had insisted that Margaret should put on a negligé dress, of soft white cashmere, with blue ribbons at the waist and throat. She had arranged the hair of that indulgent, young lady so as to give her face the contour that it had in Buonanno's bas-relievo in the alcove at the sculptor's. She flitted hither and thither, amusing Margaret with bright epigrams in three languages at once.

There was a ring at the door. "I'll go, my queen," she cried, "and see who it is when Ann lets them in," and she kissed Margaret, Italian fashion, on both cheeks, and pinned a bright, red rose on her friend's dress just below the blue throat ribbon. "There," she cried, "that will do! Now you are patriotic, as well as good. You have the colors of both our lands,—the red, white and blue, and the white, green and red."

She danced out, shutting behind her the door into the reception-room. Margaret waited a moment for her return, and then settled back into her reverie. She closed her eyes, and with a sweet breath like that of early summer enwrapping her, she fancied herself in the country home on the Hudson. She felt her mother's presence. She half expected to hear Jerome's full, deep voice reading aloud a pretty Italian poem. She had never before trusted herself to recall more than an outline of those happy days. It is long after roses are blooming on the little grave, that the mother can look into the drawer where she had laid the tiny shoes and dresses, thanking God for the lovely dream that it was, and the sweetness of reunion in the shadowless land. So, for the first time, Margaret allowed herself to think of all the beautiful things of the last happy summer. She remembered half, smiling at the pleasure of it, how they had translated and shortened each other's names. His solid, old "Jerome" was "Rome," or "Romo;" and her plain, strong "Margaret" became "Marquerita," and often "Rita."

The opening of the door startled her. Camilla entered followed by two gentlemen. The next instant her name was pronounced in the deep, rich cadence of that happy summer, "Rita! my Rita!"

Camilla, whose large eyes were ablaze with joy, drew Signor Guelfi, the Turin ex-priest, back into the reception-room without even the formality of an introduction, causing poor Bog-gins to beat a desperate retreat. The wits of that excellent maidservant were so sharpened by anxiety that she had caught the drift of affairs. She was prepared to expect any eccentricity in the Italian girl: though she had come to have considerable confidence in the straightforwardness of that poor, dear, young American. This new turn of affairs put her quite out of her head.

"Worse'n malarly, Ann," she cried. "Ann, I say malarly oughtened to be mentioned in the same fortnight with this affliction. Oh, dear! dear! The poor, dear master! Whatever will he be a sayin' to all these goin's on?" and she threw her apron over her head, beginning to cry, and ending in a hysterical laugh.

"An' its yerself as has the malarly!" exclaimed Ann. "An' bad luck to us all whin we trusted ourselves in this quare, unscrutable counthry!"

During the days that intervened before the arrival of Mr. Pelham, our little party with its agreeable additions, developed a tangential tendency, like a fugue oratorio.

There were consultations by duets, trios, and quartettes. There were long stories to be told, and explanations given, which, unlike sermons, are the better for the smaller audience. Margaret and Jerome had to bring up to date the events of their five years of separation. So as they walked about the wonderful city, they talked in tones merry and grave, hiding tears with laughter, and gladness under a matter-of-fact manner that was glorified by their joy. Tourist and Romans turned to look after them, and well they might. One could seldom see so erect and manly a form as that of Major Buonanno. The careless, backward sweep of dark hair from his full forehead, the honest, unselfish look of his eyes, "clear and deep as the sky," as Margaret described them, the pose of his head, even and tower-like, upon shoulders that had never bent under the yoke, the easy grace with which his arms swung downward, all marked him as a patient, gentle, tender, powerful king of men, who, like his Divine Master, ruled to serve.

Margaret's vital, yet delicate dignity made her his counterpart. The strength of her bearing with the refined air that comes from carefully cultured life, and the naturalness that loses self-interest for others, gave her the ability perfectly to please, yet showed that her care to please was that she might the better use her power to help.

Tourists and Romans looked after them as they walked; she in her plain, pretty travelling suit, he in his showy uniform. Brother and sister? Hardly. But they seem closely akin. They carry their heads as if born to wear the same crown. When they sat under the trees beside a fountain, the silver braid on Buonanno's broad chest would hold the eye of passers for a moment. They would have been glad to lay a flower upon the heart that they knew was loyal to Italy, though foreign-born. They saw that the bronze was wanting on his cheek, and they said, in their quick, impulsive thought, "God bless him! He has been wounded in our service. He has come to sit with his wife—his queen—under the trees. God bless them both!"

One afternoon when the young people had all gone their ways, Boggins and Ann were wondering and crooning, scolding and laughing over the strange turn that affairs had taken. There was a ring, and they both went to answer the bell. Boggins would not try to understand a single sentence of the strange speech while Ann, with her Irish shrewdness, could make it out mostly, "unearthly as it was, to be sure."

Ann opened the door only so far as the chain would permit, peeped out, and drew back with a terrifying whisper in Boggins' ear that it was "one o' thim prastes, with a looped up hat rim, and a sailin' under false riggin' in a woman's gownd."

The priest had come to bless the premises, be they Protestant or Catholic, hoping to pick up a few francs by these means, or carry away in his sack something for his Easter dinner.

"Gracious me!" exclaimed Boggins. "Whatever does he say?"

The bag on the priest's arm looked to Ann like the camera that Margaret used in her excursions in the country about London. The maid had often carried it and seen the pictures taken.

"Whatever can he be after?" asked Boggins, lowering her voice, as if there was a chance of the priest's understanding what she said. "Just you tell him to be off with hisself. They'll have us shut up in the Inquisition fore we fairly turn round, if once they get into the house."

"He wants to take a view of us," said Ann. "I've been a telling him that no doubt we'd make a lovely group, but we ain't no 'casion."

"I'll tell him to be off with hisself, if you're frightened of him," said Boggins, doughtily. Then raising her voice, as if that would make him understand "see here!" she stormed. "We don't want none of your pictures. We're all artists here!" and she slammed the door in his face; while Ann with her hands on her hips, threw herself that way and this, in convulsions of smothered laughter.

That afternoon Margaret and Jerome sat in the little park near the fountain on the Via Nazionale, talking endlessly, as only those do who give the whole heart's confidence. Children and sunbeams were playing bo-peep among the flowers, birds were flitting and singing in the trees, people were passing with kind glances. They were talking about investing all in Christ's work. "In an inventory of our joint possessions," said Jerome, "my poor little belongings will make a sorry figure, but then, a woman always brings the heavier share of capital into the concern."

"There, Romo!" she exclaimed, raising a finger, "do you remember?—when we were studying Italian that summer in the cottage, that very sentence was the first original one you tried to translate. I thought it a bit of pretty moonshine; but it pleased mamma. How she did love you! And no wonder."

He thanked her with his eyes for the compliment.

"My mother gave so generously," he said, "I made up my mind never to deal so with you. I was not humble enough to take so much more than I could give. It was my own pride more than your father's that drove me away. I saw it for the first when I lay half dead on the field at Dogali. As I told you I escaped death only because they thought me dead. They took all my valuables; but they could not find this," taking a small leather case from an inner breast pocket, and showing her the photos of herself and his mother. "The first thing I did when I could raise my hand, was to see if it was safe; though I didn't feel at all sure that they had left the nose on my face." He laughed as men are apt to do when their voices grow husky. "While I lay there I saw the wealth and honors of this world as the merest trumpery. I saw my pride as most absurd and ungodly:—a Christian—a follower of the Galilean peasant;—yet straining every nerve to get position and wealth so that I might offer myself to you as your equal. In Christ's white holiness, it looked abominable and ghastly. You know, in college I would never let anybody help me but you, and that never seemed like anybody else. So when I began to gather myself together again, I undertook to make my soul as white as yours: but I had to get beyond that. I had to seek to be pure in heart, not to please you, nor to be as rich as you in the true wealth, but simply to please him who bought me with his own blood, and through whose merit alone I could be made clean from my selfishness."

"Poor Romo! carrissimo!" she said. "Did our Lord send anyone to help you?"

"Yes, thanks to his name! but I was quite reluctant to receive the messenger. I was in the hospital yet, just able to sit around. One day sat outside with my Bible, studying arder on this problem than I ever id on any of our mathematics, when poor Salvation Army fellow who ad been so roughly handled by a job that they had sent him to the ospital, limped up, and began to alk about the book. Of course the ride that was left in me drew back rom his teaching; think of it, Rita ua! I supposed then that I was riddled for life. I had saved but lile from my salary, which was not verlarge before my promotion. I as further than ever from being ble to sail home grandly, as your qual. At the very bottom of every- ing, yet too proud to take an ad- vanced lesson in Christian life from Salvation Army cobbler!"

The way in which Hood's Sarsaparilla builds up people in run down or weakened state of health conclusively proves the claim that this medicine "makes the weak strong." It does not act like a stimulant, imparting fictitious strength from which there must follow a reaction of greater weakness than before, but in the most natural way Hood's Sarsaparilla overcomes that tired feeling, creates an appetite, purifies the blood and in short, gives great bodily, nerve, mental and digestive strength.

"Poor Romo!" said Margaret, miling though there was a lump in er throat. "But I am glad our Lord onquered you."

"And so am I. When I gave up tterly he manifested himself to me a way that perfectly satisfied every ant of my soul. Since then he has iven me everything, health, promo- on, the royal favor, and above all y Rita; but I would give up all, en you, and go back to the hospi- l, alone, crippled, with nothing to ok forward to but poverty and pain -yes, I would a million times rather an give up the fellowship I have ith him."

She nodded assent with a silent anksgiving for the tender, high fel- owship that bound each to the other.

They talked of the beautiful exper- nce of which he had spoken, of the mple life they would live, and of he wide evangelism they hoped to ccomplish together.

"We will have as much money for as we will care to answer for," she aid.

"Yes," he replied; "there will al- ways be plenty of money for all that e wants us to do. A soldier never ears a lack of supplies as long as he government back of him is in ood condition and he has its confi- ence."

"But you are not so poor in your wn right as you fancy," said Marga- et. "Do you remember old Jona- han Gurley? You used to read to im evenings when he was down ith the rheumatism. A dear, cranky, ld fellow, too contrary to let any- ody know of a good intention. e hasn't a relative in the world. e's rich, and he meant to give his oney to you. When I wrote him hat your Dogali comrade told me, e changed his will in my favor; but ave written him since I found you, nd I know how it will turn out. He lways insisted that you would come ut right yet. He will want you to ut a good deal of it into some Chris- an work, while he lives, for he says e means to be his own executor, ince he is to be judged by the deeds one in the body,—not by what his oney does after he can hold it no nger."

"I was sure the money would be orthcoming for work among my oor soldiers," said Jerome; adding a voice low and reverent, "like he benediction that follows the rayer," "I did not dream when I sked for it that it would come so soon. The soldiers are the best evangelical force in Italy. We have one thousand in our catechumen classes here in Rome, young, impres- sible, many of them soundly convert- ed. When they go home they carry the fire with them. They are kind- ling all Italy with the love of Christ."

"But, Romo mio, what if there is war? Of course I would go with you—but your evangelical work?"

"That is all arranged, dearest Rita," and he held up his left wrist. "It was a bitter day when the sur- geons decided that I could never take the field again. You said you saw me in my struggle with Vittorio, my horse, the day of the review—the king's birthday. I should have made short work with him if I had had both hands. The left is practically well, but it will never be as strong as before. I owe my position partly to that poor wrist. They mean to make the most of my mathematical ability. I am in the best arm of the service; and my work gives me ac- cess to them who are most settled, especially the officers."

"By the way, Romo, have you spoken to Crispi about the Guiccioli estate?"

"Yes," he replied, "that will be made right, your little Camilla shall have her villa again. She and Guelfi will be capital help in our plans. He has great influence with the students."

"We must fit the three arms of our service for the evangelical field, and put them at once in motion; a for- ward movement all along the line. You must gather a staff of workers from England, America, and the home field, and lead the women to Christ. Guelfi and Camilla may have the students, while I will do what I can for the soldiers. Yours is the most important part of the work. They who train the children shape the civilization of the future. I am glad about dear old Gurley's money. It puts us at once on a war footing."

He rose, and replaced on his head the plumed hat that had been beside him on the bench while he talked with Margaret. "Yes," he said as they moved with brisk even step to- ward her home. "Yes, the women, the students and the soldiers, work- ing in the fullness of the Gospel of Christ will make this beautiful Italy Immanuel's land."

SEEING AND BELIEVING.

If, sometime, when my soul sits dark and lonely.

A sudden light should shine,
And the Lord's human face one brief hour only

Might stand revealed to mine,
I think that henceforth all my journey long,
I could walk onward, steady, brave and strong.

If He could come from His far heavenly splendor,

And, entering at my door,
Smile on me with some gracious word and tender,

I would despond no more.
Could any weeping ever after dim
The eyes that but for once had gazed on Him?

Seeing His love outshines His kingly glory,
Sitting down at His feet,

Easy it were to tell the long sad story,
For other ears unmeet,
Of strife and struggle, weariness and loss,
And the sharp piercing of my daily cross.

With all my terror changed to loving boldness,

My lips at last could speak,
How all alike, earth's love and hate and coldness

Make me and keep me weak;
How duty undone clogs the spirit's wing,
Or done, seems still a mean and paltry thing.

Yes—I would have Him know without concealing

All that the past hath been,
Would humbly at His garment's hem seek healing

For weakness and for sin;
Oh, could that sin keep longer hold on me
When once His pardoning love had set me free?

Dear Christ, who upon earth was born of woman,

And for Thy glory's throne
Still bendest with heart pitiful and human Yearning towards Thine own,
Though blessed to my soul such sight of Thee,
The deeper joy of faith grant unto me?

That through the darkness reaching and believing,

I may move onward steadily and strong;
Into my heart Thy spirit's peace receiving,

May find my sorrow changing into song,
While Thou unseen dost know and calm my fears,

And keep my feet from fall, my eyes from tears.

INVITATION TO A WEDDING.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON PREACHED IN THE NEW BROOKLYN TABERNACLE LAST SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 10, 1891.

A Day of Holy Festivity—The Historic Entertainment of a Queen—Cardinal Wolsey's Hospitality—A Grandeur Entertainment—No Disappointment at that Banquet—Christ is Ready—His Long Waiting—The Day-Break of the Soul—The Holy Spirit Ready—A Young Man Converted at the Tabernacle—The Church Ready—A General Invitation—Angels Ready—Glorified Kindred Waiting.

"Come; for all things are now ready." Luke 14: 17.

HOLY festivities to day. We gather other sheaves into the spiritual garner. Our joy is like the joy of heaven. Spread the banquet, fill all the chalices. We are not to-day at the funeral of a dead Christ; we are celebrating the marriage of the King's son.

It was an exciting time in English history when Queen Elizabeth visited Lord Leicester at Kenilworth Castle. The clocks in all the towers and throughout the castle were stopped at the moment of her arrival, so continuing to point to that moment as the one surpassing all others in interest. The door of the great banquet hall was opened. The queen marched in to the sound of the trumpets. Four hundred servants waited upon the guests. It was a scene that astonished all nations when they heard of it. Five thousand dollars a day did the banquet cost as it went on day after day. She was greeted to the palace gates with floating islands, and torches and the thunders of cannon, and fireworks that set the night ablaze, and a burst of music that lifted the whole scene into enchantment. Beginning in that way, it went on from joy to joy, and from excitement to excitement, and from rapture to rapture. That was the great banquet that Lord Leicester spread in Kenilworth Castle.

Cardinal Wolsey entertained the French ambassadors in Hampton Court. The best cooks of all the land provided for the table. The guests were kept hunting in the parks all the day, so that their appetites might be keen, and then in the evening hour they were shown into the banquet hall, with table aglitter with imperial plate, and ablush with the very costliest wines, and the second course of the feast was made of food in all shapes, of men and birds and beasts, and dancing groups, and jousting parties riding upon each other with uplifted lances. Lords and princes and ambassadors, their cups gleaming to the brim, drank first to the health of the King of England, and then to the health of the Emperor of France. That was the banquet that Cardinal Wolsey spread in Hampton Court.

But to-day, my brothers and sisters, I invite you to a grander entertainment. My Lord, the King, is the banqueter. Angels of God are the cupbearers, all the redeemed are the guests; the halls of eternal love frescoed with light, and paved with joy, and curtained with unfading beauty are the banquetting place, the harmonies of eternity are the music, the chalices of God are the plate, and I am one of the servants come out with invitations to all the people, and oh, that you might break the seal of the invitation and read in ink of blood, and with the tremulous hand of a dying Christ: "Come, come, for all things are now ready."

Sometimes there have been great disappointments at a banquet. The wine has given out, or the servants have been rebellious, or the lights have failed; but I walk all around the banquetting table of my Lord to day, and I find everything complete, and I swing open the door of this banquetting house and I say: "All things are now ready."

Illustrating my text, I go on and in the first place say that the Lord Jesus Christ is ready. Cardinal Wolsey did not come into the banquetting hall until the second course of the feast, and when he entered booted and spurred, all the guests arose and cheered him; but I have to tell you that our banqueter, the Lord Jesus Christ, comes in at the beginning of the feast. Ay, he has been waiting for his guests, waiting for some of them 1891 years, waiting with mangled feet, waiting with hand on the punctured side, waiting with hand on the lacerated temples, waiting, waiting! Wonder it is that the banqueter did not get weary and say: "Shut the door, and let the laggards stay out." No, he has been waiting. How much he is in earnest! Shall I show you? I gather up all the tears that flooded his cheek in sympathy, all the blood that channelled his brow and back and hand and foot, to purchase our redemption, I gather up all the groans coming from midnight chill and mountain hunger and desert loneliness, and I put them into one bitter cry—I gather up all the pangs that shot from cross and spike and spear, into one groan—I take one drop of sweat on his brow, and I put it under the glass of the Gospel, and it enlarges to lakes of sorrow, to oceans of agony. That Christ to-day, emaciated and worn and weary, comes here, and with a pathos in which every word is a heart-break and every sentence a martyrdom, he says to you and he says to me: "Come, come, for all things are now ready."

Ahasuerus made a feast that lasted 180 days. This lasts forever. Lords and princes were invited to that. You and I are invited to this. Yes, he has been waiting, he is waiting now. Other kings wrap themselves in robes of beauty and power before they come into a banquet. So does Christ. Oh, he is the fairest of the fair. In his hand is the omnipotent surgery that opened blind eyes and straightened crooked limbs and hoisted the pillars of heaven, and swung the twelve gates which are twelve pearls. Oh, what a Christ—a Christ of beauty, a Christ of power. There are not enough cups on earth to dip up this ocean of beauty. There are not ladders to scale these heights of Love. Oh, thou Flower of eternity, thy breath is the perfume of heaven. Oh, thou Daybreak of the soul, let all nations clap their hands in thy radiance. Chorus! Come men and angels and cherubim and seraphim and archangel, all heights, all depths, all immensities. Chorus! Roll on through the heavens in chariot of universal acclaim, over bridges of hosanna, under arches of coronation, by the towers chiming with eternal jubilee. Chorus! Unto him that loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and made us kings and priests unto God, to him be glory.

Ah! there is one word of five letters that I would like to write; but I have no sheet fair enough to write it on, and no pencil good enough to inscribe it. Give me a sheet from the heavenly records, and some pencil used by angel in describing a victory, and then with hand struck with supernatural energy, and with pencil dipped in everlasting morning, I will write it out in capitals of love: J-E-S-U-S Jesus! It is this One that is waiting for you and for me, for we are on the same platform before God. How long he waited for me! How long he has waited for you! Waiting as a banqueter waits for his delayed guests, the meats smoking, and the beakers brimming, and the minstrel with his finger on the stiff string ready to strike at the first clash of the hoofs at the gateway. Waiting as a mother waits for a boy that ten years ago went off dragging her bleeding heart after him. Waiting. Oh, can you not give me some comparison intense enough, importunate enough, high as heaven, deep as hell, and vast as eternity? Not expecting that you can help me with such a comparison, I simply say he is waiting as only an all-sympathetic Christ knows how to wait for a wandering soul.

Bow the knee and kiss the Son,
Come and welcome, sinner, come.

But I remark again, not only Christ is waiting, but the Holy Spirit is waiting. Why are some sermons a dead failure? Why are there songs that do not get their wing under the people? Why are there prayers that go no higher up than a hunter's halloo? Because there is a missing link that only the Holy Spirit can make. If that Spirit should come through this assemblage this morning, there would be a power felt like that when Saul was unhorsed on the road to Damascus, like as when Lydia's heart was broken in her fine store, like as when three thousand souls were lifted out of midnight into midnoon at the Pentecost. Do you notice that sometimes that Spirit takes an insignificant agency to save a soul? I think it is very often that at just one passage of Scripture, just one word of Scripture, a soul is saved because the Holy Spirit gives it supernatural power. Do you know what it was that saved Martin Luther? It was that one verse: "The just shall live by faith." Do you know what it was that brought Augustine from his horrible dissipations? It was that one verse: "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make no provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof." Do you know what it was that saved Hedley Vicars, the celebrated soldier? It was the one passage: "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." Do you know what it was that brought Jonathan Edwards to Christ? It was the one passage: "Now unto him be glory forever and ever."

One Thanksgiving morning in church I read my text, "O, give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good," and a young man stood in the gallery and said to himself: "I have never rendered one acceptable offering of gratitude to God in all my life. Here, Lord, I am thine forever." By that one passage of Scripture he was brought into the kingdom, and if I might tell my own experience, I might tell how one Sabbath afternoon I was brought to the peace of the Gospel by reading of the Syro-Phœnician's cry to Christ where she said: "Even the dogs eat of the crumbs that fall from the master's table." Philosophic sermons never saved anybody. Metaphysical sermons never saved anybody. An earnest plea going right out of the heart blessed of the Holy Ghost, that is what saves, that is what brings people into the kingdom of Christ. I suppose the world thought that Thomas Chalmers preached great sermons in his early ministry, but Thomas Chalmers says he never preached at all until years after he had occupied a pulpit he came out of his sick room, and weak and emaciated, he stood and told the story of Christ to the people. And in the great day of eternity it will be found that not so much the eloquent sermons brought men to Christ as the story told, perhaps, by those who were unknown on earth, the simple story of the Savyour's love and mercy, sent by the power of the Holy Ghost straight to the heart. Come, Holy Ghost. Ay, he is here this morning. He fills all the place. I tell you the Holy Ghost is ready.

Then I go on and tell you the church is ready. There are those here who say: "No one cares for my soul." We do care for it. You see a man bowing his head in prayer and you say: "That man is indifferent." That man bows his head in prayer that the truth may go to every heart. The air is full of prayers. They are going up this morning from this assembly. Hundreds of prayers straight to the throne of a listening God. The air is full of prayers—prayers ascending noon by noon from Fulton Street prayer meeting, Friday night by Friday night all over this land, going up from praying circles. Yea, there is not a minute of an hour of any day that there are not prayers ascending to the throne of mercy.

THE VISION OF SAUL OF TARSUS.

The church is ready. And if you should this morning start for your Father's house, there would be hundreds and thousands in this assemblage who would say if they knew it: "Make room for that man, make room for him at the holy sacrament; bring the silver bowl for his baptism; give him full right to all the privileges of the church of Jesus Christ."

Oh, I know there are those who say the Church is a mass of hypocrites, but they do not really think so. It is a glorious Church. Christ purchased it. Christ built it. Christ swung all its gates. Christ curtained it with upholstery, crimson with crucifixion carnage. Come into it. Come into it. I do not pick out this man or that man and say: "You may come." I say all may come—whosoever will. "Come with us and we will do you good. The Lord hath promised good concerning Israel."

We are a garden walled around
Chosen and made peculiar ground,
A little plot enclosed by grace
Out of the world's wild wilderness.

Do not say you have never been invited. I invite you now to the King's feast. One and all. All! All! But I go further and tell you that the angels are ready. Some people think when we speak about angels we are getting into the region of fancy. They say it is very well for a man when he has just entered the ministry to preach about the angels of heaven, but after he has gone on further it is hardly worth while. My friends, there is not any more evidence in the Bible that there is a God than that there are angels. Did they not swarm around Jacob's ladder? When Lazarus' soul went up did they not escort it? Did not David say: "The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels?" Are they not represented as the chief harvesters of the judgment day? Did not one angel in one night slay 180,000 of Sennacherib's troops? Oh, yes, our world is in communication with two other worlds. All that communication is by angels. When a bad man is to die, a man who has despised God and rejected the Gospel, the bad spirits come on sulphurous wing and they shackle him, and try to push him off the precipices into the ruin, and they lift a guffaw of diabolical exultation. But there is a line of angels, bright and beautiful and loving angels, mighty angels, reaching all the way from earth to heaven, and when others gather like them I suppose the air is full of them. They hover. They flit about. They push down iniquity from your heart. They are ready to rejoice. Look! There is an angel from the throne of God. One moment ago, it stood before Christ and heard the doxology of the redeemed. It is here now. Bright immortal, what news from the golden city? Speak, spirit blest. The answer comes melting on the air: "Come, come, for all things are now ready." Angels ready to bear the tidings. Angels ready to drop the benediction. Angels ready to kindle the joy. All ready. Ready, cherubim and seraphim. Ready, thrones, and principalities and powers. Ready, Michael the archangel.

Yes, I go further and say that your glorified kindred are ready. I have not any sympathy with modern spiritualism. I believe it is born in perdition. When I see the ravages it makes with human intellects, when I see the homes it has devastated, when I see the bad morals that very often follow in its wake, I have no faith in modern spiritualism. I think if John Milton and George Whitefield have not anything better to do than to crawl under Rochester tables and rattle the leaves they had better stay home in glory. But the Bible distinctly teaches that the glorified in heaven are in sympathy with our redemption. "There is joy in heaven among the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth," and if the angels hear it, do not our departed kindred there hear it? There are those there who toiled for your salvation, and when they bade you good-by in the last hour, and they said, "Meet me in heaven," there was hovering over the pillow the awful possibility that you might not meet. But oh, the pathos when that hand was thrust out from the cover, and they said good-by. For how long good-by was it?

Now, suppose you should pass into the kingdom of God this morning, suppose you should say: "I'm done with the sins of this world. Fie upon all these follies. O Christ! I take thee now, I take thy service, I respond to thy love, thine am I forever"—why, before the tear of repentance had dried on your cheek, before your first prayer had closed, the angel standing with the message for thy soul, would cry upward, "He is coming!" and angels poising mid-air would cry upward: "He is coming!" all along the line of light from doorway to doorway, from wing tip to wing tip, the news would go upward till it reached the gate, and then it would flash to the house of many mansions, and find your kindred out, and those before the throne would say: "Rejoice with me, my prayers are answered. Give me another harp with which to strike the joy. Saved, saved, saved!"

Now, my friends, if Christ is ready, and the Holy Ghost is ready, and the Church is ready, and the angels of God are ready, and your glorified kindred are ready, are you ready? I give with all the emphasis of my soul the question: "Are you ready?" If you do not get into the King's feast it will be because you do not accept the earnest invitation. Arm stretched out soaked with blood from elbow to finger-tip, lips quivering in mortal anguish, two eyes beaming everlasting love while he says: "Come, come, come, for all things are now ready."

At Kenilworth Castle, I told you, they stopped the clocks when Queen Elizabeth arrived, that the hand of time might point to that moment as the one most significant and tremendous; but if this morning, the King should enter the castle of your soul, well might you stop all the clocks and have the finger of time pointing to this moment as the one most stupendous in all your life. Would that I could come all through these aisles and all through these galleries, not addressing you perfunctorily, but taking you by the hand as a brother takes a brother by the hand, and saying to one and all, to each: "Come, come, the door is open, enter now and sit down at the feast."

Old man, God has been waiting for thee long years. Would that some tear of repentance might trickle down thy wrinkled cheek. Has not Christ done enough in feeding thee and clothing thee all these years to win from thee one word of gratitude? Come, all the young. Christ is the fairest of the fair. Wait not till thy heart gets hard. Come, the furthest away from Christ. Drunkard, Christ can put out the fire of that thirst. He can restore thy broken home. He can break that shackle. Come now, to-day, and get his pardon and its strength. Libertine, Christ knew where you were last night. He knows all the story of thy sin. Come to him this day. He will wash away thy sin and he will throw around thee the robe of his pardon. Harlot, thy feet foul with hell, thy laughter the horror of the street—O Mary Magdalen! Christ waits for thee. And one further off, further than any I have mentioned, a case not so hopeful as any I have mentioned, self-righteous man, feeling thyself all right, having no need of Christ, no need of pardon, no need of help—O self-righteous man! dost thou think in those rags thou canst enter the feast? Thou canst not. God's servant at the gate would tear off thy robe and leave thee naked at the gate. O self-righteous man! the last to come. Come to the feast. Come, repent of thy sin. Come, take Christ for thy portion.

AHASUERUS' FEAST.

Day of grace going away. Shadows on the cliff reaching further and further over the plain. The banquet has already begun. Christ has entered into that banquet to which you are invited. The guests are taking their places. The servant of the King has his hand on the door of the banqueting-room, and he begins to swing it shut. Now is your time to go in. Now is my time to enter. I must go in. You must go in. He is swinging the door shut. Now, it is half shut. Now, it is three-fourths shut. Now, it is just ajar. After awhile it will be forever shut!

Why will ye waste on trifling cares
That life which God's compassion spares?
While in the endless round of thought
The one thing needful is forgot."

A CHILD'S PROVIDENTIAL ESCAPE.

DR. W. P. PAXSON, the zealous Superintendent of the work of the American Sunday School Union in the Southwest, whose portrait appeared in this journal last week, relates an instance of the saving of a child's life. He says:—"Mrs. Robb, who is a relative of mine is a granddaughter of a chief of the Choctaw's. She tells an interesting story concerning the introduction of the whites into the Choctaw tribe. A white man had found his way out there, and he married a Choctaw girl. No attention was paid to the matter, till the baby was born. Then the question came up before the council whether or not white people should be allowed to marry with the women of the tribe. 'The whites are so much more numerous than we,' said the chiefs, 'that we may lose our Indian characteristics if we permit it.' They decided to have no more intermarriages, and that the young man who was the offender in the present case should be punished and the child killed. A committee was appointed to 'remove' it, but they did not want to do it. That night, an old 'aunty' stole the baby and made a little soup of venison and put it into a skin bag. Then she hid the baby in a hollow tree with this bag to live on. When the committee came, the child was gone. They decided that the Great Spirit had taken it away."

"If the child comes back," they said, "all right; we will let him live if he stays here. If he never comes back, then we will know that the Great Spirit has taken him away, and saved us the trouble." The baby was kept hidden a couple of days and about the third night, the mother woke up, overjoyed to find it beside her in bed. The boy was regarded after that as charmed and under the special care of the Great Spirit. He became a chief of the tribe."

A NOTABLE ANNIVERSARY.

SEVENTY-FIVE YEARS' WORK OF THE AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.

Over Fifty Million Bibles and Testaments Distributed Throughout the Entire Globe—How the Society, from a Modest Beginning, has Become a Mighty and Ever-Increasing Force for the Spread of the Gospel—Its Organization and Management Described.

SEVENTY-FIVE years ago, this week, a number of gentlemen met in the Consistory-room of the Dutch Reformed Church in Garden Street, New York, City, and organized, in a modest manner, what has since become one of the most powerful agencies for Christ in the entire history of evangelization—the American Bible Society. There had been Bible Societies anterior to the one then formed and much good work had been accomplished by the Philadelphia, Connecticut and Massachusetts Societies, the first of these, the oldest in America, dating back to 1808. The New York Bible Society, the New Jersey, and similar organizations, which sprang up from time to time, had also been the means of scattering the Sacred Word very generally among the people of the States which then formed the Union. But their field was in every instance a local one and their work was hampered by the smallness of their resources. When, in 1816, a union was proposed, thirty-five of these societies responded to the call for a convention which assembled in New York, on May 8th of that year. There were also present four representatives from the Society of Friends, besides other supporters of the movement, making sixty persons in all. Joshua M. Wallace, of New Jersey, presided, and the Revs. Lyman Beecher and J. B. Romeyn acted as Secretaries.

As the result of that Convention, a "Constitution was adopted and an address sent out to the people of the United States, announcing the formation of a general Bible institution for the circulation of the Holy Scriptures "without note or comment." Executive officers and a very able Board of Managers were chosen, and the American Bible Society entered upon its career of benevolence and Christian usefulness—a career which has since broadened and expanded until, under God's blessing, it has beneficently embraced nearly every tongue and nation in every land under the sun.

In recognition of the fact that the first suggestion for the new departure had come from New Jersey, Hon. Elias Boudinot of Burlington, in that State, was elected as the first President of the American Bible Society. Among his active coadjutors were such notable divines as Revs. Drs. Nott, Mason, Rice, Morse, Blythe, Wilbur and Jones, besides a number of Christian gentlemen, including Messrs. William Jay, Gen. Linklaen, John Murray, Jr., James Fenimore Cooper, Orrin Day, Robert Sedgwick, Ichabod Skinner, and others. Although the Convention was formed from a large number of different denominations, there was not a single dissenting voice. Its deliberations closed on May 13th, 1815, and as this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes to press, the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Society is being celebrated in New York City, by a gathering which, although all the original founders of the organization have passed away, can look back to a record of constantly extending usefulness, in which the plans of the pioneers have been faithfully carried out to a magnificent success.

The history of the American Bible Society during the three-quarters of a century of its existence illustrates the tremendous potency of concentrated effort in Gospel work. It is in the highest sense, a benevolent institution, manufacturing and disposing of the Scriptures not for the sake of profit, but solely for a philanthropic and Christian object. It has cheapened the Holy Word so as to place it within the reach of all who desire it; it has carried the Bible into the remotest parts of the earth; it has enabled any household to possess it, either by purchase or by gift, and the highest price asked for God's Word, where anything was asked at all, has never exceeded the simple cost. Where poverty rendered payment impossible, it has furnished the Scriptures "without money and without price." Unsectarian as to its management, its benefits have extended to every denomination of Christians, and its labors have included all classes. It is not too much to say that wherever the foot of the white man has penetrated, the Society has labored to of which was borne by the Society direct; the translations in other instances being circulated by the missionaries of different denominations, assisted and encouraged by the Society. It may be said in general that the Society circulates annually a million and a half of volumes, more than half of which are in English; that its foreign circulation exceeds 500,000 a year, three-eighths of which are distributed in China, and another three-eighths in Japan, Turkey, Mexico and South America. Among the versions used abroad are the Classical Mandarin, Canton, Fuhchau, Ningpo, Amoy and Shanghai in China; the Hebrew-Spanish, Turkish, Armeno-Turkish, Græco-Turkish, Azerjiban, Ancient and Modern Armenian, Persian and Koor-dish in the Levant; the Hindi, Urdu and other languages in India and Ceylon; the Siamese, Mongolese, Japanese, Ebon and Reval-Esthonian. In 1856 it presented to each of the reigning monarchs of the world, a copy of its Imperial Quarto English Bible, handsomely bound, enclosed in an elegant rosewood case and accompanied by a Christian letter, and among its achievements are the many courteous replies received in acknowledgment.

During its first year the Society issued 6,410 volumes, its fiftieth year reached the magnificent total of 1,150,528 volumes, and up to the present time it has issued a grand total of FIFTY-FOUR MILLIONS OF VOLUMES! Of these, a large proportion have been distributed gratuitously. In 1852, the Society determined to erect a building sufficiently large to accommodate its steadily-increasing operations, and the corner-stone of the Bible House was laid on June 29th of that year. This building (see illustration on this page), which is situated on the block bounded by Third and Fourth Avenues and Eighth and Ninth Streets, was the result of individual subscriptions raised for that purpose. The editorial rooms and publishing offices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are located in this great building.

BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

make its influence felt and to spread the Gospel. There are on its registers over 2,000 auxiliaries and these in turn have not less than 5,000 branches, so that it now has in this country alone fully 7,000 subordinate Societies in active operation.

Its work in the foreign field dates as far back as 1833, when Mexico was made the first centre of operations outside of the United States. Next followed South America, then the Levant, including sub-agencies at Beirut and Alexandria; thence Paraguay, Brazil, China, Japan, Persia, Cuba, Siam, the countries of Europe, Venezuela, Bolivia, Siberia, India, the Islands of the Northern Pacific, Western and South Africa, and almost every land where American Churches have founded missions. Teachers and colporteurs were employed to oversee the distribution of the Scriptures at these distant points, and editions in different languages were rapidly multiplied, until at the present time the Scriptures are printed in more than eighty different tongues, all conveying to the remotest parts of the world the precious message of God's love and Christ's sacrifice.

In another part of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we present examples of some of the languages and dialects into which the Bible has been translated; to give all would fill an entire number of the HERALD, even if the illustration were confined to a single verse. So enormous a task involved large expense, a considerable part and the Manufacturing. There are altogether over two hundred and fifty persons employed, many of whom are women. A sixty-horse-power steam engine furnishes the motive power necessary for the operation of twenty-two presses, capable of turning out 2,000,000 Bibles and Testaments annually or about 7,000 copies per diem.

Every year brings a further extension of the Society's field of usefulness and increased demands upon its resources. With the spread of the Gospel work at home and abroad, it finds even its phenomenal facilities hardly adequate to the work, which has now grown to proportions beyond all precedent. This should encourage the liberality of Christian people everywhere, to find that so much can be accomplished with their aid. The present officers of the Society are Hon. Enoch L. Fancher, LL.D., New York, President; Rev. Edward W. Gilman, D.D., Rev. Alexander McLean, D.D., and Rev. Albert S. Hunt, D.D., Secretaries; William Foulke, Treasurer; and Caleb T. Rowe, General Agent. Portraits of several of these gentlemen are published in this issue. On the first page is depicted a most interesting scene: Rev. Mr. Bingham dictating the translation of the last verse of the Old Testament, on April 11, 1890, and so completing his version of the Gilbert Islands Bible, begun at Apaiang, in February 1859—a task involving an amount of long-continued energy and devotion difficult to realize.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

Citizens to Keep the Streets Clean—The Escape of the Chilean War Vessel—A Child Lost—A Woman in Prison Fifty Years—A Physician's Midnight Adventure.

STREET-CLEANING

pledges were circulated for signature last week in New York. The streets of the city have long been notoriously filthy, and there is a prospect of their becoming worse, for the Legislature has refused to permit an increase of the appropriation for cleaning them. A society has, in consequence, been organized to aid the Street-Cleaning Bureau. Any person may become a member by signing the pledge it has issued, and forwarding it to the offices of the Society. In signing the pledge the citizen binds himself to have the sidewalk in front of his own residence swept every morning, not to throw orange or banana peelings on the sidewalk, nor in the gutter, and to scrupulously observe certain city ordinances now commonly disregarded. There can be no doubt that if this pledge is generally signed and honestly kept, there will be a marked improvement in the cleanliness of the city. It would be a good thing, too, if the principle is not limited to street-cleaning. It would be equally beneficial if applied to morals. Many social evils would be abated if all those who profess to deplore their existence would abjure them. (Rom. 2: 21.)

A Mysterious Steamer has been Causing some uneasiness to the Government for some days past, and on May, 6, orders were sent from Washington to detain her, but as only one deputy-marshal was put on board, the vessel sailed away in defiance. She has been at San Diego, Cal., and was registered as a passenger ship. Suspicions were, however, excited that she was really intended as a transport, if not an armed cruiser for the Chilean insurgents. It was noticed that enormous quantities of coal and general supplies were being taken on board. Forty live cattle, three thousand pounds of dressed meat and eight hundred tons of coal were put on board in one day. This kind of cargo and its quantity convinced the authorities that there was no truth in the captain's statement that the vessel was going no farther than Nangamo to load with coal. The arrival of a schooner at the Santa Catalina Islands with a cargo of Remington rifles and cartridges confirmed the suspicion, as she was believed to be waiting the arrival of the big steamer. There is no principle of international law more familiar to the Government than that which forbids the shipping of munitions of war to insurgents against a friendly power; orders were, therefore, sent to San Diego to seize the steamer and hold her. It is much to be wished that similar vigilance were exercised to thwart men who design to prey on the morals of our own citizens. The licensing of saloons and theatres of immoral tendency, and connivance at the existence of gambling resorts, are practices inconsistent with the principle on which the Chilean vessel was detained and they, like the vessel, usually evade the law. (Prov. 28: 10.)

The Pathetic Complaint of a Child Touched the heart of a police-sergeant in New York on April 29. He was on duty at the Twenty-second Street Station about six in the evening, when a strange group entered. The leader was a girl of some twelve years, and with her were two little girls, one of them apparently about three and the other about five years old. The eldest of the company explained that she had seen the other two wandering aimlessly near her home, and, thinking "such little things" might come to harm with no one to take care of them, she had brought them to the police station. The Sergeant questioned the little wanderers as to their names and homes, but could learn nothing on either subject. The three-year old gave no information except that she was hungry, and her five-year old sister said "mamma is lost." The Sergeant smiled at the latter statement, but he dealt with both complaints. To relieve the former he sent out for some food and to deal with the latter he telephoned headquarters that the children were in his station. About two hours later the children were claimed by their parents. It appeared that their mother had left them for a moment at the door of their home while she spoke to a neighbor and the two children wandered away. They had travelled nearly two miles before the little "Good Samaritan" saw them and handed them over to the police. The child's complaint that mamma was lost was much like the complaints of some of God's wandering children. That is how the situation appears to them; but when they are restored they realize that their case is more fitly described in the phrase, "This my son was lost and is found." (Luke 15: 24.)

A Veteran Prisoner was Brought up for Sentence in a Court at Hartford, Conn., on May 4. She was an old woman who had been found intoxicated on the streets. She was sent up for thirty days for intoxication and thirty days more for refusing to tell who it was that sold her the liquor. When her record was looked up it was found that she had been imprisoned in almost every jail in the State. Her first crime was committed when she was a young woman. She was employed in a fashionable boarding house in Hartford and one night she entered her mistress' room while the latter was asleep, chloroformed her and stole her jewels and a large sum of money. She was detected and imprisoned for seven years. Soon after her release she committed a daring theft at Waterbury for which she was again sent to prison. She went to Bridgeport next where she robbed a woman of money and jewels and was a third time sentenced to a long term. After this she secured a temporary shelter with Vicar-general Hughes, but she was caught stealing there and sent back to prison for another term. Besides these long terms she has served out several minor terms. She is now seventy-eight years old and has passed nearly fifty years behind the bars. It is astonishing that her frequent imprisonments did not operate as a warning to her and lead her to reform. There are many, however, who, though they do not break human laws have a similar record in the courts of heaven. In spite of warning, chastisement and providential dealings they continue the enemies of God and obdurate to his appeals. (Ps. 29: 1.)

An Aged Lady's Terrified Flight Formed the subject of a story related by herself to a contemporary. She says that when residing in a country district near Dedham, Mass, she one day went to visit a friend who lived about a mile off. It was a lonely road with not a single house between her home and that of her friend. She remained there, talking and knitting until evening, and then set out to walk home alone in the moonlight. She had walked about a quarter of a mile when she heard a strange scratching noise behind her. She was somewhat timid at being alone on that road at night, and she looked nervously around to see what the noise came from. She saw a dark object following her, and, having heard that wildcats had been seen in the neighborhood, she thought the dark object in the path was one of those animals. She quickened her steps, but she could still hear what she supposed to be the scratching of its paws on the hard ground. Her terror increased, and she was soon running as fast as she could, but a glance over her shoulder showed her that the creature, whatever it was, was close on her heels. Her fear magnified it until it seemed to her excited fancy to be a great panther. She was almost fainting when she reached her own door, rushed in and shut it quickly behind her. Her husband was alarmed at her condition, but she begged him not to worry about her, but go out and kill that panther that had followed her all the way home. He obeyed, but soon came back laughing. Holding up a dark, half-finished stocking, he said, "Here is your panther." The old lady had dropped the stocking she had been knitting, but as the ball of yarn attached to it remained in her pocket the stocking had trailed after her, and the knitting needles in it had made the scratching noise which alarmed her. She was too much unnerved to laugh then at herself for mistaking her own work for a panther, though she has often done so since. She can afford to laugh, but not so those who see the work they have done in a sinful life following them, and realize its true nature by its consequences to themselves and others. (Job 20: 11.)

A Physician's Strange Midnight Adventure is described in a press despatch from Springfield, Ohio. It states that a well-known physician of that town was aroused on May 1, by a ring at his bell. It was not loud, but rather as if the caller wished to avoid disturbing the household. The doctor did not respond at first, but, as the low, stealthy calls continued, he rose from his bed and went to the door. Two men were there, supporting a third. Their faces were muffled so that he could not recognize them. It was the third man who needed medical attention and he was helped into the doctor's consulting room. He was suffering from a severe wound in the chest, a deep, long cut. The doctor dressed the wound and gave directions for the treatment of the patient. As he bade the men good night, one of them cautioned him against speaking of the visit. The wounded man gave him a searching look in the face and then said to his companions, "Better kill him." The doctor saw the flash of a knife in the hand of one of the men. He struck it aside with his hand and sprang backward. Nothing else saved his life, for the blow was aimed at his heart. No further attack was made upon him and the men went away after warning him that if he gave information they would return and kill him. That the man whose life the doctor had just saved should be the one to suggest the murder shows a degree of depravity and ingratitude almost incredible. Yet we know human nature is capable of even worse things. The Saviour was slain by the men whom he came to save and even now he is "wounded in the house of his friends." (Zech 13: 6.)

An Interesting Meeting of Two Old Friends occurred in New York a few days ago. One of the two was over fifty years of age and the other seventy. The younger came to the city a poor friendless lad forty years ago. He wanted employment and applied to a retail tradesman for help. The tradesman wrote a note which the lad took to a workshop in North William Street, and which secured him work. He was a diligent lad, soon learned the business and went out West where he found a chance of going into business for himself. He prospered in life as the years sped along; he won wealth by the time he had reached middle age; he rose to distinction among his fellows; he became a powerful person in his State, and for years past he has stood among the notables of the county. In all these years he had never again seen the retailer who spent ten minutes, forty years ago, in finding him his first work. A few days ago, when the rich notable, was making a visit to this city, he determined to hunt up the retailer who had taken pains to give him a start in life. He found him in the old retail shop, doing business in the old way, neither rich nor notable. As might be expected, the two gray-beards did not know each other when they met, and it turned out that the retailer had forgotten that he ever rendered a slight service to a country lad forty years ago. But the eminent man told him of it, assured him that he owed all his success in life to the kindly act and gave expression to his gratitude in a way that will relieve the aged retailer from worldly cares hereafter. Such instances of gratitude are rare. Many acts of Christian kindness do not lead to prosperity and many which do, are forgotten by the receiver as well as the doer. But he who spent his life in doing good, assured us that they are not forgotten in heaven and they "shall in no wise lose their reward." (Mark 9: 41.)

CAPTIVITY OF ISRAEL.

S. S. LESSON FOR MAY 24, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
II. KINGS 17: 6-18. GOLDEN TEXT, II. CHRON. 24: 20.

God's Patience with Wicked Nations—The Warning to Israel—The Nation Persistent in Idolatry—Adopting Heathen Practices—Prophetic Warnings—The Instrument of Judgment—The Terrible Siege—The Captivity—A Sign to Every Generation.

IN the history of nations, as well as of individuals, there comes a time which must prove a crisis. In Noah's days, the longsuffering of God waited a hundred and twenty years; but then the flood came upon that generation. God was patient with them, but when the iniquity of the Amorites was full, then judgment came upon them, and Israel possessed their land. (Gen. 15: 16.) The sin of Sodom accumulated, but God waited until the cry of it reached up to him; then fire and brimstone from heaven destroyed the city.

God had warned Israel through his servant Moses, "If ye will not hearken unto me, and will not do all these commandments; and if ye shall despise my statutes, or if your soul abhor my judgments, so that ye will not do all my commandments, but that ye break my covenant; I will... appoint over you terror, ... set my face against you... punish you seven times more for your sins, and I will break the pride of your power, ... And I will bring a sword upon you, that shall avenge

The Quarrel of My Covenant.

I will walk contrary unto you also in fury; will destroy your high places, ... make your cities waste, ... bring the land into desolation; and ... scatter you among the heathen." (Lev. 26: 14-33.) Could this be the same God who said, "Israel is my son; even my firstborn?" Was it he who had said, "If ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people, for all the earth is mine?" (Ex. 19: 5.) Was it he who said, "Yea, he loved the people; all his saints are in thy hand?" (Deut. 33: 3.) Yes, and there was love in his very severity, "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth" (Heb. 12: 6); if Israel was to be saved, it must be so as by fire. (1. Cor. 3: 15.) War, famine, pestilence, had been sent as visitations from God upon "backsliding Israel," yet from "the sins of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin," they had not returned. The golden calves were still more to them than the God who had led their fathers through the Red Sea and fed them with manna in the wilderness. And in addition to their first form of idolatry, which became general in Israel, the worship of Baal had so prevailed amongst them for many years as to become the state religion of God's chosen people! The very people whom he had called out from the nations to be his "witnesses" to show forth his praise had Sunk to the Level of the Heathen around them, and followed in their steps! Is there nothing similar to this to be found in the present day among professing Christians? Where is the holy singularity which made the Shunammite know and speak of the follower of Elijah as "a holy man of God which passeth by us continually"? Where is that great grace upon them all which gave its irresistible power to the witness of the first disciples of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus? Where is the angel face of a Stephen? And who shares with him the unconquerable spirit and wisdom with which he spoke? Is not the level of the Christianity of the day of quite another order,—self-seeking, earthly, carnal? In the old dispensation, God sought a people who would at all times, and under all circumstances, bear testimony that the unseen God who made heaven and earth was with them, that he was their God and dwelt among them. In the present day, Jesus seeks a people in whom, and through whom, he can manifest himself, his Spirit and his life.

Warning after warning had been sent to Israel; prophet after prophet had been raised up; Elijah, Elisha, Amos, Isaiah, Hosea, Nahum and Micah had sounded their warning against present sin, and foretold coming judgment. The last king of Israel was on the throne, yet no man knew, or at least believed, that judgment was so nigh at hand.

The Instrument of Judgment

was prepared and ready. In the first place, Shalmaneser, the king of Assyria came up against Hoshea, and reduced him to a tributary prince. But the king was found guilty of conspiracy with So, king of Egypt, against the Assyrian dominion. And thus he who was set to be a witness, and a light for God, became treacherous before the heathen who probably had more sense of honor than this man who professed to know God! Therefore Hoshea was made a close prisoner. "As with the prince so with the people;" Samaria was besieged three years. What these years of siege must have been to the famished inhabitants, who can tell? In the ninth year of Hoshea, the King of Assyria took Samaria." All the resistance of the people was in vain; God was against them. The king of Assyria "carried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in Halah, and in Habor, by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes."

It is a solemn parable, as well as a solemn history. When God's people imitate the practices of the world, enter into its spirit, seek its honors, and obey its precepts, they are nearing the point when they become its slaves. The writing of their condemnation stands over against the history of their captivity. "For so it was that the children of Israel had sinned against the Lord their God, which had brought them up out of the land of Egypt, from under the hand of Pharaoh, king of Egypt; and had feared other gods, and walked in the statutes of the heathen, whom the Lord cast out before the children of Israel." It is this terrible failure to recognize or to have respect to the honor of their God which strikes us so painfully in the history of Israel and Judah. But what about ourselves? As a Church, are we in the present day any better? We may not be guilty of rank outward idolatry, but who can deny that the opinion of the world weighs more with the generality of church members of all denominations than does the Word of God? The secret things which were not right, the images and groves, incense and idols have their counterpart in the externals of ritualism, the pride of rationalism, the carnality of materialism, the dark sin of spiritualism, which form the idolatry of so-called Christians in our day. And now, as then, God sends his prophets, but just as Israel of old would not hear but "hardened their necks like the necks of their fathers that did not believe in the Lord their God," so is it now.

The religionists of the day will not have a living, moving, acting, present God among them, anything which brings them face to face with him is put aside as vulgar, senseless, childish, antiquated, etc.; for will have "no God." Spiritualism had crept in, then as now, among the people; "they used divination and enchantments." Therefore the Lord was very angry with Israel, and removed them out of his sight." It was the punishment of Cain. "From thy face shall I be hid." (Gen. 4: 14.) And yet "God has not cast away his people whom he foreknew," the time shall yet come when "All Israel shall be saved." (Rom. 11: 2, 26.) But meanwhile Israel is under judgment;

A Sign to Every Generation

that God keeps his word of truth as well as his word of mercy, that he is a just and holy, as well as a merciful and loving God. And now the land that flowed with milk and honey was given over to strangers, the men of Babylon and of Assyria lived there instead of the children of Israel. They brought in their idolatry in its fulness, but God sent lions amongst them; and then they sought a teacher from among the captive Israelites who should teach them "the manner of the God of the land," putting Jehovah on a par with the gods of the nations! The priest from among the Israelites, who was sent on this errand, was not a man of power by the spirit of the Lord; he "taught them the fear of the Lord," and yet the people worshipped their own gods besides, and thus a mixed worship became general. They feared the Lord, but they served their own gods, there was no turning of the heart to the Lord, it was only an outward change in which they simply altered the form of their worship. And yet—was it worse or was it as bad as the same mixture in the lives of the children of God now? Alas! that the captivity of God's people for their sins is too often no blessing to those through whom they are carried away. If any of us are in captivity, in spirit, in body, in circumstances, let us see to it that we recognize the hand which binds us, and humble ourselves "under the mighty hand of God," that he may exalt us "in due time." (1. Pet. 5: 6.)

THE CYCLE IN DANIEL.

A Remarkable Astronomical Discovery for Which the Prophecies of Daniel Supplied the Clue.

ESSRS. Charles Scribner's Sons, of New York have just published a deeply interesting volume. It is the last work of the late Rev. Austin Phelps, D.D., L.L.D., who was for many years the President of Andover Theological Seminary, and the author of many learned treatises. This work, which is entitled My Note Book, was prepared just before the great scholar's death. "If I can only live," he wrote to a friend, "till this book is done, I shall be content to go." He did live to finish it, and the last letter he received was one from the publishers acknowledging the receipt of the manuscript. His famous daughter, Mrs. Elizabeth Stuart P. Ward has read the proofs, and added an introduction after his death, but found no necessity for making any changes in the book. As its name implies, the volume is fragmentary, containing the jottings and stray thoughts of years, but the fragments are gems of rare value, all the more precious because they are the last we shall ever have from the pen which has written so much and so well. Among "the fragments" are the following observations, which, coming as they do from so learned a man, are entitled to the attention of students of prophecy:

A service of very peculiar nature and not generally known, connects the books of our faith with the researches of astronomical science. It is well understood by experts in astronomy that which should harmonize certain intricate revolutions of the solar system, has been sought for, for centuries. At last, it was until recently, given up as being beyond the reach of human discovery. But within a few years, an eminent Swiss astronomer professes to have found the long-sought marvel of astronomical science. His researches have been submitted to three distinguished astronomers of the "Royal Academy of Sciences" in Paris. By them it has been pronounced accurate and of practical value.

The interesting fact about this astronomical discovery is that the discoverer was first led to suspect the existence of the cycle, by a study of the symbolical prophecies of Daniel. It is well known that the majority of the interpreters have found in those prophecies a period of 2300 solar years, as the measurement in the prophetic visions, of the time which should elapse between the age of Daniel and the end of the, so-called Times of the Gentiles. The Swiss astronomer—M. de Cheseaux, by name—is a devout believer in the Scriptures. In reading the symbolical predictions of Daniel, it occurred to him as a hypothesis that this period of twenty-three centuries might be the cycle so long despaired of by experts in astronomical science. On further investigation, by astronomical methods, he found that it was even so. The discovery led to that of other cycles, all involved in the prophetic computations, and by means of which he was able to solve between thirty and forty astronomical and geographical problems.

He suggests, plausibly, to say the least, the inquiry: "How happened it that a Hebrew prophet, twenty-three centuries in advance of scientific discovery, used in his timing of coming events in the far distant future?" If he had conversed with the most eminent astronomers of his age, he could not have learned it from them. They knew nothing of its existence. If he had been, himself, the most accomplished scientist of the century, he could not have discovered it. There were no astronomical instruments in existence by which the requisite observations could have been made. The famed astrology of Chaldaea of which he may have known something, knew nothing of it. For twenty-three centuries that ignorance of the learned world has continued, notwithstanding the immense advances in astronomical knowledge, and in the improvement of the instruments of the observatory. Yet all the while the mysterious and unknown cycle lay embedded in the symbolic prophecies of the Hebrew seer. How happened that? Not one only, but a system of co-ordinate cycles was made the groundwork of prophetic computations.

How Came that About?

The theory of the discoverer is, that a foreordained synchronism exists between the movements of the solar system and the developments of human history. The chronologies of the two are one. The mind which contrived the one foreordained the other. The clockwork of the material heavens and the clockwork of the history of man have been created and wound up by the same Being. So reasons the devout astronomer. Of course none but proficient in astronomical researches and proficient in the interpretation of symbolic prophecy can pronounce independently upon the value of the discoveries. But the conditions attending their announcement entitle them to the consideration of Biblical scholars. They place the hallowed books of our religion in very interesting relation to human science.

CHRIST OR FRIENDS?

In a professedly Christian land we do not realize the force of the words Jesus addressed to those who would be his disciples, "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me." But in India, converts often have to make that painful choice. Miss Christine Bell, who writes to The Church from Etawah, India, says;

"In the village of Utteporé a woman said to me, 'When I hear you speaking, anger will rise in my heart, because all you say is true; but, by the system of caste, we are bound down to remain Hindus;' and then her voice gave way in a flood of tears running down from her eyes. At a number of places, after having explained to the women that without Christ no sinner can be saved, one or another would come forward and say to me: 'Is it right to forsake father and mother, and every other relative, which will be the case if I become a Christian?' Sometimes I answer them by saying, 'I do not tell you to forsake your relatives, but to give up sinning against God, and to believe in his Son, Jesus Christ, to be saved.' But, they reply, 'when we become Christians, then our relatives will not suffer us to remain with them.' I tell them, 'Then you must leave them.' When addressing a number of women in the village of Allapore, a man who also listened to my address, said to me, 'All that you say is very true. I have read the New Testament myself, and I know that Jesus Christ is the true Saviour of this world, and I believe in him as my Saviour.' Then I asked him, 'Why do you not ask for baptism and confess Christ openly?' He answered by shaking his head and saying, 'I will call on his name and worship him.'

AN UNGRATEFUL PROTEGE.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for May 24. "Because ye have forsaken the Lord, he hath also forsaken you." II. Chron. 24: 20.

JOSEPH, my boy," said a dying man, when a lad of sixteen entered the room and stepped softly to his bedside, "I am dying, but I have kept hold of life to say something to you before I go. Promise me that you will pay attention and obey me; your whole future depends upon your doing so."

"I promise it, father," said the boy.

"It is about the Senator, and I must say it quickly for I am sinking. A long time ago, before you were born, I was living in Pennsylvania. I was a miner, and you have no idea what misery that means. It only brought us bare food and clothes, and there were times when it did not do that. There was no hope of anything better, for the boss was a hard man. He seemed more like a demon than a man, he was so cruel. I expected nothing else but to die of starvation some day in one of our strikes, or when I grew too old to work. I heard one day by chance that Mr. Fidelis was a great man out here and a good man, too. So I wrote to him and described my state. He replied quickly telling me that I should do well if I would come here, and he sent me the money to come. Well, I came and you know what a good time we have had. Plenty to eat and to wear, a good home and comfort. We owe it all to Mr. Fidelis. Oh! I wish I had told you all this before. Oh! I am sinking and the story is not half told. Doctor, try to keep me here a little while longer."

A restorative was administered and then the dying man continued:

"You know how Mr. Fidelis has got on. When he was Governor he looked after my interests and put several good things in my way. He is Senator now, you know, and he could do much for you. If he knew I was dying he would be here, but he could not come from Washington soon enough. You must write to him when I am dead and tell him I died praising him for all he has done for us. Now, Joseph, you must be true to him and he will help you. He needs friends, and a bright intelligent young man can serve his interests. He has a lot of enemies who plot against him while he is away at Washington. You must stand up for him. They want to get his place, but you must do all you can to hold his friends together, and when you are a man you must make his interest your first concern. He has been my best friend and he will be yours, too. I am sorry to say I have not been faithful to him always. His enemies are jolly fellows and I was fond of going with them. It was awfully mean of me, but it can't be helped now. He has forgiven me, and you must do better than I have done." His voice had sunk to a whisper, he had just strength to say, hoarsely, "Promise me, Joseph," and as the boy's promise was uttered, his eyes closed in death.

Joseph wrote to the Senator, as he had promised, and the answer came promptly. Mr. Fidelis would be a friend to the boy. He would see that he was well-educated; if he needed money he must write to Washington; when he grew up money would be forth coming to establish him in business, or if he preferred politics the Senator would give him a start. The only condition was that the boy should never drink strong liquor, should never gamble, and should never have anything to do with the opposition political party. All these things the boy willingly promised and congratulated himself on his prospects.

There seems an incurable perversity in human nature leading it to seek forbidden things merely because they are forbidden. Joseph Cohen was afflicted in that way. His life for several years was a continuous falling away from the rules the Senator had laid down. Time and again he got into trouble and had to confess and beg pardon. Then he would sign the pledge and promise never to touch the dice nor make a bet again. But as soon as the Senator had paid his debts and given him a new start, he began to fall back into his old ways. The boy seemed incorrigible. The Senator bore patiently with him, hoping that he would outgrow his faults.

The time came when Joseph was through school and college and then the Senator kept his promise of establishing him in business in his native town. "My term expires two years from now," he said, when Joseph was thanking him effusively for all his kindness, "you are of age now and you can help me. Those fellows will prevent my getting another term if they can. Do your best for me while I am away; look after the primaries and keep me informed of what is going on. If you want more money in your business, send to me. Remember I am your friend."

A man's enemies never do him so much harm as false friends can do. Senator Fidelis would have been re-elected if it had not been for an ambitious man in his own party. This man began by dropping hints that the Senator was getting too old for his position. A more active, vigorous man would do better for the State. A more showy, hospitable man would represent the State better in Washington. He contended that on several occasions the Senator had been remiss of late. The still-hunt went on unobservedly, but it was effective. When the Legislature was elected that Fall it was evident that the Senator had but a bare chance of being re-elected.

Strange to say, Joseph Cohen was a warm friend of the man who was trying to supplant the Senator. He was so active against Mr. Fidelis that he neglected his business and financial difficulties pressed upon him. The new man promised that if he was elected Senator, Joseph would have a good place, so Joseph worked still harder and looked forward to the election as the time when he would be quit of business and would have an easy time in some office in Washington. He did not write to the Senator now, though he wished he could have the help that Mr. Fidelis used to give him with his payments. He was ashamed to write. He knew that Mr. Fidelis knew of his treachery, for the Senator sent one friend after another to him to appeal to him, to remind him of his obligations and to remonstrate with him. Joseph treated these men very curtly as a man does who knows he is doing a mean thing and does not want to be reminded of it.

At last election came. Mr. Fidelis was rejected and relegated to private life. Joseph pressed his claims on the new Senator, but the answers were vague. Time would be needed to get familiar with the duties; there was no office vacant, and similar excuses. Joseph's creditors were pressing and he knew not what to do. If he could have time, if he could "tide over a few months" he would come out all right. In a bad crisis he offered a note to stave off the sheriff and one night in the privacy of his office he forged an endorsement on it.

Yes, it has come to this. He was a criminal. That was what his forsaking of his friend and his father's friend had brought him to. There was no help now. He would have gone to Mr. Fidelis and confessed everything, but the ex-Senator had given him up. He was in Europe now travelling for his health and there was no one from whom Joseph could get help. He resolved to abscond before the forged note came to maturity, but detection came before that and he was arrested and convicted and sent to the penitentiary for a long term.

COLLEGE BOAT-RACES.

WE will have this coming season, as last summer, contests of oar between college and college. Some of the religious newspapers condemn all such rivalries, enlarging upon the strained wrists, broken blood-vessels, and barbaric animalism of men who ought to have been rowing their race with the Binomial Theorem for one oar, and "Kame's Elements of Criticism" for the other.

For the most part, we have sympathized with the boys, and confess that at our hotel we kept careful watch of the bulletin, to see whose boat came in ahead. We are disposed to applaud anything that will give our young men muscular development. Students have such a tendency to lounge, and mope, and chew, and eat almond-nuts at midnight, and read novels after they go to bed, the candlestick set up on Webster's Dictionary or the Bible, that we prize anything that makes them cautious about their health, as they must be if they would enter the list of contestants. How many of our country boys enter the Freshman class of college in robust health, which lasts them about a twelve month; then in the Sophomore they lose their liver; in the Junior they lose their stomach; in the Senior they lose their back-bone; graduating skeletons, and fitter for an anatomical museum than the bar or pulpit.

"Midnight oil," so much eulogized, is the poorest kind of kerosene. Where hard study kills one student, bad habits kill a hundred. Kirk White, while at Cambridge, wrote beautiful hymns, but if he had gone to bed at ten at night instead of three o'clock the next morning, he would have been of more service to the world, and a healthier example to all collegians. Much of the learning of the day is morbid, and much of the religion bilious. We want, first of all, a clean heart, and next a strong stomach. Falling from grace is often chargeable to derangement of gastric juices. Oar and bat may become salutary weapons.

But after all there may be excesses in the summer boat-races. A student with a stout arm and great girth, and a full chest, and nothing else, is not at all admirable. Mind and body need to be driven tandem, the body for the wheel horse and the intellect the leader. We want what is proposed in some directions, a grand collegiate, literary race. Let the mental contest be on the same week with the muscular. Let Yale and Harvard and Williams and Princeton and Dartmouth see who has the champion among scholars. Let there be a Waterloo in Belle-Lettres and Rhetoric and Mathematics and Philosophy. Let us see which of the students are most worthy to wear the belt. About twelve o'clock at noon, let the literary flotilla start prow and prow, oar-lock and oar-lock. Let Helicon empty its waters to swell the River of Knowledge on which they row. Right foot on right rib of the boat, and left foot on the left rib,—bend into it my hearties, bend!—and our craft comes out four lengths ahead.

Give the brain a chance as well as the arm. Do not let the animal eat up the soul. Let the body be the well-fashioned hulk, and the mind the white sails, all hoisted, everything, from flying jib to spanker, bearing on toward the harbor of glorious achievement. When that boat starts, we want to be there to cheer, and after sun-down, help fill the air with sky-rockets.

SLOVENS.

IT is a fact that some ladies, who in the street and in the parlor are attractive in appearance, come down to breakfast in what is called deshabelle. Our opinion is that the whole family ought to look well in the morning. It is important that the calico and the breakfast dress be rightly adjusted as well as the afternoon silk and the basque. It takes but little longer and it pays well. The children of the household ought to understand that whatever can be done by brush, and mirror, and ribbon, should be done at the start of the day. The first hour of the morning decides whether our children shall be gentlemen and ladies, or boors and slovens. But the younger members of the family will not observe domestic order if the father and mother look like a "fright." Parents are the mirror by which their children dress.

AUDIENCES.

AN eminent lecturer declares that all audiences are about alike to him. He enters at eight o'clock the public hall, and finds a circle of humanity coiled around him just like the one he saw in some other hall on the previous night. Our experience is different. We find no two audiences alike. Each one is as different from all the others as one man's face varies from another's physiognomy. Some audiences are dull. In that village we find poor schools or stupid churches or unenterprising newspapers. Everything is profoundly silent save as a cough or a sneeze interrupts one. The stolidity of the assembly reacts upon the lecturer. While you are speaking you look at your watch. You begin to measure off your lecture with less interest than the merchant measures a yard of cassimere. You say to yourself, "Half through!" "Three-fourths through!" "Five minutes more and I may quit!" And you close your manuscript, shake hands with the treasurer, and go out. At another place the audience beam upon you as you enter. Everybody seems to say, "Welcome to our town! We are all waiting for you. Now do your best. If you have any wisdom or wit, fling it over this way." Your smallest joke goes off like a pack of Fourth of July fire-crackers. You are amazed to see how people take things. Your poorest lecture catches enthusiasm from the good-natured audience. You feel as if you were in your own parlor talking with a group of college chums. The hour-and-a-half seems to you only like twenty minutes, and after shaking hands with men, women and children, you are so well pleased, that the commercial part of your engagement seems most insignificant. You got your pay before you came to the peroration. Let audiences know that oft-times they are responsible for the stupidity of a speaker. The attempt to build a fire among green wood makes a smoke, but no blaze.

BRIEF NOTES.

The American Sunday School Union celebrated its sixty-seventh anniversary at East Orange, N. J., on Sunday last.

General Booth, of the Salvation Army, inherits $350,000 under the will of a lady who died recently in Glasgow.

The total amount received by the New York Hospital Saturday and Sunday Fund during 1890 and 1891 was $58,342.23. Of this the amount received from the churches was $27,619.70.

Rev. Thomas J. Conant, who died a few days ago in Brooklyn, N. Y., was one of the ablest American Biblical scholars and linguists. He took part in the preparation of the Revised Version of the Bible.

Dr. Henry J. Van Dyke, pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, has been elected Professor of Systematic Theology in the Union Theological Seminary, New York. His portrait and life appeared in this journal on May 21, 1890.

Rev. George W. Bothwell, D.D., whose critical condition was mentioned in this column last week, died on May 3. An autopsy showed that the cork, the accidental swallowing of which caused his death, had lodged in the windpipe, and effectually shut out the air from the left lung.

At the recent annual meeting in Washington, of the American Tract Society, it was stated that the receipts for the year were, in round numbers, $305,000. The Society has issued, in the sixty-six years of its existence, 7,585 distinct publications in this country and 4,593 in foreign countries.

A report showing remarkable progress has been issued by the Baptist Church of Havana, Cuba. At its organization in January, 1886, it had only three members. It has added since then by baptism, 1966 members, has organized six new churches, 21 mission stations, and has sent out seventeen mission preachers. The pastor, Rev. A. J. Diaz, speaks most hopefully of the prospects.

The Central Union Mission of Washington, D. C., has commenced its usual summer work with the Gospel Wagon, a picture of which appeared in this journal a year ago. The zealous consecrated workers who give time and labor to this mission, and have made it the most effective mission in the whole country, ask the prayers of our readers that God will continue to bless this wagon enterprise as he has done in the past.

Mr. George W. Wheeler, of the Central Union Mission, Washington, D. C., desires to make acknowledgment of the receipt of the following additional sums received by him for Mr. J. McLain Brown, Missionary at Tokio, Japan, a sketch of whose life and work appeared in this journal on January 28, 1891: "The Lord's Tenth," $2.75; W. R. Aitken, $5.; J. G. Jackson, $1.; "Well Wisher," $33.; Riehle Bros., $5.; Lottie Verbrugger, $13.; Mrs. K. K. Centerville, $1.

The Rev. Mr. Mackay writing from the Island of Formosa, on the South East coast of China, describes an extraordinary turning from idols on the part of the people of Ka-le-oan, a village, or rather a congeries of villages, recently visited by him. A native assistant had commenced work in that district, and when Mr. Mackay went to see what progress had been made, he found many of the people having a clear idea of Gospel truth. Nearly 500 idolators cleaned their houses of idols in his presence. They also gave a temple built for idols as a house of worship for the living and true God.

Rev. J. S. Murrow, who has been a missionary among the Indians for nearly thirty-four years, writes us that he has returned from a visit to Lone Wolf's Camp, where the readers of this journal helped Rev. W. F. ReQua to establish a mission. Mr. Murrow reports that the mission is now flourishing under the charge of Mr. and Mrs. W. D. Lancaster, and that it is worthy of continued confidence and support. The Kiowa Indians heartily appreciate the mission and would send four times the number of children to the school that are now there, if there was room to receive them. Mr. Lancaster's address is Quartz P. O., Greer Co., Ind. Ter.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Old World Labor Troubles—War Cloud in South Africa—Mediation Proposed in Chili—The New Orleans Grand Jury's Report—Millionaire Carnegie's Latest Benefaction—Ex-Minister Taft Dying—General News.

TIRED of Slaughtering each other, the Chilians are now casting about for some power to act as a mediator. The United States, France and Brazil have offered their services in restoring peace. There is a strong probability that this offer, by the three greatest republics in the world, will be availed of in the near future. The insurgent leaders and the Balmacedists have been in vain negotiation, the former insisting that the President should resign, disband his army, and allow a new President to be elected. This he positively refused to do. Up to the present time the destruction of life and property has been appalling. Chili's fine navy has now been reduced to three vessels on the government side and four cruisers on the insurgent side; several of the principal trading ports are almost in ruins. Twenty years will hardly repair the loss to commerce. The towns of Pisagua, Zapiga, San Francisco, Huaraz, Pozo Almonte, and Iquique, are all more or less damaged by the fighting that has taken place. Iquique is practically a ruin.

Europe's Capitals are again in the Sway of the "grip," and the disease is showing no respect of persons. Among those who are serious sufferers are Prince Hatzfeld, Prince Christian, the Duchess of Marlborough, a number of the members of the British Parliament and a host of officials in the larger cities.

One of best known of American Statesmen and jurists, Hon. Alfonso Taft, of Ohio, lies dying at Los Angeles, Cal., whither he had gone from his home in Ohio in search of health. Judge Taft was born in Vermont, in 1810, on a small farm. He received a common-school education, but so energetic and studious was the lad that he pushed himself forward, and at sixteen was teaching the district school, when not needed upon the farm. At nineteen he entered Yale College, graduating at twenty-three and afterwards filling a position as tutor there. He studied law and at twenty-eight was admitted to the bar. Moving to Ohio, his abilities secured prompt recognition and he rose rapidly, being twice elected to the bench and holding other important offices in that State. In March, 1876, President Grant nominated him as Secretary of War and he afterwards held the post of Attorney-General. President Arthur sent him successively as Minister to Austria and Russia. Since 1885, he has been practically out of politics and in failing health. A portrait of Judge Taft is given in this column.

The New Orleans Grand Jury has made its official report on the recent troubles, including the shooting of the Chief of Police Hennessy and the lynching of the Italian members of the Mafia. They refused to find an indictment against the men concerned in the lynching at the Parish prison and declared that the lynching was the spontaneous act of the people and that to indict and attempt to try the members of the mob would be unwise; that the uprising of the people justified the tragedy, whereby the Italian Mafists lost their lives. They presented indictments, however, against Detective O'Malley and five of his associates for attempting to bribe the jury that tried the Italians. The report takes occasion to speak very seriously of the evils existing under the present Immigration laws, by which hundreds of Italian criminals find their way to New Orleans. It will be important to note the effect of this report by the Grand Jury of New Orleans on the somewhat complicated question now at issue between our Government and that of Italy. Signor Corte, Italy's Consul at New Orleans, has written to the authorities there, asserting that nearly all the men lynched were Italian citizens, and that full reparation will be demanded.

An Event in the Musical World, Worthy of mention, was the public opening of the new Music Hall founded by the millionaire, Mr. Andrew Carnegie, in New York City, on Tuesday, May 5. The hall is situated at 57th Street and 7th Avenue, and was crowded with noted persons.

Bishop Potter, of New York pronounced an oration, and a chorus of five hundred voices sang "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," followed by a classical programme. Mr. Carnegie's purpose in founding this institution, as in the case of the Pittsburg Library which he endowed not long ago, is one of pure public interest. He wishes to popularize the great oratorios of the old masters and the best classical music of a religious character—in other words to counteract by pure music, rendered by the best talent in the land, the tendency to cheap, meretricious music, so common in public entertainments. Among the distinguished people present at the opening, were Mrs. and the Misses Blaine, daughters of the Secretary of State, J. D. Rockefeller, Elliot. F. Shepard, Isaac M. Seligman, James Stokes and others. At the festival, which began with the opening and continued several days, the most famous American and European singers contributed to the entertainment of the audience. We publish in this column, a portrait of Mr. Carnegie, the greatest iron-master in the United States. From a poor boy, working as messenger in a telegraph office at $3 per week, he arose by strict integrity and industry to be one of the most eminent men and Christian philanthropists of the present day.

Twenty Thousand Boers are Preparing to emigrate from the Dutch Republic in the Transvaal, South Africa, to Mashonaland, with the avowed intention of founding a great Northern Republic there. This movement is undertaken in the face of the protests of England and the warning of President Kruger, of the Boer Republic, who officially ordered the new "trek" to be stopped. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last week referred to the growing cloud of war between the British and Dutch in South Africa, and the latest despatches show that the trouble is rapidly growing more serious. The British are sending troops forward to Mashonaland to oppose the movement and a collision is daily expected.

The Week has been one of Uneasiness, if not of terror, in many places of the Old World. Following on the May-day demonstrations by the labor organizations and the Socialists, and the fatal riots in Belgium and France, comes the news of a panic in Rome, arising from the popular discontent. At Ponto Pantaleo, an explosion occurred, destroying the barracks and stables of the armed police. The disturbances have unsettled business and thrown thousands of workmen out of employment. There are indications that the country is on the verge of revolution. The troubles have been fomented by the adherents of ex-Premier Crispi, who are determined on the overthrow of the Rudini Ministry and who are said to have paid certain agitators. A number of arrests have been made.

Before He Finally Retires from Public Life, Senator Edmunds says he intends to make a strong effort, at the opening of the next session of Congress, to secure a report on the bill establishing a National University. It is not to be a college, but a great non-sectarian institution, which shall make plain the narrowness of the Papal power and combat the efforts that are being made by Catholics everywhere in this country to combine Church and State. He believes that a strong support can be had for the bill in Congress, and that the country is ripe for it.

Arctic Exploration Seems to Have Been Shorn of much of its terrors, for it is proposed by Bowdoin College to send out a party of students, during the coming summer, on an expedition to Labrador. Professor Leslie will be in command, and the main object will be the collection of birds, fish and lichens. A schooner has been chartered and the party will sail at the end of the college term. One section will endeavor to penetrate to the great Falls of Labrador, which no white man has ever seen, and which are said to be the grandest in the world, with a sheer fall of over 2,000 feet.

Ever since the Great Baring Failure, the bankers of England, Germany and France have been timid on credits and anxious to increase their stock of gold. The result has been that in a majority of cases where American bills were due in Europe, for months past, gold was demanded and sent. In advance of the new tariff going into operation, American importers bought heavily last fall, and thus far they have shipped over $28,000,000 gold in payment. There is no distrust abroad regarding our bankers, and as there is an abundant supply of gold, merchants and bankers here regard the situation with complacency.

A Young Man, who has Risen from Humble circumstances to considerable distinction and who is at present fulfilling a very important mission, is J. Stanley Brown. He was lately detailed by the Government to investigate and report upon the seal fisheries of Alaska. The state ment has been made by some of the largest seal traders that unless speedy action is taken to prevent the indiscriminate slaughter of seals in Alaskan waters, these fisheries will soon be exhausted and the supply will cease. It will be Mr. Brown's duty to ascertain the extent of the depredations by foreign sealers and to submit a method of checking them. Mr. Brown (whose portrait is given above), was the son of a working carpenter in Washington, D. C. He studied law and was appointed as private Secretary to the late President Garfield, to whom his rare fidelity untiring energy and Christian character greatly endeared him. Three years ago, he married Miss Mollie Garfield. Lately he has been engaged in investigations connected with the Geological survey.

THE CENTRE OF THE TARGET.

A NEW SERMON, PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

A Cry of Distress—A Shout of Deliverance—How the Rescue Came—A Lesson that May be Useful to Others—I. The First Exercise of Faith—Should be Toward Jesus, Not Toward the Blessing—Faith in the Promiser Leads to Faith in the Promise—The Wisest and Best Way—II. Faith in Reference to Other Blessings—Must be in Connection With Jesus—The Only Hope for Sanctification.

"Let Israel hope in the Lord: for with the Lord there is mercy, and with him is plenteous redemption."—Psalm 130: 7.

WHEN he penned this psalm, the writer, David, was in deep distress, if not of circumstances, yet of conscience. He constantly mentions iniquities and begs forgiveness. He felt like a shipwrecked mariner, carried overboard into the raging sea. Thus he reviews the situation—"Out of the depths have I cried unto thee, O Lord." Yet he lived to tell the tale of deliverance. His prayer from among the waves was a memory worth preserving, and he does preserve it. The mercy of God to him he weaves into a song for us; and in this our text is found.

Two things the wretched sufferer tells us. First, that, as God delivered him from the power of sin, so he will deliver all his praying, wrestling, believing people. That is the last verse of the psalm—"He shall redeem Israel from all his iniquities." The argument is—He delivered me. What am I more than others? The gracious Lord who saved me will save all those who call upon him in truth. He delivered me, though laden with iniquities, and his pardoning mercy is unfailing; and therefore he can and will rescue others from their uttermost distresses. This is a good line of reasoning, for the Lord's ways are constant, and he will do for all believers what he has done for one.

May we learn well the lesson of this psalm! When we meet with a man who has been in special trouble, and he has escaped from it, we are anxious to know how it came to pass, in order that, if we are cast into similar trial, we also may resort to

The Same Door of Hope.

You meet with a man who has long been sorely afflicted, and to find him full of joy at his relief is a pleasure and a personal comfort. You heard him lamenting for years, and now you hear him rejoicing; and this excites your wonder and your hope. It is as though a cripple saw another lame man leaping and running. He very naturally enquires, "How is this?" The other day you saw a man blind, begging in the street, and now he has an eye bright as that which sparkles on the face of a gazelle, and you cry in astonishment—"Tell me who was the oculist that operated on your eyes; for I may be in a like case, and I should be glad to know where to go." Here, then, we have a gate of knowledge opened before us. The Psalmist found salvation and deliverance in going direct to God, and trusting in him; let us follow his example.

I. The chief point to which I desire you to give earnest heed is this: in obtaining Gospel blessings must be towards God in Christ Jesus, and not towards the blessings themselves. "Let Israel hope in the Lord." To me this has the look of a very encouraging truth: the sinner is not to hasten with his first thoughts to the mercy he wants, nor even to the mercy of God to which he may look; but he is to go to the Lord Jesus Christ himself, as the Lord of mercy, and fountain of redemption. The first exercise of our faith is to deal immediately with the Lord God as he meets us in the person of our Lord Jesus.

The First Exercise of Faith

Here let me say that this is the most natural order which faith can follow. Look first to the Giver, and then to the gift. Look for the Helper, and then for the help. Do not be saying, "I long to be forgiven. I labor to believe that I am forgiven. I desire to be saved. I want to know that I am saved." This is looking for the fruit, when you have need first to find the tree.

Your First Business,

as a seeker of salvation, is to believe in Jesus Christ, that is, to trust yourself with the divine Saviour. The natural order is, believe in the Promiser, and then you will believe in the promise. You cannot help believing the promise when once you believe in the Promiser. If you find a merchant to be an eminently upright and substantial man, you do not hesitate to take his cheques; in fact, you would be glad to have your purse full of them. Faith prizes the promises of her faithful God, and calls them precious.

Apply this rule, and deal with heavenly things in due order. You seek pardon. Do not look continually at this priceless mercy at first, but look to the pardoning God. You will soon believe in forgiveness if you cause the first exercise of your faith to refer to the Forgiver, even Jesus Christ himself. When you have believed in him, as able to say, "Thy sins be forgiven thee," then you will believe in sins being forgiven. This is the natural order of things. So also, if you desire to believe for salvation, and to be assured that you have it, or may have it at once, the simple course——is to believe in the Saviour. To be healed, you believe first in the Healer. When you have believed in the Saviour, then you will believe in the salvation. If you know that Jesus can save you, if you desire to be saved, you will trust him to save you. You will be readily able to believe that you can be saved when you trust in Jesus as able to save to the uttermost. Poor trembling heart, do not look at the blessing, and say, "Alas, it is too great!" Look at the Saviour himself!

The Natural Course

To this I would add, this is the necessary order. It must be so: the Saviour first, and then the salvation. Begin at the Cross. See how Jesus puts it:—"Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." He does not first say, "Take my yoke upon you;" but first "Come unto me." He first gives you rest, and then afterwards we find it; but we begin with coming to him. First Christ, and then his yoke. First Christ, and then rest. Do not ask for rest first, and then say, "I will come to Christ afterwards." This is an impossible order. Do not even say, "I must get a broken heart, and then come to Christ." No, come to Christ for a broken heart. I preach to you a Saviour who wants nothing of you, but who is ready to begin with you at the beginning, just where you are, in all your unworthiness and ill desert—in all your dirt, ravity and vileness.

The Easiest Course.

Observe, also, that, as it is the natural order, and the necessary order, so it is evidently the easiest order. Sometimes it seems to a burdened heart to be more than difficult to believe in the pardon of innumerable sins: it appears impossible. Guilty one, do not try to believe in pardon in the abstract, but believe in Jesus the Sacrifice and Saviour, who has once for all appeared to put away sin. Believe in the divine Substitute, and then you will believe that the forgiveness of your sins is a thing provided for by him. Do not even say, "I can never be sanctified; such a wretched sinner as I am could never be made into a saint." Do not try to believe in sanctification, but rely upon the boundless power of Jesus to "make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well pleasing in his sight." For all parts of salvation, hope in the Lord, and look to his hand for the working thereof.

This is the way even to God himself, and the only way which our human feet can tread. Consider well who Christ was, and what he has done, and then you will conclude that he can save even you. By looking to him you will be saved; and what is easier than to look? To hope in God is a far more simple matter than to search for the signs and evidences in yourself, or to labor to force yourself up into certain states of mind. Answer the question, "Will he save me?" by looking to see what kind of a Saviour Jesus is; and when you perceive the glory of his person, the perfection of his obedience, and the merit of his blood, you will be convinced that you may safely trust in him according to his command; for he commands you to believe. Jesus declares, "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." Let us come at once, for it is the nearest and best road to peace.

To come first of all to God in Christ Jesus is the wisest course. You are too bewildered to know which blessing to seek, therefore seek Jesus himself, and he will be unto you wisdom. It is easier to come to the Cross than to separate blessings which come of it.

Take the Straight Road.

I believe that, in every case wherein the soul finds peace, that is the actual order. We may go about after pardon, renewal, and holiness, but we find no rest unto our souls while hunting for these. As a matter of fact, we look unto him and are lightened, and not by any other means. If, by aiming even at repentance, we are taken off from the Lord, we are taken off the right road. It is possible even to look to faith in such a manner as to forget the object of faith. It is not my hand, but what my hand grasps that saves me when I lay hold on Christ. It is not my eye, but what my eye sees which saves me when I look to Jesus. In very deed no heart can find salvation in that which comes forth from itself: its hope lies alone in the Lord, to whom it must trust for everything. Beware of trusting to an anchor which lies on your own deck, or to a confidence which depends in the least degree on yourself. "Let Israel hope in the Lord."

This, then, is my message to every man who desires salvation, "Let Israel hope in the Lord: for with the Lord there is mercy, and with him is plenteous redemption." I would also have preachers learn a lesson from the point I have been driving at. Let them not so much preach sinners to Christ as Christ to sinners. I am persuaded that a full and clear declaration of what Jesus is, as to his person, offices, character, work, and authority, would do more to produce faith than all our exhortations. "Who-soever believeth hath everlasting life;" but how shall they believe unless they hear of him?

A Woman Converted.

The very best topic for the immediate conversion of men is Christ crucified—the doctrine that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them. I know one that came in here full of evil, living an unchaste life, and the text was, "He that believeth in him hath everlasting life." There would not seem to be anything about the sermon to convince of sin, but the charming mercy of God won that heart, and that heart, being won by love, learned at once to hate evil, and to serve the Lord Jesus in all that is pure, and lovely, and of good report. There sat in this very house, not long ago, side by side with one who still is in the service of Satan, a woman who had not attended the house of God for years. Nothing was heard but the simple proclamation of the grace of God in Christ Jesus to the guilty, but she was shot down by the side of her companion: the thought of the amazing mercy and infinite love of God, in giving his Son to die, touched her heart, and she began to weep, whereat her companion upbraided her; but she answered, "I have found mercy." That was enough for her: she made no other excuse for her emotion. I pray that like effects will follow this sermon. I bid you hope in the Lord.

II. Another form of the same truth now invites our attention—all exercises of

must be in connection with the Lord. I began with our first exercise of faith, but I would not end there. As the stars called "the Pointers" always point to the pole-star, so must our faith ever look to God in Christ Jesus. Having begun with Jesus, our faith must not look elsewhere. Let Israel always hope in the Lord, for with him is what she still requires. What want you to-night, dear friend? Ask, and you shall receive; but ask only of the Lord. Knock, but knock still at the same door. Plead, but when you are pleading, still plead the name of Jesus. Hope still in the Lord, and never have any hope in yourself, for that would be a fruitless, groundless, rootless, sapless hope. You are still to find mercy and redemption in the Lord alone.

I am afraid that sometimes we seek mercies apart from God the Giver, or apart from Christ, the channel of their bestowal; and this is always ill of us. Avoid such dangerous error. I read in the papers, frequently, allusions to "Providence." I know what I intend by Providence; but I do not know what the newspapers mean by it. I fear it is only a convenient phrase, a conventional expression, which is not to be too carefully examined. They do not mean a living, foreseeing, providing, working Personality: that would be too much like religion. They admit a certain something, "a power which makes for righteousness," a nonentity called "Providence." I have too often heard Christian people talk about

Thanking Providence.

What is it that you thank? Do you mean, "thank God?" If so, say it boldly! It is God that provides. God arranges, God overrules, God worketh out his gracious designs. Again, how often do we hear of "Nature" doing this, and "Nature" being that, and "Nature" producing the other! What do you mean? We do not erect an altar, and inscribe it to the unknown God. We know the Lord, and are known of him, and therefore we would speak of him as our hope, our trust, our joy. We know no providence apart from Jehovah-Jireh, the God who foresees and provides.

Now dear brother, do you want mercy? In your prayers for pardoning mercy, quote the Saviour's sacrifice. Do you want sparing mercy? Mention him whom God did not spare in the great atoning day. Do you want restoring mercy? Plead him whom God brought again from the dead. Do you want to behold the light of Jehovah's countenance? Plead him who said, "Why hast thou forsaken me?" In hoping for mercy, set the eye of your hope upon the Lord Jesus, and let no mercy be hoped for by you apart from him. I would bind you, if I could, to the Cross as your one hope.

So it is with "plenteous redemption." What a grand utterance that is—

"Plenteous Redemption!"

I would like to dwell upon it. Is there not rare music in the sound? It means plenteous forgiveness for plenteous sin, through a price paid, a ransom given. In Christ only can you find this. "With him is plenteous redemption." Do not dream of finding redemption in ordinances, in prayers, in tears, or in anything but the life and death and person of the Son of God. "With him is plenteous redemption." A great price he has paid, and therefore a great debt is blotted out. Great offences are forgiven, but only through the precious blood of our adorable Redeemer.

"Plenteous redemption." Why, that means deliverance from the bondage of many lusts, freedom from the thralldom of strong passions, a ransom of captives from fierce taskmasters. My God, I long to be so delivered, and redeemed, and there is with thee all grace and power, and provision for plenteous deliverance by redemption; but this is found in Christ alone, I charge you, my hearers, do not look for escape from the slavery of sin apart from the redemption of Christ. Do not expect to overcome the smallest sin except by the blood of the Lamb. There is nothing, I believe, more deceiving than the notion of the unregenerate heart that is seeking after holiness, though it takes no thought of the merit of Jesus Christ.

"Plenteous redemption" includes in its range of meaning great growth in grace, abounding usefulness, high spirituality, and perfect preparedness for heaven: for all these we must hope in the Lord, for they are with him. Never think to have redemption in the least or in the highest degree apart from your hope in the Lord—your trusting in Christ Jesus.

The pith and marrow of what I have said is this: hope distinctly in the Lord. There are many stars, but let one alone of all the train be the object of your believing eye. Lay the foundation of your hope in the Lord; go on building up your comfort in the Lord Jesus; and in him bring forth the topstone. Begin with Christ, and end with Christ. As Christ grows more to you, take care that self grows less and less. If your Christianity puffs you up, it is not Christ's Christianity. God will always help us while we are weak. When we are strong: what shall I say? Then are we weak, and have need to fear, for we are being lifted up already, or we should not count ourselves strong—poor, puny creatures that we are! God will always bless us as long as we confess our dependence upon his blessing. He will always fill us as long as we are empty. He will always feed us as long as we are hungry. He will be your all in all so long as you are nothing. But the moment you boast in yourself, and say, "I am rich, and increased in goods, and have need of nothing," you will be left to learn that you are naked, and poor, and miserable. The poorest, weakest, saddest among us may hope in the Lord, for he can do all things: wherefore, let us end our meeting with each one of us hoping in the Lord, and let us continue in our faith in "the God of hope," till we receive the heaven we hope for through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

SUDDEN DEATH OF A PHILANTHROPIST.

Mr. Charles Pratt's Gift to the Cause of Education in Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEATH has claimed one of Brooklyn's best known citizens. Mr. Charles Pratt, the millionaire founder of the Pratt Institute and the President of the Adelphi Academy expired suddenly in his office in New York, on May 4th. He was sixty-one years of age. The son of a poor cabinet-maker, he was early set to earn his own living. He earned his first dollar as a machinist in his native town of Watertown, Mass. When he was seventeen years old he went to Boston. There he became impressed with the disadvantages of being without an education, so he went to Wilbraham Academy for a year, and managed to live on a dollar a week while he studied. At the end of the year he obtained employment in an oil and paint house in Boston. From that time his success was uninterrupted. In 1857 he moved to New York and became junior partner in a firm of oil refiners. Later he went into business for himself in Brooklyn, and accumulated a fortune, which at the time of his death, was estimated at twenty million dollars. Mindful of his own early difficulties, he endeavored to give aid to young people who were struggling. He contributed largely to the founding of the Adelphi Academy, and subsequently built and endowed the Pratt Institute at an expense of a million dollars. There an education academical and technical is provided for about two thousand pupils at a low cost to each. It is estimated that Mr. Pratt's expenditure on this institution and the Adelphi, exceeded two million dollars. Beside this he gave largely to religious funds. He was a member of the Emmanuel Baptist Church, toward the building of which he gave $150,000.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Gladstone as a Correspondent.*

IT was perhaps a combination of universal sympathy and receptiveness, with the kindly instincts of a naturally courteous heart, that led the great statesman in his retirement to spare a daily interval from his congenial tasks in order to reply personally to the letters of his numerous correspondents, many of whom inconsiderately intruded upon him without the slightest justification. His critics have often made themselves merry over his voluminous mail; for, of course, many of those who received from him a letter or a post card took care to make the world acquainted with their good luck. But there have been few men whose casual utterances would better bear repeating, and better stand the brunt of ridicule, than Mr. Gladstone. He is ever sensible: ever in earnest; ever simple and single-minded. These qualities have been marked and esteemed by the masses. Thus, in his home at Hawarden, affectionately tended by his wife and children, varying his occupation between a Greek commentary and the felling of a doomed tree on his estate, watching the political world from afar and occasionally reminded of it more nearly by an incursion of Liberal interviewers from the neighboring centres of industry, he learned to forget the sting of his great defeats and to grow steadily in the heart's affection of his fellow-countrymen.

His Attitude toward Russia.

Mr. Gladstone was instant, in season and out of season (1877-78), against the idea of going to war with Russia; and it is certain that his solemn utterances did as much as anything else to avert that calamity. In a letter to a meeting of workmen at Liverpool, he wrote: "We are for the interests of Europe, but let Europe, and not our Indian army, look after its own interests. I, for one, will not willingly go into war till I know what it is about. If what the government mean is to set Turkey up again, in God's name let them say so, and we shall know how to deal with them. As for myself, I hope to oppose it to the very end; and even I may live to see the day when its unexampled folly will be looked back upon with a unanimity of grief and amazement."

His Egyptian Policy a Mistake.

Never was a statesman so beleaguered as was Mr. Gladstone, from the time when he advised the abandonment of the Soudan to the moment when he forwarded his resignation to Her Majesty on the 8th of June, 1885. Desperate as were the Egyptian troubles that ensued, they were but a small portion of the burden which the harrassed Premier had to bear. The interval was also marked by a severe struggle on the question of Parliamentary reform, by a conflict, once threatening to become desperate, with the House of Lords, by such strained relations with the Russian Empire as seemed certain to end in war, and by an opposition which was not less unscrupulous in method than it was factious in spirit.

Mr. Gladstone has, since that date, made the melancholy confession that his Egyptian policy was a mistake. It was one that was left to him as a legacy by the preceding government; it was approved by the bulk of his supporters and clamored for by his opponents; it unquestionably had the support of the country; but to those who observed him closely, it was obvious that the Prime Minister was making a reluctant surrender of his will and of his better judgment to the popular current in public affairs.

On the first night of the session of 1884, telegrams arrived announcing that Baker Pasha had been defeated near Tokar by a force of the Mahdi's followers, and had been driven back on Suakin. Before this time, the Government had despatched General Gordon to Khartoum, on the understanding that he was to bring back the beleaguered garrison, and such of the colonists as desired to return to Lower Egypt. This step won almost unbounded applause. Gordon was a popular hero, in whom was combined much of the soldier and something of the saint. He was going out in the spirit of knight-errantry—one man to liberate a city full of prisoners. A deliberate attempt was made to fix upon Mr. Gladstone the responsibility for Gordon's death. The Conservatives roundly accused Mr. Gladstone of murder. Mr. Gladstone defended himself and his government with great vehemence and passion, and eventually the vote of censure was defeated by the small majority of fourteen.

SCENES IN THE SHIRE HIGHLANDS.

(See Illustrations.)

RENEWED disputes between England and Portugal as to the Shire Highlands, in South Eastern Africa, were reported by cable last week. The Portuguese officials seized a British steamer on its way up the Zambesi and refused to allow it to proceed. As the vessel was carrying the mails and stores which were urgently needed, the captain offered to pay duty on his cargo but it was refused. The captain and crew were imprisoned until after the vessel, manned by Portuguese and under Portuguese colors had proceeded, when they were released. The trouble arises out of an ancient claim of Portugal to the entire country from the Indian Ocean to the Atlantic. It is based on a grant from Pope Alexander VI. in the fifteenth century. By the recent partition treaty, Germany secured a section of this territory on the Atlantic coast; the Transvaal Republic has another section of it; and England has a strip between the two, extending northward from Cape Town to the southern extremity of Lake Tanganyika. For a short distance, the River Zambesi forms the boundary between English and Portuguese territory and the two governments have established a modus vivendi by which the English may use the river from that point to the Indian Ocean, though its course is through Portuguese territory. The English allege that the seizure of the ship was a violation of the modus vivendi.

The importance of being able to use the Zambesi consists in its being the direct way from the sea to Lake Nyassa and to the Shire Highlands, where an English corporation, known as the African Lakes Company, is operating.

Mr. Fred. L. Moir, one of the managers of that company who has recently made a journey with his wife, through the Shire Highlands from Mandala to Lake Tanganyika, describes the country as fertile, and rich in mineral products. The illustrations on this page are from photographs taken by Mr. Moir on that journey. One of them represents a house at Mandala appropriated to the use of the resident-manager of the African Lakes Company; the other is a structure which serves the natives as a safe deposit vault in which grain is stored and valuables are placed for safe keeping. During the journey they encountered many natives who had never before seen a white woman. At Myezro, a crowded village surrounded by a wooden stockade, they came out in crowds to look at Mrs. Moir and criticized her appearance with embarrassing frankness.

THE LATE ARCHBISHOP.

(See Portrait.)

A CABLE message which shocks and surprises the religious public is that which last week announced the death of Archbishop Magee. It is but little more than three months ago that he was receiving the congratulations of his friends on his elevation to the Archbishopric of York, the highest office but one in the Church of England. The Church was also congratulated; for Dr. Magee was a man whose learning, eloquence and tact qualified him in an eminent degree to perform the duties of the office.

Dr. Magee was an Irishman by descent, a grandson of the famous Archbishop of Dublin. He was born in 1821, and at an early age entered Trinity College, Dublin, where he graduated with honor. He was ordained in 1844. As a young man he was remarkable for his thrilling eloquence as well as for close reasoning and profound thought. A striking sermon, showing wide culture, which he preached before the Church Congress in 1868, attracted the notice of Mr. Disraeli who was then in the Cabinet, and by his advice Dr. Magee was, in 1868, made Bishop of Peterborough. This appointment gave him a seat in the house of Lords, and there he has done excellent work, speaking always on the side of righteousness and national principle, and protesting against the opium-traffic and other iniquities which still stain English Government. On the death of Dr. Thompson on December 25, 1890, Dr. Magee was chosen to succeed him.

THE CAPTAIN'S BARGAIN.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

BY JULIA McNAIR WRIGHT.

(Published by special arrangement with The National Temperance Society.)

The Captain's Indiscretion.

"NOTHER glass, Captain?"
 "No, not another, thank you, Mr. Combe."
 "What, not another? Isn't the liquor good? Shall I mix you a julep now, or something hot with lemon, eh?"

"No—no more," said Captain Allen, eying the tall bottle with desire. "The fact is, Mr. Combe, I promised my wife—and she is a woman with a head-on-her-shoulder—that I wouldn't touch above one glass before I sold that lumber; and what Zekiel Allen says he sticks to, sure."

"Oh, but seems to me Mrs. Allen may be drawing the reins rather tight—eh, Captain?"

"None too tight, after all," said the Captain with a laugh; "I'd as like as not give the lumber away, or sell it for less than the trees cost me standing. I'm free, Mr. Combe, very free, after two glasses."

If one might read the little droop of Mr. Combe's shoulders and of the corners of his mouth, possibly he had known that little peculiarity in Captain Allen, and had considered a few glasses of Old Rye a good investment as he bargained with him. But now Captain Allen, having refreshed his mind with his promise to his "Liza," said briskly: "And so, Mr. Combe, will you have the lumber or shall I go round to Jenkins before train-time?"

"Oh, 'I'll have the lumber," said Mr. Combe, knowing that Jenkins, the rival builder, was now out on the street looking for the Captain.

"At the price laid down here?" said the Captain, pushing a long bill of various items toward Mr. Combe. "No beating down. You take it all?"

"Yes," said Mr. Combe. "Devered at once."

"I'll begin sending it down to-morrow by six," said the Captain joyfully, now feeling the exhilaration of the builder's rog; "or at five, or at four, if you say so. Come up at three in the morning if you like."

"Pshaw! I can't get there before the train, Captain," said Mr. Combe; and, with the fear of Jenkins before his eyes, he wrote at the bottom of the long lumber bill "Bought by Sam'l Combe." "There now!"

"All right," said the Captain, holding the document and putting it into his pocket. "And now I will have another glass."

Mr. Combe poured out a second glass and put sugar therein. Then he prudently locked up the bottle in the closet. Why waste Jamaica when the bargain was made?

As Captain Allen sipped his quor with evident keen relish, Mr. Combe said:

"Since your wife is so sharp about getting a promise as to how many glasses you will take, wonder she does not try to make you swear off drinking altogether."

"She does—she does," said the Captain, shaking his big head. "But, you see, I won't do it. I know too well what it will cost me. Whatever 'Zekiel Allen promises, that he sticks to, if it kills him. Ask the county, they'll say Captain Allen is a man of his word. And I won't give my word for tea-total, because I like a good glass now and then first-rate. There; I'm sorry that one's finished—not that I am or ever mean to be a drunkard. I think too much of 'Liza and the children for that. It's on their account I made the promise about not drinking over one glass before the bargain is finished. But I'll not swear total abstainer. Oh, no! And, Mr. Combe, if you like, you can bring up the rest of that bottle to-morrow, and we'll drink to our good luck when the last of the sticks are sent off."

Combe laughed. "All right; perhaps after a glass or two you'll throw me in an odd hundred or so of scantling."

"You needn't build on that," said the Captain honestly; "for 'Liza'll be there. Oh, she is a woman for trade! She made out the bill. She measures all the lumber. She used to be a school-ma'am. Oh, she is a woman-with-a-head! I don't know just how she does it, Mr. Combe. I never could measure lumber myself; but she—she just runs the rule here and there, and then—then she multiplies! Or is it that she divides? No; she adds! I vow I can't tell which it is—but she gets it right!"

Mr. Combe laughed again as he opened the door. The Jamaica was telling on the Captain, but too late to do his entertainer any good.

Captain Allen was very easily affected by liquor. His intoxication was always speedy, brief, and of three stages. He was in the first stage now—the stage of exhilaration. In that stage it would be very hard to persuade the Captain that he had not a million or its equivalent in either pocket. It would be equally hard to persuade him that it was not his mission to lavish of his abundance on all his fellows.

SPRING FLOWERS.

Everywhere about us they are glowing,
Some, like stars, to tell us Spring is born;
Others, their blue eyes with tears o'erflowing,
Stand, like Ruth amid the golden corn.

And with childlike, credulous affection
We behold the tender buds expand;
Emblems of our own great Resurrection.
Emblems of "the bright and better Land."
—Longfellow.

Given two glasses, Captain Allen was a new Don Quixote; every broken-down steed was to him a full-blooded charger; every windmill a giant; every village maid a Dulcinea to be defended. He was now in what the French call the state glorieux; he forgot that he trod the earth, and he marched with his head in the clouds. Had not his poverty and the prudence of 'Liza combined to keep his pockets empty, Captain Allen would have scattered his earnings right and left in such phases of feeling as the present.

Now he took the road to the railroad station. About him, in the waning light of the early April afternoon, were the skeletons of half-covered frames of various houses rising under the supervision of Combe or the rival Jenkins. For this little town of Lacy was coming up on a sudden boom. These houses which the workmen were leaving for the night, aided the glowing fantasies of Captain Allen's brain. "If they'd only build a thousand houses, and I could get out the lumber for all of them—ha! ha! I'd be rich as Jay Gould in no time. Ho! ho! I'm no fool! What will 'Liza say when she sees this!" and he slapped the pocket where the bill of lumber rustled. "Sold! Sold to the first man! Sold at full price! If I go on like that I can pay off the mortgage on the old mill and build me a house, and buy 'Liza a silk gown and little Bob a watch when he is twenty-one!"

Thus, emulating the "Maid with the Pail of Milk" and the "Glass Seller of Bagdad," Captain Allen strode toward the station just at the edge of the little town. But before he reached the station, he saw on the roadside an excited group, mostly women, and their exclamations and questions mingled with the wild crying of a child.

Captain Allen was a man extravagantly fond of children, and, moreover, he was now in his state of "Redresser General of all Grievances;" he elbowed his way into the crowd. Sitting on a boulder was a hatless, shoeless, ragged, and very small child. He was crying stormily, furiously; as a child cries after long and painful repression, after long terror and endurance when at last all barriers and restraints have given way, and it yields completely to the force of its woe.

"Poor little thing!" cried a woman, shrilly; "no wonder he cries. There he sat whenever I opened my door this morning—still as a stone. After an hour or so, I went and spoke to him. He said his mammy had left him there, and told him to wait. I took him some bread and milk, and again I took him some cake; and he slept a bit. And there he's sat the blessed day, afraid to move, waiting for the wretched woman, whoever she is, to come back."

"She won't come. Never fear. She's deserted him. She's been cute enough to get the day's start and go by, before folks were up to see her, the brute!"

"Don't cry, my little man," said an old grandmother, "tell us your name. What's your name, dear?"

"Wobbie."

"Oh, Robbie. And where do you live?"

"Nowhere!"

"Oh, yes, you do. Where did you come from tell us?"

"F'om nowhere," sobbed the child, breaking forth into renewed wails.

"There, he knows nothing, or he is so scared he has forgotten all he knows. Well, what's to be done with him? He can't sit here all night. It's going to rain, too. Can't you take him in, Mrs. Moss?"

"Me take him in!" said Mrs. Moss, who evidently had not "been a schoolma'am," like 'Liza. "And if there is one thing Absalom hates, it is the noise of a child!"

"Yes, yes," said her neighbors, "she can't," for the vile temper of her Absalom was well known, but condoned, as for ten years he had been paralyzed from a railroad accident.

"Couldn't you see to him a bit, Mrs. Mooney?"

"The saints forbid!" cried Mrs. Mooney. "I've raised eight, and now I live with my daughter and she has six, and they're more than she can handle, sure."

"That's true," said a big matron. "Everybody has got more than they can do for, of children. I wonder that they will keep coming when there's no room for 'em." And she eyed the weeping "Wobbie" with reprobation, as a sample of that legion of children which will insist on crowding into an over-peopled world.

"Perhaps his mother will come back for him, after all."

"Not she," cried the chorus. "She's deserted him, the tramp!"

"Mr. Beasely, don't you want him—you've no chick or child?"

"No; and no one to mend my own stockings, let alone his," quoth Mr. Beasely, who was a bachelor.

"What's the row?" demanded Luke Martin, the sole policeman of the place, who had been summoned.

The woman explained vociferously. "Well, I suppose I must take him to the station-house"—thus designating a ten-by-twelve room behind the post-office—"and in the morning, if he's not called for, hand him over to the poormaster."

"You've no right to hand him over to the poormaster," said a hard-faced man. "Why should our country be burdened with the like of him? If you take in all the strays that are left here, we'll soon have to pay fifty cents tax on the dollar. He's not our poor. Send him, where he came from."

"But we don't know where he came from."

"You've no right to burden our county, I say!"

"Oh, Sam Hastings! Burden! One little bit of a boy!"

"Yes, Mrs. Moss. Burden! It's a precedent. We don't want no such precedents. Our taxes is heavy enough now, and too heavy."

"Arrah, you don't pay any of 'em," said Mrs. Mooney.

Meanwhile the child had stopped crying—stopped from exhaustion, and to take breath.

"Come on, sonny," said the big constable, "you can't sit here."

But the child was frightened nearly into convulsions at the touch of this big, bluff man with the thick stick. He burst into renewed shrieks, and clung to the petticoat of the nearest woman.

"Can't some of you quiet him a little?" said the poor constable. "I don't want to drag him off yelling like that. People will think I'm trying to cut his throat."

The child seemed to regard this as a threat. He redoubled his shrieks. While the women said, "There, there; don't, my dear; don't take on so." "He won't hurt you." "Go with the nice man." "He'll give candy, sonny." "Here, dear, hush; here is a penny for you." "There's a good boy."

Another lull; but for breath, not because comforted.

"Well," said the reluctant constable, "the poorhouse is the only place since none of you wants him."

"I want him."

It was Captain 'Zekiel. He pushed near the child and got down on his knees. He wiped the tear-drenched face with his big bandanna. He wooed the child with soft words. "There, my little man! Cap'n Allen likes little boys. Come with me, and you shall have some pie and a bird and a pussy cat, and a baby to play with! 'Zekiel Allen won't see a little chap sent to the poorhouse."

"Oh, the good man!" "Aye, that's right!" Heaven be your bed!" "The Lord will reward you!" "Take him!" Thus "the chorus of the women."

"Do you mean you'll take the child, mister? I don't remember your—"

"Oh, it's Captain Allen from Lal's Mountain," cried Mrs. Mooney. "We know him—Captain 'Zekiel."

"And you really mean to take the child?" said the constable.

"Certain, why not? I've got a mill up near the mountain, and I can sell my lumber for any price I name. I've got a wife with-a-head-on-her-shoulders, and I've got two youngsters, and I'm not one of those to say there's too many children in the world. I like children. I'd as lief do for a hundred! Give me the little chap, I'll make a man of him. I'll make him Gov'nor or President, or a barge captain, or—or something!"

The lost infant, standing very short and small beside Captain 'Zekiel's six feet four inches, locked one small hand tight in the big palm of his protector, and with the other gripped fast hold of the baggy knee of the Captain's trousers.

"I'll just take down your name and address, so I can send to you in case the mother comes back," said the relieved constable, taking out a notebook.

"She won't come!" "Never hear of her again!" "So much the better!" "The boy's in luck!" "Oh, the good man!" "That's what it is to be generous!" "Oh, the kind heart!" Amid this chant the crowd broke up, and Captain 'Zekiel and his waif marched hurriedly to the station. There was only one grimy little car to the engine. The distance to be travelled was only ten miles. One passenger, one smoky lamp, a conductor who was also brakeman—nightfall! These were Captain 'Zekiel's surroundings. The admiring crowd had fallen away from him; the inspiring "chorus of the women"

no longer rung in his ears. And the mental barometer of Captain 'Zekiel was falling very fast. His drunkenness had always three stages—the second stage was sure to be one of timidity, anxiety, apprehension. Into this second stage he was now drifting out of his brief period of glory and self-sufficiency. He was going home—to a very poor home—to a wife and two children: and the woman—with-a-head-on-her-shoulders might make serious objections to having a new child cast upon her cares. It was borne in on the Captain's-failing heart that he had reckoned without his hostess. What should he do—what should he do? How could he encounter the redoubtable 'Liza? What was likely to occur he knew well—for this was not the first time the Captain had been guilty of such an indiscretion.

Lower, lower, lower sank the Captain's feelings; down, down, down into the very depths went the lately jubilant, boastful Captain.

And the car stopped. He must walk a mile to reach home. The rain was falling. The night had come. The mountain road was rutty and muddy. How this poor uncomplaining mite, clinging to his hand, lagged and stumbled and dragged! At last the child's feet merely slid along the way as the remorseful Captain pulled him forward. Then Captain 'Zekiel picked him up to his broad breast, and the little fellow locked a pair of confiding arms around the man's horny neck, and clung to him for shelter from the storm. The Captain somehow revived a little at that clasp.

THE CAPTAIN'S BARGAIN.

Home! The Captain lived in two rooms at the bottom of the rickety old mill. The light shone from the uncurtained window, 'Liza was frying ham for tea. The Captain put the boy down, opened the door, and as 'Liza, engrossed with her cooking, did not turn round, he politely addressed her on a pleasing theme.

"'Liza, I sold the lumber—the hull bill of it—for just the price you set, 'Liza—just the price. It's to go down to-morrow, 'Liza."

"All right," said the household priestess, bent over her tripod, and pursuing her incantations with the dredging-box. The smoke of the ham, the steam of the tea-kettle rose up about her. She was a small, dark, middle-aged woman.

"Your tea smells dreadful good, 'Liza—"

"What a nice place it am!" piped the waif from behind the sheltering legs of the colossal Captain

"What's that?" cried Mrs. 'Liza. It was not Bop, the infant son of the home; he slept. It was not Pink; she had for an hour been hanging to the maternal skirts, "cross enough to kill," as Mrs. 'Liza said. That voice of silvery satisfaction! Mrs. 'Liza whirled about. Looking around the Captain's left leg—lo! a pair of big brown eyes in a very dirty face, a mop of very tangled brown curls, a slim, eager, shrinking, tiny, ragged figure.

"What's that?" demanded the Pythones.

"It's—a little—a boy—I picked up," faltered the Captain, and he passed instantaneously into the third stage of his drunkenness—remorse. In this stage he was always burdened with remorse, first for having ever been born, and then for everything he had ever done since he was born.

"A boy you picked up! 'Zekiel Allen! Have you done that again? 'Zekiel you've been drinking!"

The Captain took a chair in a corner.

"I won't keep him, mind! Carry him straight back where you got him from. That's my last word."

The Captain hid his face in his hands. He must take him back! The poor, dear little boy! Consign the forlorn babe to the horrors of a county poorhouse! And he had promised to keep him. He had boasted. He had been praised by all the women. And he must go back to the constable and say, "My wife won't let me keep him." Oh dear, oh, dear! And yet, the Captain had a sense of justice. Not he, but 'Liza must cook, make, wash, mend, toil for this waif if he stayed. And if she wouldn't, well—she wouldn't. The Captain groaned.

"Take him away, I tell you!" cried the angry 'Liza, brandishing the long meat-fork, and advancing on the cowed Captain, "As if I hadn't enough on my hands! And we as poor as Job's turkey, and may have a dozen of our own; who knows! Take him off!"

"Yes, 'Liza," said the Captain, "yes only—there isn't another train to-night, you know. And it's raining, 'Liza, and it's seven o'clock, and—oh, dear—"

"I suppose he's got to stay all night," said 'Liza, wrathfully; "but in the morning he goes packing. I'd like to know if we've got to take in every stray dog, and cat, and boy that you cast your eye on, 'Zekiel Allen? I never saw such a man in all my born days! One never knows what you'll do, when you've been drinking. Poor as we are, too! To-morrow morning, bright and early, 'Zekiel, mind."

"Yes, 'Liza," said 'Zekiel, meekly. Meanwhile the child, drawn by the fragrance of the food and the delicious warmth of the stove, had made cautious advances into the room, and, with a prudence beyond his years, had obliterated himself, so far as possible, behind the stove. His big brown eyes gazed upon the Captain and the irate 'Liza. Did he understand the sentence pronounced against him? Mistress Allen whisked tea, potatoes, and ham upon the board. "Well, come to supper: come along, you boy! We can give you a meal, I suppose. 'Zekiel Allen, you have made a bargain!"

Men and Women resort to stimulants sometimes; and they know its wrong. To feel good after a square meal or a lungful of nourishing ozone is all right. This is fuel for the engine. So with COMPOUND OXYGEN. It invigorates because it is food. It is oxygen ozonized; charged with electricity. When it gets to the breathing surfaces it is very quickly appropriated.

COMPOUND OXYGEN makes strength, genuine strength, for it remains when you quit this remedy. After an inhalation you tingle and glow all over, circulation is quickened, the chest expands.

A book of 200 pages will tell you who have been restored to health and strength by the use of COMPOUND OXYGEN. This Book is worth reading. The patients do the talking in its pages—not Drs. ## THE TAPESTRY WEAVERS.

LET us learn a useful lesson,
No braver lesson can be,
From the ways of the tapestry weavers,
On the other side of the sea;
Above their heads the pattern hangs,
They study it with care,
And as to and fro the shuttle leaps,
Their eyes are fastened there.

They tell this curious thing besides
Of the patient, plodding weaver:
He works on the wrong side evermore,
But works for the right side ever;
It is only when the weaving stops,
And the web is loosed and turned,
That he sees his real handiwork,
That his marvelous skill is learned.

Ah! the sight of its delicate beauty,
It pays him for all its cost,
No rarer, daintier work than his,
Was ever done by the frost;
Then the master bringeth him golden hire,
And giveth him praise as well,
And how happy the heart of the weaver is,
No tongue but his own can tell.

The years of man are the looms of God,
Let down from the place of the sun,
Wherein we all are weaving,
Till the mystic web is done;
Weaving blindly, but weaving surely,
Each for himself his fate,
We may not see how the right side looks,
We can only weave and wait.

But looking above for the pattern,
No weaver hath need to fear,
Only let him look clear into Heaven,
The Perfect Pattern is there.
If he keeps the face of the Saviour
Forever and always in sight,
His toil shall be sweeter than honey,
And his weaving sure to be right.

And when his task is ended,
And the web is turned and shown,
He shall hear the voice of the Master,
It will say to him, "Well done!"
And the white-winged angels of Heaven,
To bear him thence shall come down;
And God shall give for his hire—
Not golden coin, but a CROWN.

J. E. JEWETT, Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for ten cents or 100 for twenty cents. Postage stamps taken.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER FOR THE BABIES.

HUNTER MCGUIRE, M.D., L.L.D., late Professor of Surgery, Medical College of Virginia, Richmond:

"For some time I have been using BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in the preparation of ARTIFICIAL FOOD FOR INFANTS. Cow's milk is the substitute usually resorted to when the mother is not able to suckle her child and it is impossible to get a wet nurse. One serious objection, along with many others to cow's milk, is its ACIDITY. Human milk is always alkaline, but cow's milk, except when the animal is fed entirely upon grass, is almost always acid. This is the principal reason why the milk of cows disagrees with many babies, and lime water is often added to this milk to correct the acidity. I believe the long-continued use of lime water is hurtful to digestion, and last summer, when I was feeding two of my children on cow's milk, and found the nurse adding lime water to prevent colic and intestinal derangement, which the food otherwise produced, I directed her to use No. 2 BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in preparing the food, with immediate and continued good results. The water was added until the milk lost its acidity and was neutral or alkaline."

Now that it appears in a new dress, it is believed it will be even more popular and useful, either when read or sung as a solo or chorus, accompanied with the scriptural responses and illustrations.

MENDING NETS.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON PREACHED IN THE NEW BROOKLYN TABERNACLE LAST SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 17, 1891.

The Wealth of the Sea—Mortifying Loss of Fish Through a Break in the Net—The Nets Used by Fishers of Men—Many of them in Need of Repairs—Some with the Meshes too Large—Injured by being Entangled with other Nets—Fishing and Fighting Cannot be Done at the Same Time—How the Repairs Should be Done—Common-Sense Threads Needed—A Fellow-Traveller's Unsuspected Trouble—Threads of Sympathy to be Used—Threads of Patience and Faith—Where to Mend the Nets—Two Tremendous Hours.

"James the Son of Zebedee and John his brother, in a ship with Zebedee their father, mending their nets." Matthew 4: 21.

"I GO a-fishing," cried Simon Peter to his comrades, and the most of the Apostles had hands hard from fishing tackle. The fisheries of the world have always attracted attention. In the third century the Queen of Egypt had for pin-money four hundred and seventy thousand dollars received from the fisheries of Lake Moeris. And if the time should ever come when the immensity of the world's population could not be fed by the vegetables and meats of the land, the sea has an amount of animal life that would feed all the populations of the earth and fatten them with a food that by its phosphorus would make a generation brainy and intellectual beyond anything that the world has ever imagined. My text takes us among the Galilean fishermen. One day Walter Scott, while hunting in an old drawer found among some old fishing tackle, the manuscript of his immortal book Waverley, which he had put away there as of no worth, and who knows but that to-day we may find some unknown wealth of thought while looking at the fishing tackle in the text.

It is not a good day for fishing and three men are in the boat repairing the broken fishing nets. If you are fishing with a hook and line and the fish will not bite, it is a good time to put the angler's apparatus into better condition. Perhaps the last fish you hauled in was so large that something snapped. Or if you were fishing with a net, there was a mighty floundering of the scales or an exposed nail on the side of the boat which broke some of the threads and let part or all of the captives of the deep escape into their natural element. And hardly anything is more provoking than to nearly land a score or a hundred of trophies from the deep and when you are in the full glee of hauling in the spotted treasures, through some imperfection of the net they splash back into the wave. That is too much of a trial of patience for most fishermen to endure and many a man ordinarily correct of speech in such circumstances comes to an intensity of utterance unjustifiable. Therefore no good fisherman considers the time wasted that is spent in mending his net. Now the Bible again and again represents Christian workers as fishers of men, and we are all sweeping through the sea of humanity some kind of a net. Indeed, there have been enough nets out and enough fishermen busy to have landed the whole human race in the kingdom of God long before this. What is the matter? The Gospel is all right, and it has been a good time for catching souls for thousands of years. Why, then, the failures? The trouble is with the nets and most of them need to be mended. I propose to show you what is the matter with most of the nets and how to mend them. In the text old Zebedee and his two boys James and John were doing a good thing when they sat in the boat mending their nets.

The trouble with many of our nets is that the meshes are too large. If a fish can get his gills and half his body through the network, he tears and rends and works his way out and leaves the place through which he squirmed a tangle of broken threads. In our desire to make everything so easy we relax, we loosen, we widen. We let men after they are once in the Gospel net escape into the world and go into indulgences and swim all around Galilee from north side to south side and from east side to west side, expecting that they will come back again. We ought to make it easy for them to get into the kingdom of God and, as far as we can, make it impossible for them to get out. The poor advice now-a-days to many is: "Go and do just as you did before you were captured for God and heaven. The net was not intended to be any restraint or any hindrance. What you did before you were a Christian, do now. Go to all styles of amusement, read all the styles of books, engage in all the styles of behavior as before you were converted." And so through these meshes of permission and laxity they wriggle out, through this opening and that opening, tearing the net as they go and soon all the souls that we expected to land in heaven, before we know it are back in the deep sea of the world. Oh, when we go a-gospel-fishing let us make it as easy as possible for souls to get in and as hard as possible to get out.

Is the Bible language an unmeaning verbiage when it talks about self-denial and keeping the body under and about walking the narrow way and entering the strait gate and about carrying the cross? Is there to be no way of telling whether a man is a Christian except by his taking the communion chalice on sacramental day? May a man be as reckless about his thoughts, about his words, about his temper, about his amusements, after conversion as before. Alas, that the words of Christ are so little heeded when he said: "Whosoever doth not bear his cross and come after me cannot be my disciple." The church is fast becoming as bad as the world, and when it gets as bad as the world it will be worse than the world by so much as it will add hypocrisy of a most appalling kind to its other defects.

MENDING THEIR NETS.

this of more than eight hundred thousand, there are at least five hundred thousand not in Sabbath Schools or churches. And in this land where there are more than sixty-four million people, there are at least thirty million not in the Sabbath Schools and churches. In such an Atlantic ocean of opportunity, there is room for all the nets and all the boats and all the fishermen and for millions more. There should be no rivalry between churches. Each one does a work peculiar to itself. What a glad spectacle when on our recent dedication day ministers of all denominations stood on this platform and wished for each other widest prosperity and usefulness. But there are cities in this country where there is now going on an awful ripping and rending and tearing of fishing nets. Indeed, all over Christendom at this time there is a great war going on between fishermen, ministers against ministers.

Now I have noticed a man cannot fish and fight at the same time. He either neglects his net or his musket. It is amazing how much time some of the fishermen have to look after other fishermen. It is more than I can do to take care of my own net. You see the wind is just right and it is such a good time for fishing and the fish are coming in so rapidly that I have to keep my eye and hand busy. There are about two hundred million souls wanting to get into the kingdom of God and it will require all the nets and all the fishermen of Christendom to safely land them. Oh, brethren of the ministry! Let us spend our time in fishing instead of fighting. But if I angrily jerk my net across your net, and you jerk your net angrily across mine, we will soon have two broken nets and no fish. The French revolution nearly destroyed the French fisheries, and ecclesiastical war is the worst thing possible while hauling souls into the kingdom. My friends, I notice in the text that James the son of Zebedee and John his brother were busy not mending somebody else's nets but mending their own nets and I rather think that we who are engaged in Christian work in this latter part of the Nineteenth century will require all our spare time to mend our own nets. God help us in the important duty!

In this work of reparation we need to put in to the nets more threads of common sense. When we can present religion as a great practicality we will catch a hundred souls where now we catch one. Present religion as an intellectuality and we will fail. Out in the fisheries there are set across the waters what are called gill nets and the fish put their heads through the meshes and then cannot withdraw them because they are caught by the gills. But gill nets cannot be of any service in religious work. Men are never caught for the truth by their heads; it is by the heart or not at all. No argument ever saved a man and no keen analysis ever brought a man into the kingdom of God. Heart work, not head work. Away with you gill nets! Sympathy, helpfulness, consolation love, are the names of some of the threads that we need to weave in our gospel nets when we are mending them.

Do you know that the world's heart is bursting with trouble and if you could make the world believe that the religion of Jesus Christ is a soothing omnipotence, the whole world would surrender to-morrow, yea, would surrender this hour. The day before James A. Garfield was inaugurated as President, I was in the cars going from Richmond to Washington. Gentlemen seated near to me in the cars knew me and we were soon in familiar conversation. It was just after a bereavement and I was speaking to him from an over-burdened heart about the sorrow I was suffering. Looking at his cheerful face, I said: "I guess you have escaped all trouble. I should judge from your countenance that you have come through free from a misfortune." Then he looked at me with a look I shall never forget and whispered in my ear: "Sir, you know nothing about trouble. My wife has been in an insane asylum for fifteen years." And then he turned and looked out of the window and into the night with a silence I was too overpowered to break. That was another illustration of the fact that no one escapes trouble. Why, that man seated next to you in church has on his soul a weight compared with which a mountain is a feather. That woman seated next to you in church has a grief the recital of which would make your body, mind and soul shudder.

When you are mending your net for this wide, deep sea of humanity, take out that wire thread of criticism and that horse-hair thread of harshness and put in a soft silken thread of Christian sympathy. Yea, when you are mending your nets tear out those old threads of gruffness and weave in a few threads of politeness and geniality. In the house of God let all Christian faces beam with a look that means welcome. Say "good morning" to the stranger as he enters your pew and at the close shake hands with him and say "How did you like the music?" Why, you would be to that man a panel of the door of heaven; you would be to him a note of the doxology that seraphs sing when a new soul enters heaven. I have in other days entered a pew in church and the woman at the other end of the pew looked at me as much as to say: "How dare you? This is my pew and I pay the rent for it!" Well, I crouched in the other corner and made myself as small as possible and felt as though I had been stealing something. So there are people who have a sharp edge to their religion and they act as though they thought most people had been elected to be damned and they were glad of it. Oh, let us brighten up our manner and appear in gentlemanliness or ladyhood.

A CONFESSION OF SORROW.

The object in fly-fishing is to throw the fly far out, and then let it drop gently down and keep it gently rising and falling with the waters and not plunge it like a man-of-war's anchor; and abruptness and harshness of manner must be avoided in our attempt at usefulness. I know a man in New York who is more sunshiny and genial when he has dyspepsia than when he is not suffering from that depressing trouble. I have found out his secret. When he starts out in the morning with such depression, he asks for special grace to keep from snapping up anybody that day, and puts forth additional determination to be kindly and genial, and by the help of God, he accomplishes it. Many of our nets need to be mended in these respects, the black threads and the rough threads taken out, and the bright threads and the golden threads of Christian geniality woven in.

In addition to this, we need to mend our nets with more threads of patience. It is no rare thing for a fisherman to spend one whole day before he can take a St. Lawrence pike, or an Ohio salmon, or a Long Island pickerel, or a Cayuga black bass, or a Delaware cat-fish, and he does that day after day without particular discouragement. But what a lack of patience if we do not immediately succeed in soul-catching. We are apt to give it up and say: "I will never try again." Into all our nets we need to weave all along the edge, and all through the centre, great, long, stout threads of Christian patience. How patient God has been with us! Can we not be patient with our fellows?

Again, in mending our nets we need, also, to put in the threads of faith and tear out all the tangled meshes of unbelief. Our work is successful according to our faith. The man who believes in only half a Bible, or the Bible in spots, the man who thinks he cannot persuade others, the man who halts, doubting about this and doubting about that, will be a failure in Christian work. Show me the man who rather thinks that the garden of Eden may have been an allegory, and is not quite certain but that there may be another chance after death, and does not know whether or not the Bible is inspired, and I tell you that man for soul-saving is a poor stick. Faith in God and in Jesus Christ, and the Holy Ghost, and the absolute necessity of a regenerated heart, in order to see God in peace, is one thread you must have in your mended net, or you will never be a successful fisher for men. Why, how can you doubt? The rottenest thread to tear out of your net is unbelief, and the most important thread that you are to put in it is faith. Faith in God, triumphant faith, everlasting faith.

Oh, this important work of mending our nets! If we could get our nets right we would accomplish more in soul-saving in the next year than we have in the last twenty years. But where shall we get them mended? Just where old Zebedee and his two boys mended their nets—where you are. James and John had no time to go ashore. They were not fishing for fun, as you and I do in summer time. It was their livelihood and that of their families. They mended their nets where they were, in the ship. "Oh," says some one, "I mean to get my net mended, and I will go down to the public library, and I will see what the scientists say about evolution and about 'the survival of the fittest,' and I will read up what the theologians say about 'advanced thought.' I will leave the ship awhile, and I will go ashore and stay there till my net is mended." Do that, my brother, and you will have no net left. Instead of their helping you mend your net, they will steal the pieces that remain. Better stay in the Gospel boat, where you have all the means for mending your net. What are they, do you ask? I answer all you need you have where you are; namely, a Bible and a place to pray. The more you study evolution, and adopt what is called advanced thought, the bigger fool you will be. Stay in the ship and mend your net. That is where James, the son of Zebedee, and John, his brother stayed. That is where all who get their nets mended stay.

I notice that all who leave the Gospel boat and go ashore to mend their nets stay there. Or if they try again to fish, they do not catch anything. Get out of the Gospel boat and go up into the world to get your net mended, and you will live to see the day when you will feel like the man who, having forsaken Christianity, sighed "I would give a thousand pounds to feel as I did in 1820." The time will come when you would be willing to give a thousand pounds to feel as you did in 1891. These men who have given up their religion cannot help you a bit.

These dear brethren of all denominations, afflicted with theological fidgets, had better go to mending nets instead of breaking them. Before they break up the old religion and try to foist on us a new religion, let them go through some great sacrifice for God that will prove them worthy for such a work, taking the advice of Talleyrand to a man who wanted to upset the religion of Jesus Christ and start a new one, when he said: "Go and be crucified and then raise yourself from the grave the third day!" Those who propose to mend their nets by secular and sceptical books are like a man who has just one week for fishing, and six of the days he spends in reading "Isaak Walton's Complete Angler," and "Wheatley's Rod and Line," and "Scott's Fishing in Northern Waters," and "Pullman's Vade Mecum of Fly Fishing for Trout," and then on Saturday morning, his last day out, goes to the river to ply his art, but that day the fish will not bite, and late on Saturday night he goes to his home with empty basket. Alas! alas! If when the Saturday night of our life drops on us, it shall be found that we have spent our time in the libraries of worldly philosophy, trying to mend our nets, and we have only a few souls to report as brought to God through our instrumentality, while some humble Gospel fisherman, his library made up of a Bible and an almanac, shall come home laden with the results, his trophies the souls within fifteen miles of his log cabin meeting-house.

In the time of great disturbance in Naples in 1649, Massaniello, a bare-footed fishingboy, dropped his fishing-rod, and by strange magnetism took command of that city of six hundred thousand souls. He took off his fishing-jacket and put on a robe of gold in the presence of howling mobs. He put his hand on his hip as a signal and they were silent. He waved his hand away from him and they retired to their homes. Armies passed in review before him. He became the nation's idol. The rapid rise and complete supremacy of that young fisherman, Massaniello, has no parallel in all history. But something equal to that and better than that is an every-day occurrence in heaven. God takes some of those, who in this world were fishers of men, and who toiled very humbly, but because of the way they mended their nets and employed their nets after they were mended, and suddenly hoists them and robes them and sceptres them and crowns them, and makes them rulers over many cities, and he marches armies of saved ones before them in review, Massaniellos unhonored on earth but radiated in heaven. The fisher boy of Naples soon lost his power but those people of God who have kept their nets mended and rightly swung them shall never lose their exalted place, but shall reign forever and ever and ever. Keep that reward in sight.

But do not spend your time fishing with hook and line. Why did not James the son of Zebedee sit on the wharf at Cana, his feet hanging over the lake and with a long pole and a worm on the hook dipped into the wave wait for some mullet to swim up and be caught. Why did not Zebedee spend his afternoon trying to catch one eel? No, that work was too slow. These men were not mending a hook and line, they were mending their nets. So let the church of God not be content with having here one soul and next month another soul brought into the kingdom. Sweep all the seas with nets, scoop nets, seine nets, drag nets, all-encompassing nets, and take the treasures in by hundreds and thousands and millions, and nations be born in a day, and the hemispheres quake with the tread of a ransoming God. Do you know what will be the two most tremendous hours in our heavenly existence? Among the quadrillions of ages which shall roll on, what two occasions will be to us the greatest? The day of our arrival there will be to us, one of the two greatest. The second greatest, I think, will be the day when we shall have put in parallel lines before us what Christ did for us, and what we did for Christ, the one so great, the other so little. That will be the only embarrassment in heaven. My Lord and my God! What will we do and what will we say when, on one side are placed the Saviour's great sacrifices for us, and our small sacrifices for him; his exile, his humiliation, his agonies on one hand, and our poor weak, insufficient sacrifices on the other. To make the contrast less overwhelming let us quickly mend our nets, and like the Galilean fishermen may we be divinely helped to cast them on the right side of the ship.

REV. PHILLIPS BROOKS, D.D.

Recently Elected by the Protestant Episcopal Convention Bishop of Massachusetts.

CONGRATULATIONS have come to the diocese of Massachusetts from every part of our land and from other lands, from men of every section of the Christian Church, and from men who do not belong to the Christian Church at all, on the election of Dr.

Phillips Brooks to the bishopric.

The unanimity of opinion is extraordinary and almost unprecedented. The cause of it is not far to seek. It is doubtless in part a tribute to his eminent ability as a preacher; but that fact does not fully explain it. Honors might fall to many eloquent and powerful preachers without stirring enthusiasm so general and so sincere. The cause is to be found in the large-heartedness, the generous tolerance, the cordial sympathy with every man who loves the Lord Jesus and is working in any way for him, which is the chief characteristic of Phillips Brooks. The Christian preacher and worker in any denomination, however widely it may be separated from that which Dr. Brooks adorns, is regarded by the great preacher as a comrade and a brother, not as a rival. The Protestant Episcopal Church is proud of him, as it has reason to be but the Presbyterian, the Congregationalist, even the Roman Catholic is proud of him, too, for Phillips Brooks belongs to the Church universal. We think of him as a Christian, rather than as an Episcopalian—as a valiant soldier of Jesus Christ, who is on our side in the great battle with sin and Satan.

A Remarkable Election

In many ways was that which raised Phillips Brooks to the Episcopate. Dr. Vintner, in making the nomination, was known to be at issue with the clergyman whom he nominated on many questions of doctrine and administration; and among those who voted for him were clergymen belonging to all the parties in the Church. They sacrificed their personal predilections and their ecclesiastical preferences that they might do honor to a man whose worth is universally recognized, and whose words and works are a pledge of cordial, manly co-operation in all Christian effort. The election is an evidence that the clergy have learned the spirit of the time. The forces of rationalism and ritualism and worldly self-seeking, are surging on all sides against the Church. Leaders are needed in this day who are in close touch with American life, whose abilities command the respect of "them which are outside," who stand for what is broad and true and right, and who are less concerned about differences on speculative doctrines, about the detail of vestments and ritual, than about the central truths on which all Christians are united. A perception of this fact led to the selection of Dr. Brooks for leadership, not in Massachusetts, only, but in the Church throughout Christendom.

His Past Services

have been of a character to give solid ground for the hopes of what Philip Brooks will be enabled to accomplish in his new sphere, if his life is spared. As in olden time men were "sent from God," specially adapted to do a special work at a critical juncture, so it would seem that God sent Dr. Brooks to Boston twenty years ago to do a work that was urgently needed. The tide had run strongly in the direction of Unitarianism in that city. Educated thinking men drifted in that direction, and were rapidly passing beyond it into agnosticism and practical infidelity. The arrival of Dr. Brooks stemmed the tide. His profound learning, his familiarity with the modes of thought in the city, and his strong faith, gave him just the power over the people that was needed to hold them firm in the faith and recall those who had reluctantly abandoned it. They learned from him that no man need be ashamed of being a humble believer in Jesus of Nazareth. He convinced them that there is no higher philosophy known among men than the Christian religion and that every man who, knowing his inherent weakness, was earnestly striving to live soberly, righteously and godly in the world could obtain in the strength of Christ the help he needed. Men who went to Trinity Church ceased to criticize, to doubt, to speculate, and tried for themselves by their own experience the power of the Gospel on their daily life. When people will do that, when they know and feel the power of God in their own souls, mental doubts and perplexities do not shake them. Like the man in the Gospels whose sight was restored, they say in reply to the sceptics, "One thing I know that whereas I was blind, now I see."

Dr. Brooks went to Boston from Philadelphia where he had also done a notable work. He was born in the former city in 1835. All the associations of his boyhood were Unitarian. He graduated at the Latin school and then went to Harvard, taking his baccalaureate there in 1855 at the age of twenty. Thence he proceeded to the Alexandria Seminary for his theological course and was ordained in 1859. He labored three years at the Church of the Advent in Philadelphia, resigning to become rector of the church of Holy Trinity in the same city. After a season of popularity and wide usefulness he received a call from his native city in 1870 to become rector of Trinity Church. The old church was destroyed by fire and it was six years before the magnificent edifice we now know as

Trinity Church, Boston, was completed and ready for occupation. Pictures of this noble pile appear with the portrait of Dr. Brooks on the first page. It cost a million dollars and when it was dedicated it was completely free of debt. Though every sitting in the vast edifice might have been rented, Dr. Brooks insisted that the galleries, which will accommodate five hundred persons, should be perpetually free. This fact was made known, and it has been a blessing to the city; for in those galleries many have been brought from darkness to light. The general plan of the church is unique. The base of the design is a Greek cross, headed by a semi-circular apse. The resultant is practically an amphitheatric auditorium, having all the sittings within a short radius of the chancel. The result is a marked improvement for hearing purposes on the Gothic and it is on hearing that Dr. Brooks relies. "The people," he once said, "may worship God best in the closet when the door is shut. They get light and help in Church as the Spirit blesses the word spoken."

In his physical proportions, Dr. Brooks is herculean. His voice is sonorous and his delivery exceptionally rapid. The closest attention is necessary to follow his train of thought which is always logical and carefully arranged. His sermons sparkle with gems of thought but each one goes to the mark and leads up to the great climax in which the one central idea is presented with irresistible power. His one theme is Jesus the Saviour of the world, the need of men in every age, the solution of all problems, the panacea for all affliction, the deliverer from all sin. May he long continue to deliver that message to a perplexed, weary, sin-burdened world!

THE LATE REV. GEORGE W. BOTHWELL, D.D.

A Useful and Promising Career Closed at its Meridian by Pathetic Misadventure.

(See Portrait.)

HE deplorable accident which has resulted in the death of the Rev. G. W. Bothwell, D. D., pastor of the Church of the Covenant, Brooklyn, N. Y., has already been mentioned in these columns. The Christian public here and in other cities in the South and West sympathized sincerely with him in his acute suffering and prayed for his recovery. Since his death the messages of condolence which have been sent to his family and to his church indicate how widely and genuinely he was respected. The readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will therefore be glad to have the portrait of him which appears on this page and which has never before been published in any journal.

As already explained Dr. Bothwell's death was caused by the presence in the bronchial tube, which supplies the left lung with air, of a small cork. A very touching act of paternal love led to the swallowing of the fatal obstruction. One of his two little daughters was sick and was reluctant to take the nauseous medicine prescribed for her. The father took the little girl on his knee to give her the medicine which she would not take from any other hand. Holding the bottle in one hand and the spoon in the other he removed the cork with his teeth and held it there. The sister of the little sufferer was watching the operation and offering childish sympathy. Some word or gesture on her part seemed to Dr. Bothwell very ludicrous and he threw back his head with the hearty laugh characteristic of him. In an instant the in-draught of air carried the cork down his throat. It set him coughing violently, but the only result was to carry the cork from his throat to the windpipe.

The serious nature of the accident was not realized for some hours, but when the coughing was continued and the cork was not ejected the family physician was summoned. He attempted to reach the obstruction with a long forceps but could not touch it. He thought that nature would eventually eject the cork by natural means and as it was then causing no pain, was allowed to remain. On the following Sunday Dr. Bothwell preached twice as usual but after the evening service he was again seized with a violent fit of coughing. Other physicians were called into consultation and it was decided to perform an operation. Dr. Bothwell went to a hospital, where a small cork screw protected by a flexible tube was passed down the trachea. It reached the cork and took hold of it, but the top of the cork broke off and all further attempts to reach it failed. Several operations were performed without success. The cork then was effectually shutting out the supply of air from one lung and the other lung was doing the work of two. The patient su-ferred intensely and grew gradually weaker until on Sunday, May 3 he died.

During his illness his patience and Christian cheerfulness were most exemplary. His intimate friend, the Rev. W. T. Stokes, pastor of Bushwick Avenue Congregational Church, who was continually by his bedside, speaks pathetically of the faith and trust in God which the brave man manifested in that trying time when he realized that his life and work were to be prematurely ended.

Dr. Bothwell was only forty years of age. He was a native of Marion County, Ohio. He studied at Adrian College, Mich., and subsequently at Yale Theological Seminary. After laboring in a church in Ohio, and afterward at Portland, Mich, he went South to accept the Presidency of Southern University, New Orleans. Some years of successful labor there were followed by a pastorate of a Congregational church, at Oakland, Cal. He remained there until last June, when he accepted an invitation to become pastor of the Church of the Covenant in Brooklyn. Happily those who suffer most—his grief-stricken family and his sorrowing church—know that nothing happens to a good man without the consent of a loving Father and their faith enables them to bear their affliction with Christian resignation.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

Family Likeness—Gen. O. O. Howard's Appeal—A Suit Dismissed—A Dog in Church—A Fatal Valley.

PHOTOGRAPHIC Test of a popular theory has been made by the Photographic Association of Geneva. The result is quoted by the Youth's Companion. It appears that the statement was put forth at a recent meeting of the Association that a man and woman who have been married a great many years grow to resemble each other, not only in manner and voice but actually as to features. The theory being disputed, it was decided to make a practical test with the camera. The photographs of seventy-eight elderly or very old married couples were taken, and an equal number of family groups. The result proved the theory, inasmuch as in twenty-four cases the resemblance between husband and wife was much greater than that between brother and sister, and in thirty cases more it was fully as great. The failure of the other twenty-four old couples to realize the expectations of those interested in the matter is supposedly due to "incompatibility of disposition," which time was apparently unable to combat in its effects. In the spiritual relation, of which marriage is a type, the resemblance is more than a theory—it is a promise. They who live near to their Lord are "changed into the same image." (II Cor. 3: 18.)

An Appeal on the Battlefield Saved a Young man from ruin some twenty-nine years ago. Gen O. O. Howard, speaking to an audience of young men in New York on May 11, said that at the battle of Five Oaks his arm was shot off and he was making his way to the hospital, weak from pain and loss of blood, when he saw a young man staggering along in a state of intoxication. He was so under the influence of whiskey that he could hardly walk. "As I came near him," said the General, "I stopped long enough to tell him it did not pay to drink. It would ruin him, and he had better stop before the habit had control of him. I passed on to the hospital, had my arm amputated, and was sent home to recover. I heard nothing more of the drunken soldier until a short time ago, when a letter from an officer in Washington told me his subsequent history. Impressed by the fact that in my wounded condition I had taken enough interest in him to stop and give him advice, he had then and there resolved to quit drinking. He kept his resolution, and when the war was over, settled down to a life of steady, honest hard work. He gradually rose, and the letter from Washington told me he had just died, a judge on the Supreme Bench in the State of New Hampshire, one of the foremost men in that Commonwealth." There is a lesson for Christian workers in the incident. If the interest of the wounded General could so impress that man, what must be the effect on the sinner of realizing that the Son of God so loved him as to die to save him. (Rom. 5: 8.)

A Proposal to Utilize Refuse and Transform a desert into a garden was under the consideration of financiers in New York last week. A man who has acquired a wide reputation as the manufacturer of a famous fertilizer is the originator of the plan. In common with other people who have been in the habit of passing near the meadows of Hackensack, N. J., he has noticed the foul odor which arises from the refuse that the tide washes up at that point. He offers to receive all this refuse if it can be delivered at his works and has devised a system of pipes by which it could be conveyed thither. When treated with chemicals, he says, it would make an excellent fertilizer, which would find a ready market. The land, which the refuse now makes an ill-smelling nuisance, would be benefited by the removal of the foul flotsam. It is, he contends, excellent soil, capable of producing fine fruits or flowers. By adopting his plan the refuse can be turned into money and the noxious desert be transformed into peach orchards and rose gardens. A plan thus doubly beneficent deserves our best wishes for its success. It is a type on a small scale of what will happen the world over when Christ comes. Then the things which now work iniquity will be made subservient to him and "the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose." (Isa. 35: 1.)

A Significant Decision was Given by a Judge of the Appellate Court in Chicago on May 5. A commission firm sued a number of dealers in corn for fees and money expended in arranging a corner in wheat. The judge decided against the claim, though he believed that under the terms of the contract the claimants were entitled to it. His reason for so deciding was that the whole transaction was intended to operate to the public detriment. Its object was to buy up a staple commodity, and by holding it create an artificial scarcity. If it had succeeded it would have compelled the public to pay any price the speculators chose to ask for a necessary of life. The law, the judge said, condemned such operations, and it would not "attempt to adjust differences which arise out of transactions which it condemns. It will leave the parties where their own conduct leaves them. It will not compel them to divide the plunder or share the loss of unlawful enterprise, neither will it require them to remunerate those, who, with full cognizance of the character of such undertaking, assist them with money or service." The same principle may explain the adversity into which Christian men sometimes fall and why their prayers are not answered. When a man is living in sin, and is breaking God's law in his dealings, God withholds his blessing, and will not grant his petitions, though he pleads the direct promises of the Bible. (Isa. 59: 2.)

A Dog's Fidelity to a Church is Mentioned among other reminiscences of past days by a writer in a Boston journal. He says that one of the most regular attendants at the Congregational Church of Greenfield Meadows, Mass., was a farmer who was always accompanied by his dog. At the commencement of the service the dog would go to the stairs of the old-fashioned pulpit and settle himself comfortably to sleep until the benediction was pronounced. After some years the building was renovated and the pulpit gave place to the modern platform. The dog was disconcerted on his first visit after the alterations but after searching vainly for his accustomed sleeping-place he contented himself with the steps by which the minister ascended the platform. His master died and the farm passed into the hands of a Baptist deacon. The dog stuck by the farm and on the first Sunday morning he trotted beside the wagon in which the deacon and his family went to church. But when the party reached the village the dog was puzzled. The family passed the church he had been accustomed to attend and proceeded to the Baptist Church. What passed through the canine mind no one can say, but he adhered to his old habit and entered the Congregational Church and curled himself up in his old familiar corner. He was there every Sunday in all weathers and continued to attend until he died. A man, in the dog's place, would probably have accepted the new creed when he had a new master; for men are apt to study their worldly interests in attending church. But too many are like him in making their attendance a matter of habit rather than of intelligent conviction. We are explicitly warned in God's Word that religion consists in something more than being in God's house and sitting before him as his people sit. (Ezek 33: 31.)

The Adventures of a Monarch in Disguise are described by a European correspondent of the Philadelphia Times. He says that the Emperor William, of Germany, was recently beset by several enemies of the Jewish race who urged him to a more severe execution of the anti-Semitic laws. A few days afterward disguised as a Jewish peddler he visited the haunts of the Jews of Berlin and conversed with some of the more intelligent members of the race about their business and their mode of life. On another occasion, in the disguise of a sailor he passed a day and a night in visiting the saloons patronized by sailors and common soldiers, discussing with the men whom he met the hardships and difficulties of their lot. He listened attentively to their stories and asked numbers of questions. He did not close his investigation until late at night, in a low saloon, he found himself among a company of drunken sailors, who insisted on his dancing with them. Then he seemed to remember his rank and abruptly quitted the place, followed by a couple of men who, until that moment, had appeared to be his half-intoxicated companions. Doubtless, he obtained much information on both subjects in his wanderings, but his knowledge of the condition of these classes of his subjects must be small compared with that which an actual experience of their lives could give him. The Christian in his trials and troubles is comforted by the knowledge that his King is able to sympathize with him in all things having been "tempted in all points like as we are." (Heb. 4: 15.)

The Valley of Death is the Name Given to a desert in California, which a United States Mineral Surveyor has recently explored. It acquired its name in 1850, when a party of emigrants, leaving the beaten track, attempted to cross it. They wandered for days without finding a stream or a green thing. Then, parched with thirst, physically exhausted, mentally deranged, they lay down beneath the blazing sun and died. Ever since that time the barren strip has been called Death Valley, and the mountains that border on the east, Funeral Range. The surveyor says: "I worked my party in the field in Death Valley with the thermometer at 130 in the shade. For two days and two nights in that same district the lowest point reached by the thermometer was 104 degrees Fahrenheit. In one part a small stream enters the valley. As it descends it forms a great swamp that spreads all over the valley, giving off a frightful odor of sulphureted hydrogen. One sinks up to one's knees in endeavoring to cross the swamp. Right above it is a salt crust a foot thick, surmounted by rough pinnacles of saline efflorescence. Enormous deadly snakes abound there." No one should enter the valley, the surveyor says, who is not well supplied with water, in barrels or canteens. His business was to look for minerals and geological specimens, and in that he was successful, but he advises everyone to be careful how they enter the valley. Similar advice is given in the Bible to those, who tempted by their love of gold, go to seek it in places where their souls are in danger. (I. Tim. 6: 10.)

THE TEMPLE REPAIRED.

S. S. LESSON FOR MAY 31, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
II. CHRON. 24 : 4-14. GOLDEN TEXT, II. COR. 9 : 7.

God's Order in Church-Building—The Living Church First—Afterward Its Habitation—Two Faithful Hearts in the Nation—Their Patient, Prayerful Waiting—The Young King Revealed—The Division of the Forces—The Coronation—A Solemn Covenant of Consecration—The Offerings for the Temple Restoration.

Church : man for the eye of other men. God's order is

First, a Living Church, then a tabernacle or a temple. He first brought out his people from Egypt, and drew them to himself, and then caused the tabernacle to be built. The Corinthians understood this principle ; when they gave of their substance to the Lord, they "first gave their own selves unto the Lord." (II. Cor. 8 : 5.) New spiritual life, souls awakened, saved and consecrated, a tide of self-denial and Christ-like life, revives and restores dead Churches. And as to the shell, the outward building, it is a small matter to set that right when a tide of life has set strongly from within.

Jehoram, the son of the good Jehoshaphat, had been united in marriage with the wicked Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel. (II. Chron. 21 : 6 ; 22 : 2, 3.) Ahaziah had succeeded him on the throne, and he walked also in "the ways of the house of Ahab, for his mother was his counselor to do wickedly." Jehu had slain Ahaziah, and the infamous Athaliah seized the opportunity to indulge her guilty dreams of ambition and power, by slaying all the seed royal, and grasping for herself the reins of government. All whom she slew were her own grandchildren or near relations, but this wicked woman had no heart. One daughter of King Jehoram, however, had married Jehoiada, the priest, apparently not the high priest, but one of the sons of Aaron who had remained true to God. She found Joash, one of the sons of the late king, who was but an infant, and hid him and his nurse in a bedchamber of the house of God ; and there he remained six years.

Meanwhile, Athaliah seemed to have everything her own way ; her sons had broken up the house of God, and had bestowed all the dedicated things of the Lord upon Baalim. But there were two hearts on which lay. Jehoiada and his wife prayed and wept in secret, and unknown to any others, they were loyal to the hidden king. Generally true revivals begin with the ones and twos who are true to God in the midst of a general lukewarmness and declension. Those who dare to acknowledge Jesus King, and to obey his laws, and maintain the honor of his kingdom, when they are misunderstood, and treated with contempt, or ignored altogether, and who, nevertheless, weep and pray over those around them, and sigh and cry for the abominations which are done in the land, form a nucleus round which other faithful souls will gather when God sees the time is come. Six years, waiting, six years, prayer, six years, patience, and still the King was hidden and unknown, still the temple was lying waste, still idolatry flourished, and evil had the upper hand ! No answer seemed to be given to their prayers, nothing was done, and the temptation may have been strong to yield to despair. John, the apostle, writing to the churches, signs himself : "Your brother and companion in tribulation, and in the Kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ." (Rev. 1 : 9.) Faith must be accompanied by patience, or it ceases to be faith. (Heb. 6 : 12-15 ; 10 : 35, 36.)

The Burden of the Lord

When everything was ripe for a real revival in Israel, Jehoiada began to move, himself moved undoubtedly by God. First he secured the military, then the Levites, then the chief of the fathers, then all the congregation ; "they made a covenant with the king in the house of God," "And he said unto them,

The King's Son Shall Reign

as the Lord hath said of the sons of David." There was no attempt to rebuild the walls, or repair the breaches in the temple, until the King's son was restored to office. This is a first essential. Wherever there is a proposal to build a new church, or restore an old one, let us first see how it stands as regards the King's Son. Has Jesus got his place and power with that congregation ? Are they loyal to him ? Are his laws respected ? Is his person loved ?

Then Jehoiada divided his forces. One-third were to be porters, and have charge of the doors. Unless a good force of evangelists keeps the doors and shows the way into the strait gate and the narrow way, a real revival does not take place. Then a third part were to be at the King's house, ready to his hand, the witnesses to loyalty and obedience ; and a third part were to be at the gate of the foundation, to keep out the world, and the flesh, and the devil. Every-one had something to do, "all the people shall be in the courts of the Lord." But only chosen ones, the priests and the Levites that minister, were to come into the house of the Lord, "for they are holy, but all the people shall keep the watch of the Lord." Where a real revival takes place, there is always a recognition of those who live really near the Lord—the true priests and the ministering Levites, to whom God has given their office as "a service of gift" (Num. 18 : 7), such may find an inside place in the house of God, and their work was to compass the King around about with their weapons in their hand, "the sword of the Spirit which is the Word of God" and prayer. These were to be with the King "when he cometh in, and when he goeth out," following "the Lamb whithersoever he goeth." No one else might enter the house of the Lord on pain of death.

Thus prepared, they held a grand coronation service, they "brought out the king's son, and put upon him the crown, and gave him the testimony, God's word, and made him king, and Jehoiada and his sons anointed him." False rule falls as the true rule is established. Let Christ reign, and he will tread all enemies under his feet. It is useless to attempt to overcome the evil in a church or nation so long as Christ is not supreme ; he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. Athaliah, who a few days previously reigned with undisputed sway, defying God and man with her impious pride, now fell an easy prey. The triumph of the wicked is short. "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further." God has a hook for the nose of those who may have served his purpose for the trial of his children and as soon as they presume upon their position and regard themselves as masters of the situation, God casts them down. Athaliah was slain, and not one adherent was found to take up her cause or avenge her death. Joash once crowned, the first act of his reign was a solemn covenant entered into between Jehoiada, the king, and the people, that they should be

The Lord's People.

But what about Baal ? Up to this time, Baal worship had been the state religion. During Athaliah's reign, oaths were sworn in Baal's name, the worship of Baal, not Jehovah was taught in the schools. But "the Lord's people" must worship the Lord, and him only must they serve. So the covenant, which had just been made, was confirmed by deeds which were consistent with it : "Then all the people went to the house of Baal, and broke it down, and brake his altars and his images in pieces, and slew Nathan the priest of Baal before the altars." But this was negative. Something positive was needed, and Jehoiada appointed the officers of the house of the Lord, and burnt-offerings were offered as the Lord had commanded by Moses. Without sacrifice, without the shedding of blood, the past could not be cleansed and put away, but now there was the real meeting place, the blood of sprinkling, established between the people and their God. The revival was in course, the king was upon the throne of the kingdom, the people of the land rejoiced, the city was quiet, Baal-worship was abolished, and Athaliah was dead. Now they could begin their church building.

Now the tide was turned, the current was at the other way ; now the people found it a joy and not a weariness to serve the Lord. It came first into the mind of the king to repair the temple of the Lord. In the first place, he sent priests and Levites to gather money from the people, but this plan of begging did not answer. Then he did what every king should do, he consulted the written Word of God, and found it written, "When thou takest the sum of the children of Israel after their number, then shall they give every man a ransom for his soul unto the Lord, when thou numberest them ; . . . every one that passeth among them that are numbered, from twenty years old and above, shall give an offering unto the Lord, the rich shall not give more, and the poor shall not give less than half a shekel, when they give an offering unto the Lord, to make an atonement for your souls. And thou shalt take the atonement money of the children of Israel and shalt appoint it for the service of the tabernacle of the congregation." (Ex. 30 : 12-16.)

Here then was God's own provision ; the king had God's authority to levy this tax. The money was paid to those who did the work, and more was brought than could be used. If we go God's way to work, he will bless us.

MRS. CARPENTER'S MISTAKE.

A Story of the Golden Text for May 31. "God loveth a cheerful giver." II. Cor. 9 : 7.

BY ALICE M. MUZZY.

"MIRANDY how do you do ? It was such a beautiful day I could not resist the temptation to come over and see you a bit. But law sakes, Mirandy, you do look terrible beat and not very glad I've come."

Miranda Carpenter stood on the doorstep of her farmhouse as her friend, the wife of a neighboring farmer, drove up in a narrow high-topped buggy. There was an unmistakable air of depression as her friend suggested, but she said, half mechanically :

"Oh, yes, I be, come in."

"Don't take me into the best room Mirandy. Let me come and set with you and help do whatever you were working on when I druv' up."

Mrs. Carpenter demurred, but her friend insisted with so much good nature that she was forced to yield and she led the way into an attic chamber where she was looking over wool that had come from the backs of some fine merino sheep and was to be done up in bundles for market.

"What beautiful fine wool this is, Mirandy !" exclaimed her friend enthusiastically.

Mrs. Carpenter's face grew longer and the cloud resting on her brow more heavy as she replied : "Oh, yes, but what's the good to us ? It ain't our'n."

"Why, how is that ?" asked her friend. "My husband and I have often admired your large flocks of sheep as we have seen them grazing in the fields."

"We ain't but two flocks," replied Mrs. Carpenter testily, "and Luther and me 'greed the proceeds of one we'd keep ; and the t'other we'd give towards building the new meetin' house. There were not nigh so many animal in this flock and I see to it when Luther was away that t'other flock were put in the best pasture; but for all that these critters have given twice as much and a great deal better wool. And I don't think it's fair! I asked Luther to change 'round only this morning. I told him the money from this wool would make our contribution to the meetin' house larger than any one's else in the parish and we only two folks to profit by it. If there were eight in our family as in the Browns, or twelve as in the Adams, why then we might be able to get our money's worth in time. But law! you might just as soon think to move a mountain as Luther when once he's sot. 'Mirandy,' says he, 'I should give that money if it beggared us!' and there was a terrible grim look about his mouth. I know he hates to give it just as much as I do, but he has more grit than I. This is just the way t'will be when Deacon Foote and Squire Rogers hear we have given such an amount; they'll just pat their fat pocket-books and say, 'Good enough for the Carpenters! Guess that won't be all they'll give.' And you see if their bank accounts will not go up, while their contributions will go down, and they a grinnin' in their sleeve at us all the while. I can stand being made fun of, for most anything except giving, and that's such an easily avoided failing I've never been open to ridicule on that point yet."

"I am sorry, Mirandy, you and Luther feel so, but as you do, I think you make a mistake to give the money."

"I only wish you could convince Luther of that," returned Mirandy, "to-morrow morning this wool is going to market."

"Isn't he out in the wood-shed?" asked the friend. "He will be coming in presently when we will talk the matter over together."

Luther Carpenter appeared where his wife and her friend were sitting and after the usual greetings his wife started the topic so near her heart by saying:—

"Chloe thinks along with me that it's a mistake to give the proceeds of this wool towards the meetin' house."

"Why how is that, sister Conrad, didn't I hear t'other day you were raising broods of fine turkeys and ducks to sell for the same cause?" asked Luther Carpenter in surprise. "I expected you'd talk very different to Mirandy. She's a little nigh, is Mirandy, and she don't need no encerridgment to withhold. That's natur' to her."

"No more than to yourself Luther Carpenter," returned his wife.

"I said to Mirandy just as I say to you, brother Carpenter," said the friend. "It is a mistake for you to give such an amount for the meetin' house when you're all the time hanging back and wishing you didn't have to. I am raising my turkeys and ducks to give to something I love. My regret is that I have so little to give."

At this moment the door opened and Mrs. Conrad's son, a lad of ten years, entered. He had driven his mother over and after fastening the horse had wandered out into the meadow gathering flowers. He had a handful of wild roses, field daisies, ferns, and wild parsnip, which he laid in his mother's lap. "Do you mean them all for me, my son?" the mother asked.

"Yes, and millions more I mean to pick for you," returned the boy, kissing his mother fondly.

"That is the spirit to have in our giving," resumed Mrs. Conrad, addressing Luther Carpenter. "We don't simply give to the meetin' house. We are giving to a loving Father who is filling our lives with blessings every day and hour, and after laying all we have before him, it should be our ardent wish to lay millions more there. Above all things I think we should beware of the dishonesty of giving when our hearts do not go with our gifts. What a terrible mistake to attempt to deceive God! Deacon Foote and Squire Rogers might be led to think us saints for our liberality, no matter what were our motives, but not so with our Father in Heaven. But there will be no trouble with our motives if we only dwell more on the great privilege to have frequent collections and appeals and opportunities of giving. It is the meagre and not the free givers who complain of so many calls."

"Don't say another word, sister Conrad," exclaimed Luther Carpenter decidedly. "I'm going to get a motto and hang it over our dining-room table so Mirandy and me can look on't three times a day and see if we can't be brought to a different frame of mind on this subject. I suppose you couldn't guess what that motto would be?"

"Law yes, I could," replied his wife briskly. "It would be, 'God loveth a cheerful giver,' and if you hadn't added 'and me,' after 'Mirandy,' I wouldn't looked at it once!"

EARTH'S RE-GENESIS.

Conditions and Characteristics of Life on the Renovated Earth.

BY REV. GEORGE C. NEEDHAM.

OUR planet having to undergo, as shown in former articles, a purgation by fire, we have now to consider what provision is made for those who pass over into the restored, and purified earth. We note that there is ample proof of God's illimitable resources.

What human mind would have conceived the design of carrying the righteous family of Noah out of the old condemned world into the new one? The great Lord does not need to repeat his miracles. As Enoch was caught away from impending judgment by translation, and as Lot was warned by angels to flee out of Sodom before the fiery rain had fallen on the guilty city, so will his people be guarded from every hurtful power which may be utilized for the earth's renovation.

If we allow that Omnipotence is unlimited, we can have no difficulty in believing that the mighty God can carry whom he will, through the fiery elements. Hananiah, Michael and Azariah, Daniel's companions, were cast into Nebuchadnezzar's seven-times heated furnace, but they came out loosed and unsinged. Not even was the smell of fire upon their garments. So also can the Almighty One use the fires which shall set free the planet from its consuming curse, to liberate from every binding power, political, social, or physical, the people or the nations who shall become the inheritors of the completed kingdom of God on the earth. That provision will be made for the righteous cannot be questioned. What meaneth such a promise as this of unlimited application:

"And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels; and I will spare them, as a man spareth his own son that serveth him" (Malachi 4: 2; 3, 17.)

The consideration of this weighty subject—"Earth's re-genesis," and its assured anticipation should fill the devout mind with serious and hallowed delight. Why must any believer set it aside as speculative or unpractical? The apostle Peter writing by the Spirit of God declares: "Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in holy conversation and godliness: looking for, and hasting unto the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved and the elements shall melt with fervent heat. Nevertheless, we according to his promise look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

It remains for me now in ending this exposition to briefly sketch some of the characteristic features which will distinguish the future and final ages of the earth from her present conditions.

I. Heaven and earth will come into closer union and communion. The Tabernacle of God will dwell with men. The New Jerusalem will descend out of heaven and be brought into view. Eden in its virgin purity and beauty, its gardens of delights with its tree of life, and its innocent occupiers was only a type, or resemblance of the more glorious and extensive Paradise that shall be. God's purpose in creation that a sinless race shall inherit the planet can never be thwarted. Satan with his allies, will be banished to the bottomless pit, completely routed and overthrown by the avenging sword of the Faithful and True—The Word of God—King of kings and Lord of lords.

II. There will be universal peace in the final age. Nation will not war with nation; strikes and strifes will cease from the earth. The Prince of Peace, will lift up his ensign—the Dove with the olive branch. No more battles, no more bloodshed.

III. It will be an era of great fertility. The whole land will yield its milk and honey. Food will be in abundance. Legislation will be proof against corruption; laziness will find no willing subjects on whom to fasten itself, and poverty will be unknown.

IV. Longevity will be restored to man. The life of a man will be as the tree of life, for death, the fruit of man's sin shall pass away with sin itself, and the fruits of righteousness shall abound. Health will be universal; none will be disabled by sickness, and the people will enjoy the work of their hands.

V. Harmony will again be established between the animals. All discord will forever terminate. The lion and the lamb will lie down together, and the lion will eat straw like the ox, for the monarch of the forest will also undergo a change in his nature, and become, as when first created, a graminivorous animal. A little child will play with the beasts, now most ferocious, and they will enjoy the long-lost companionship of man. The wolf shall dwell peacefully with the lamb who fears its gleaming teeth no more, while cow and bear fodder together and their young sport by their side. They shall not hurt, nor destroy, nor devour one another throughout the holy mountain, for the earth, with its regenerated populations, and restored animal creation, shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea.

And what shall I say more? Only this: That our planet, consecrated by the ministry and blood of Jesus, shall be thoroughly recovered from the dire curse and all its blighting effects. That as the First Adam lost the kingdom and dominion by transgression, both shall be restored and re-established by the Second Adam, the Lord from heaven. When he comes again to earth it will be for purposes of universal redemption. The Church now awaits her Lord; the Jew will then welcome his Messiah. Thereafter the nations will gladly receive the sovereign Monarch, while nature herself will joyfully recognize her Creator, who comes again to restore her to original power and blessedness. And further, as we anticipate his being honored who was once despised; how he shall be received who was once rejected; how he shall be crowned who was once insulted, and how he shall be enthroned who was once cast out of his kingdom, can we forbear to cry out of a heart loyal to him, and longing to see him duly exalted, "Come, Lord Jesus! Come quickly." Yea, come Creator, Redeemer, Sovereign, who didst weep thy tears, and offer thy prayers, and pour out thy blood upon our sin-cursed earth, come back again to redeem her from all evil. Thou who art earth's rightful king to thee we pray "Thy Kingdom come." The gold, and the silver, and the brass, and the iron and the clay cannot endure; yea, all earthly governments are but failing experiments, but thy name, and thy throne, and thy kingdom shall endure forever. Return, return, O Shulamite, for when thou comest again thou wilt wipe away all tears; thou wilt comfort every broken heart; thou wilt soften every grief; thou wilt ease every pain; thou wilt heal every disease. Neither shall there be any more death, nor mourning, nor funerals, nor suffering, nor sin; for these old things shall pass away, and there shall be new heavens, and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness.

WHERE TO GO.

THE question is coming up in many households as to the best mode of vacation.

We shall all need rest. The first thing to do is to measure the length of your purse; you cannot make a short purse reach around Saratoga and the White Mountains. There may be as much health, good cheer and recuperation in a country farm-house where the cows come up every night and yield milk without any chalk in it. What the people of our cities need is quiet. What the people of the country need is sight-seeing. Let the mountains come to New York and New York go to the mountains. The nearest we ever get to heaven in this world is lying flat down on our back under a tree, looking up through the branches, five miles off from a post-office or a telegraph station. But this would be torture to others. Independent of what others do or say, let us in the selection of summer recreations study our own temperament and finances. It does not pay to spend so much money in July and August that you have to go pinched and half-mad the rest of the year. The healthiest recreations do not cost much. In boyhood, with a string and a crooked pin attached to it, we fished up more fun from the mill-pond than one summer with a fifteen-dollar apparatus we caught among the Franconia Mountains. There is a great area of enjoyment within the circumference of one dollar if you only know how to make the circuit. More depends upon ourselves than upon the affluence of our surroundings. If you are compelled to stay at home all summer, you may be as happy as though you went away. The enjoyment of the first of August, when we go off, is surpassed by nothing but the first of September when we come home.

A WIDE GOSPEL.

IF it had been possible, religion would have been monopolized. Some would have said:

"Let us have all this to ourselves—no publicans, no plebeians, no lazzaroni, no converted pickpockets. We will ride toward heaven on fierce chargers, our feet in golden stirrups. Grace for lords, and dukes, and duchesses, and Counts. Let Napoleon and his marshals come in, but not the common soldier that fought under him. Let the Girards and Barings come in, but not the stevedores that unloaded their cargoes, or the men who keep their books." Heaven would have been a glorified Windsor Castle, or Tuilleries, or Vatican; and exclusive people would have strutted through the golden streets to all eternity. Thank God, there is mercy for the poor! The great Dr. John Mason preached over a hundred times the same sermon; and the text was: "To the poor the Gospel is preached." Lazarus went up, while Dives went down; and there are candidates for imperial splendors in the back alley, and by the peat fire of the Irish shanty. King Jesus set up his throne in a manger, and made a resurrection day for the poor widow of Nain, and swung the gate of heaven wide open. I can snatch the knife from the murderer's hand while it is yet dripping with the blood of his victim, and tell him of grace that is sufficient to pardon his soul. Do you say that I swing open the gate of heaven too far? I swing it open no wider than Christ, when he says: "Whosoever will, let him come."

The nations of the earth will one day come into this refuge. The windows of heaven will be opened; God's trumpet of salvation will sound, and China will come from its tea-fields and rice-harvests, and lift itself up into the light. India will come forth; the chariots of salvation jostling to pieces her Juggernauts. Freezing Greenland, and sweltering Abyssinia will, side by side, press into the kingdom; and transformed Bornesian cannibals will preach of the resurrection of the missionaries they have slain. The glory of Calvary will tinge the top of the Pyrenees; and Lebanon cedars shall clap their hands; and by one swing of the sickle Christ shall harvest nations for the skies. I sing of a world to be redeemed. In the rush of the winds that set the forest in motion, like giants wrestling on the hills, I see the tossing up of the triumphal branches that shall wave all along the line of our King as he comes to take empire. In the stormy diapason of the ocean's organ, and the more gentle strains that in the calm come sounding up from the crystal and jasper keys at the beach, I hear the prophecy: "The earth shall be filled with the knowledge of God as the waters fill the sea." Come in, Black Hottentot and snow-white Caucasian; come in, mitred official and diseased beggar; let all the world come in. Room in Castle Jesus! Sound it through all lands; sound it by all tongues. Let sermons preach it, and bells chime it, and pencils sketch it, and processions celebrate it.

DEAD BEATS.

THE commercial world has a significant term which it applies, not to the unfortunate and distressed, but to those who are exertionless in their mishap, and who succumb to adversity, expecting others to do for them what they ought to do for themselves. They have a genius for borrowing money. They are persistent bores. You know them a block away, and wish they would always stay that distance. They are among business men called "Dead Beats." Almost every Church has an element corresponding to that. These are they, who, notwithstanding they have means, pay no pew rent where the pews are let, or contribute nothing where everything is voluntary. They are voluble in prayer, mighty in religious gab, make a big swash, but do nothing for religious institutions. They pray that the pastor may "be blessed in his basket and store," but do nothing to keep him from starving to death. They do not recognize the fact that there is a religion in giving and a wickedness in withholding. The furnaces would go out for lack of coal, and the lamps for lack of oil, and the church be shut in six weeks, if it depended upon their contribution. The poor must have the Gospel preached to them, and the penniless must be welcomed; but there are not more than ten people in any church who cannot give something. If a man cannot give a hundred dollars a year he can give three cents. Woe, then, be to him if he do not give the three cents. We never like to hear a man pray who takes it all out in prayer. It is all folly for a man to pray for the world's conversion unless he gives something toward it. The man whose income is not more than two hundred dollars a year ought to give some of it to God. One of the great wants of the Church everywhere is to get rid of its "Dead Beats."

BRIEF NOTES.

Evangelist J. H. Weber has just closed a series of meetings at Bristol, Conn. Over three hundred persons were led to seek the Saviour during his visit.

Rev. Jacob Freshman has had the happiness of baptizing four new converts from Judaism. His work at his Hebrew Christian Church, 17 St. Mark's Place, is being much blessed among the Jews of New York.

The corner-stone of the New Collegiate Church at Second Avenue and Seventh Street, New York, was laid with appropriate ceremonies on May 17. Drs. Thomas E. Vermilye, Talbot W. Chambers and Edward B. Coe, officiated. The order of service was that prescribed by the Liturgy of the Reformed Church in America.

The sixty-sixth anniversary of the American Tract Society, was celebrated on May 13th, in the Madison Square Presbyterian Church, New York. The report showed that during the past year the Society had spent $23,176.30 for literature and had circulated 84,719 volumes. The income of the benevolent department had been $151,016.99, and that of the business department $258,777.47.

Mr. James Cannon, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Evangelist has been laboring successfully during the past week at the "Home Camp-meeting" at Bedford St. M. E. Church, New York. On May 10, the altar was crowded in the morning with Christians seeking a new baptism of the Holy Spirit. A revival service for the Sunday school was held in the afternoon, and at night there was a rich harvest of souls. Meetings were held every evening during the week with large attendance and great blessing.

The Presbytery of New York, on May 12, received the majority and the minority reports of the committee appointed to consider the case of Prof. Charles A. Briggs, D. D., of Union Theological Seminary. The question submitted to the committee was whether the views expressed by Dr. Briggs in his inaugural address were in accord with the Confession of Faith. The majority report, which was signed by three members of the committee—Drs. G. W. F. Birch, J. J. Lampe and J. J. Stevenson—practically declared Dr. Briggs heterodox, and recommended "that the Presbytery enter at once upon the judicial investigation of his case." The Presbytery adopted this report by a vote of 44 to 30, and a committee was appointed to formulate the charges. The minority report, which the Presbytery rejected, was a defence of Dr. Briggs, and was signed by Dr. J. H. McIlvaine, only.

Rev. B. Fay Mills has been wonderfully blessed at Cleveland, Ohio. He commenced services in the East End at the beginning of April, eleven churches uniting in the work. From the first there was a manifest evidence of the presence of the Holy Spirit. On the second day of the services the inquirers numbered over a hundred, and at the end of the week Mr. Mills had in his possession fourteen hundred cards, signed by persons earnestly desiring to lead a Christian life. On April 10, the evangelist commenced work on the West Side, ten churches uniting, and the results were equal to those on the East Side. A third series was held in the centre of the city, and again a similar number were brought in. Altogether forty-five churches have united in the work, and it is believed that during the four weeks fully six thousand persons have confessed Christ. At the meetings in the Music Hall, holding nearly five thousand persons, every inch of available space was filled, and numbers were unable to gain admission.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Blaine and Gladstone Both Ill.—The Attack on the Czarewitch—A Unique Design at the World's Fair—The Chase of the Contraband Steamer "Itata"—A Greenland Explorer—Great Western Forest Fires, &c.

O Many Designs have been Submitted to the managers of the Columbian Exposition at Chicago, that it has been a very difficult task to decide upon the most suitable styles for the different structures proposed to be erected. One of the most unique will be the Procter Tower (see illustration), which is to have an altitude of 1150 feet or 150 feet higher than the great Eiffel Tower of Paris. It will be built of railroad iron and concrete, with a superstructure of steel, and will be shipped to the Fair grounds during the present summer in sections, ready for fitting together. The base will enclose a square, five acres in extent, with a foundation of stone masonry sunk seventeen feet below the surface. The central space of 400 feet square, elegantly floored and with marble walls, will accommodate the engines and dynamos. Ten elevators will continually run and on the top will be an observatory with telescopes and an exhibit of the Signal Service system in operation. On the second floor several thousand persons can dine simultaneously at an altitude of four hundred feet. Apropos, a Chicago Syndicate has asked the Italian government to sell the Colosseum which they will remove and re-erect at the Fair.

President Harrison was Affected to Tears when at the end of his Western trip, he reached Montezuma, Ind., on the return journey and was greeted by his old neighbors. All his oratory forsook him when the familiar faces crowded around him and the well-known voices were heard. His progress through the West has been marked by a series of brilliant receptions. At Springfield, Ill., the party stopped long enough to permit the President to pay a tribute to Lincoln's memory. The party arrived at Washington on Friday, May 15.

Portugal, Till Now Considered One of the quietest and most conservative governments in Europe, has experienced a very remarkable panic during the past week. A colossal deficit was discovered in the national finances, the result of ruinous loans contracted upon humiliating terms. This disclosure shook public confidence and the sequel was a condition of affairs which affected every branch of commerce and industry. Portuguese securities in Paris, London, Frankfurt and other financial centres rapidly declined. At one time, as the news that national bankruptcy had overtaken Portugal, a panic was threatened in Paris, but the flurry was soon over. Russia contributed to the general uneasiness by withdrawing large amounts of gold on deposit in London. Meanwhile revolutionary talk goes on at Lisbon and it is said that King Carlos has expressed his readiness to abdicate, whenever his ministers shall so advise.

A Terrible Visitation of Fire has Afflicted parts of Pennsylvania and Michigan during the past week, caused by forest conflagrations spreading to the villages and hamlets along the line of the railroads, and doing enormous damage. No such destructive forest fires have been known since 1871. In Michigan, the towns of Clinton, Walkerville and Bear Lake—all composed of frame buildings—have been swept away, involving barns, houses, stores, churches and mills, with many millions of feet of lumber. At different points the residents have had a heartrending experience, fighting off the fire to save their homes and their families. In all, nearly twenty villages have suffered in Michigan alone, and many lives have been lost in the flames. In Pennsylvania the lumber and farming towns of Austin, Costello, Galtion and Moore's Run were almost destroyed. At Moore's Run, seven train men, who were fighting back the fire, which had communicated with a train on the Sinnamahoning Valley Railroad, were burned to death, and about thirty other employees on the train were seriously injured. Forty million feet of hemlock and timber, piled at different points along the line, were consumed. At Huntington, Oil City, Warren and other points, the people were almost panic stricken by the imminence of the fiery cordon all around them. Forest fires have also done considerable damage on the line of the Erie Railroad in New York State, one lumber company alone losing twenty million feet of lumber during the week. A farmer in Tioga County, named Allison Banks, was roasted to death in the presence of his family while fighting the fire in the woods near his farm.

It is Announced by the Academy of Natural Sciences, at Philadelphia, that the expedition to be commanded by Lieut. Robert E. Peary, U. S. Navy, will sail from New York for Greenland about June 1. The programme of the expedition has already been outlined in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Lieutenant Peary, who is a sturdy American of forty, will be accompanied by a party of scientists appointed by the Academy and a crew of eight Northmen. The explorers will endeavor to reach the southern end of Greenland on snowshoes, over the inland ice. Their winter quarters will be near the famous Humboldt Glacier, whence next spring they expect to penetrate south as far as the DeLong Fiord and so on to the terminus of Greenland. Sledges will be used where practicable on the inland ice. In the illustration in this column, Lieut. Peary is shown in Arctic travelling costume with his sledge and ice skates.

Secretary Blaine was Suddenly Prostrated, last week, an event which caused a great deal of uneasiness among the officials at Washington, and no little concern throughout the country. He had arrived in New York City intending to see his daughter off to Europe, and while dining with Mr. Andrew Carnegie, the ironmaster, he was suddenly seized with vertigo and removed to bed. Three physicians were called, and were in constant attendance for three days, after which he was pronounced out of danger. Absolute quiet and rest have been recommended. Mr. Blaine's illness, the physicians declare, has been brought about by recent overwork, which has weakened him, and unsettled both mind and body. Simultaneously with the illness of our Premier, comes the news of Mr. Gladstone's sudden prostration from almost similar causes.

In Europe, "The Coming War" seems to absorb every other topic. There is little doubt that all the great powers are straining every nerve to be in readiness for the struggle, which will be a terribly violent one when it comes. Some of the weapons that have been placed in the hands of the German reserves are of such fearful execution as to make even veterans shudder. The new rifle carries a bullet about an inch long and as thick as a good-sized pencil, yet this insignificant missile will penetrate earthworks at a distance of 150 metres, and at 170 metres has passed through five knapsacks, ranged sidewise. Even at a distance of 2000 metres, it penetrates a human body. Such weapons go far toward rendering the game of war too horrible even for the indulgence of even the most aggressive nations.

Assassination Haunts the Royal House of the Romanoffs.

An attempt was made on the life of the Czarewitch at Otsu, near Kioto, Japan, a few days ago, which, but for the timely arrival of help, would have left the Czar without an heir-apparent. A Japanese political fanatic, armed with a short, two-edged sword, attacked the prince, who defended himself bravely until his assailant was driven off. He sustained painful injuries, the worst being a sword-cut on the side of the face. This unfortunate affair temporarily stops the progress of the prince's tour. He has already visited India and various other dependencies of the British Empire, and lately started from Hong Kong, for Japan, whence he intended to proceed to Omsk in Eastern Siberia. Everywhere the authorities of the different countries guarded his person with the utmost care, evidently fearing an attack from some quarter. His attendants, including Prince George of Greece, Princes Ouktomsky, Bariatinsky, Katchubey, and Oblensky, were constantly by his side. The attack came at last from an unexpected quarter, the would-be assassin being a native Japanese policeman, named Tsuda Sanzo, who was accompanying the party on a sight-seeing trip. The Czarewitch (whose portrait is given above), is physically the reverse of his father, being a rather weak and puny youth, while the Emperor Alexander is a giant in strength.

Naval Authorities at Washington are Anxiously watching the result of the stern chase of the Chilean steamer Itata by the U. S. cruiser Charleston, which set out in pursuit of the fugitive thirty-six hours after the former had sailed, with a cargo of arms and ammunition for the Chilean rebels. The Itata is a slow steamer and there is a probability that she may be overtaken. Orders are said to have been issued at Washington to capture her at all hazards. Besides the Charleston the U. S. Steamer San Francisco will likely join the pursuit and the two will be reinforced by the American squadron in Chilean waters which has been ordered to keep a sharp lookout for the Itata. What makes the situation doubly interesting is the fact that the rebel war steamer Esmeralda is lying off Cape San Lucas to assist the fugitive, and should the Esmeralda meet with any of the United States vessels while the latter are engaged in following the Itata, a sharp fight is not improbable. The Itata is known to be well armed, having ten mounted guns and about one hundred and fifty of a crew. Her shipment consisted of 1,000 rifles and two and a half million cartridges, all intended for the use of the rebel army in Chili. The Charleston is shown in the illustration. A sensational rumor was current that the Itata had been overtaken and sunk.

GOD AS AN ENEMY.

A NEW SERMON PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

Desperate Plight of a Man who has God for his Enemy—God's Hatred of Sin—I. A Text for God's Offending Children—For Christians who Rebel—Affliction Befalling Them—The Comfort of the Holy Spirit Withheld—Punishment: an Evidence of Sonship—II. For Outsiders—Discoveries Made in the Conflict—A Man Spoiled at the Tabernacle—III. Those who Die Impenitent.

"But they rebelled, and vexed his Holy Spirit: therefore he was turned to be their enemy, and he fought against them." Isaiah 63: 10.

THIS is a terrible case. When God is turned to be a man's enemy and fights against him, he is in a desperate plight. With other enemies we may contend with some hope of success, but not with the Omnipotent. The enmity of others is an affliction, but the enmity of God is destruction. If he turns to be our enemy, then everything is turned against us. The stars in their courses fight against us, and the stones in the fields are in league for our stumbling. "If God be for us, who can be against us?" But if God be against us, who can be for us? The words read like a funeral knell: "He was turned to be their enemy, and he fought against them."

God is not Indifferent.

This shows us that God is not indifferent to sin. Men may try to persuade themselves that God does not care; that it is nothing to him how men act, whether they break or keep his laws. Men may plead that he is "kind to the unthankful and to the evil," and the same event happens unto all, both to the righteous and to the wicked; and so indeed it seems for the present. Our shortsightedness may even assure us that the ungodly prosper, and have the best of it; but this is only our blindness. God hates sin now and always. He would not be God if he did not. God is stirred with righteous indignation against every kind of evil: it moves his Spirit to anger. Some believe in an impassive God; but certainly the God of the Bible is never so described. He is represented in Holy Scripture after the manner of men; but how else could he be represented to men? If he were represented after the manner of God, you and I could understand nothing at all of the description; but as he is represented to us in Scripture, the Lord notes sin, feels sin, grows angry with sin, is provoked, and his Holy Spirit is vexed by the rebellion of men.

The Unpopular Truth.

Having said these two or three things as a helpful commencement, I would invite you to consider this remarkably impressive verse with very great reverence and awe. The current idea now is, "Never preach anything that is dreadful or terrible. If you do you will earn as bad a character as Spurgeon." Now, I am not ashamed, in the least degree, to have a bad character for preaching against the evil of sin, and declaring the sure punishment of it. What have I to gain by such preaching? Shall I get the applause of men? Nay, the whole current of this generation's liking rushes the other way. Let the preacher tell men that they may live as they like, and that it will come all right in the long run, and that will please them. Universal salvation is a very popular doctrine among the "cultured" folk. I want none of your popularity. I will preach to you, as long as this tongue moves in my head, God's truth, whether it offend or please; and the day shall declare who best loved your souls—those who could flatter, or those who spoke unpalatable truth.

I. First, my text belongs to

The Lord's Offending Children,

Let me try to find them out, and lay this text home to them. There are some of God's own people—really converted, saved people—who have, nevertheless, degenerated into such a state of sin that the Lord is turned to be their enemy. If you read this chapter, you will see that it is so. Is it not shocking that the people of God should backslide? Is it not sad that they who have eaten the bread of heaven should hunger for the ashes of this world; that men who have lain in the bosom of Christ should, nevertheless, play the traitor to him, and provoke his anger? Yet it is so, sadly so; we have seen it so in others. God grant that it may not be so with us!

Well, then, what happened? Now we come to the text indeed: "He was turned to be their enemy and he fought against them." This is the story in many cases. He sends affliction. There come upon the man's harvest the palmerworm, and the caterpillar, and the cankerworm. There come upon his business a blight and a blast. He cannot make it out; for where everything seemed to go well, all affairs now go amiss. All that he gets is like money poured into a bag that is full of holes. Seeing that he is a child of God, and has become a rebel, he has vexed God's Spirit, and upon him. Perhaps he is brought low by a painful disease. Perhaps a dear child is taken away. Affliction comes into the family one way or another: not the affliction of Job, which tried him for God's glory; but the affliction of Jacob, who was afflicted in his family because that family had become defiled with sin. God is jealous, and deals severely with his erring children.

He sends them affliction: but worse than that, he turns to be their enemy, and he fights against them by withholding the comforts of the Holy Spirit. Oh, how they once enjoyed a sermon! it was full of grace and truth. They do not enjoy it now. The same preacher; other people are edified as much as before; but they are not. Such a man goes to pray; but he feels no Spirit pleading within. He reads the Bible, and it is a dead letter. He seeks the company of Christian people, but their society is dreary to him, and yields no solace. God has shut up the windows of heaven. He has made the angels cease to bring down blessings by the way of the golden ladder. God has turned to be his enemy and fights against him. I have known cases in which true people of God (I know they were the true people of God, for they have come back, and they never did lose the life of God, even when they were away from him) have come to this—that God has fought against them in their prayers, and they seemed to pray like a man shouting inside a great copper caldron, where every sound echoes in his ears like thunder.

A Sign of Sonship.

I charge you that are the people of God to mind what you are at; for God, who loves you, will deal roughly with you if you sin against him. Remember that text, "You only have I known of all the families of the earth: therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities." As I have often said, if a man saw a boy in the street breaking windows, or doing mischief, he might say very little to him; but if he was his own boy, he would give him a smart blow, and send him home; and so it is when the Lord catches his own children sinning. He may let the common sinner go on, and sin until judgment shall be executed; but as for his own children, they cannot transgress with impunity. "He was turned to be their enemy."

At such times if they still pursue any Christian career of usefulness, they are smitten with great barrenness, and their work is without efficacy. I should greatly sorrow if my words brought bruising to the tenderest of God's people; but yet I know that it is so. If the preacher leaves his God, his God will leave him to preach in vain. If the teacher quits the Saviour, the Saviour will quit the teacher; and leave him, or her, to fail with the children. What generally happens with a minister when God has gone? Well, instead of going to God, and humbling himself and crying to him for mercy, he resolves that he will buy a new organ. That will do the trick. The new organ, after all, blow it as they may, does not come to much. Well, then, he will have sensational entertainments, a Sunday-evening concert—fiddling, or something or other. If God will not help him, he is in the same plight as Saul the son of Kish. He will try music first, and if that does not render him aid, he will go to the witch of Endor, now called "modern theology," and ask assistance there. God have mercy upon us, if we ever do that! O child of God, do not try to do without God! Do not bring in new inventions to patch up the breach that your sin has made. If the Lord turns to be your enemy, and fights against you, bow and confess your wrong.

Love Disguised.

I leave this point when I have made solemn inquiry. Am I speaking to any Christian man or woman to whom this text is sorrowfully true? Is not sin the cause of your sorrow? beseech you, do not trifle with this matter. It is a very solemn thing to have God fighting against you. Say to him, "Shew me wherefore thou contendest with me." But do not despair. If the Lord had meant to destroy you, he would have sternly said, "He is joined to idols: let him alone." To leave a man altogether alone is God's ultimatum with the hopeless; but to flog the wanderer back to his Lord is love in a mask. The wise man can see beneath the mask, and understand that it is because God would not destroy you with the wicked that therefore he now brings you under the discipline of his family, and makes you feel that sin and smart must go together in an heir of heaven. Seek you the Lord; cry unto him; and confess your sin.

The parable of the prodigal son belongs much more to you than it does to an unconverted person; for you can call God "Father," and you may come back to him as a son; for you are his son, notwithstanding all your riotous living in the far country, and all your wasting of your Father's substance. Arise, and go to him at once.

You Know the Way.

You know your Father: fly to him immediately. Put your head into his bosom, and sob out your confession, "Father, I have sinned;" and before this present service is over, you shall receive your Lord's full absolution, and you shall feel yourself—

To your Father's bosom pressed,
Once again a child confessed;
From his house no more to roam,
But with God to rest at home.

God will soon put away the rod when you put away the sin. If he does not stay the chastisement, you will patiently bear it, and bless him that he has forgiven you; for that is the chief thing to be thought of. As a rule, the Lord ceases to fight against the man who ceases from sin; but if he does not, prostrate yourself before him. He has no pleasure that you should suffer: as his dear child he would have you happy. He is grieved that you should wander away from him. Come back at once, backslider; come back even now. The Lord enable you to do so now, for Jesus' sake!

For Outsiders.

II. The text is true to those who cannot say that they are the people of God, who would give their eyes if they could. Many an awakened sinner feels that he has rebelled, and vexed God's Holy Spirit, and now he feels that God has turned to be his enemy, and is fighting against him by sending him trouble. Yes, he was getting on splendidly, and his prosperity was a snare to him. He had plenty of money, and therefore he could go into every place of amusement and every haunt of vice. Now he mourns an empty pocket. To-night he hardly knows where he is going to find a lodging. He was a young gentleman once, but he has to herd with beggars now. Yes, many and many a man has been brought down, by lechery and drunkenness, to the lowest abyss of penury. God has turned to be his enemy, for all things fail him: he has tried to get a situation, and he cannot; he has worn his boots off his feet, and he cannot find work to do.

Perhaps I speak to some young woman here whose course has been far away from God; and she, too, has come down in another sense. Health is gone. Alas, for that laughing girl! That hectic flush upon her cheek tells that the worm is within the fruit. Poor soul! she is sickening. She will pass away, and she is still without hope. God has turned to be her enemy (so she thinks), and he fights against her, for the medicine is of no use to her; while other people seem to have been cured, she remains as sickly as ever. There are those here against whom God has been fighting of late; and when God fights, it is not child's play, nor mere buffeting: he fights indeed.

A Man Spoiled.

In the progress of this battle you may have suffered very serious damage. There came a man into this Tabernacle, some years ago, who said, "I got spoiled one Sunday morning. I came into this Tabernacle, and I thought that I was as good a man as any tradesman within fifty miles of the place." Said he, "I went out spoiled; for I was made to confess that I was as bad as anybody in Newington, or within a thousand miles of the place." That is what comes to us when God begins to fight against our self-righteousness.

At such times, when God is fighting against a man, his inward sorrows seem to increase. His memory shouts at him, "Remember this! Remember that! Remember the other! Remember that night of sin! Remember that day of rebellion!" His fears rise up and stalk like grim ghosts before him. His hopes, that once sang sweetly siren songs, now turn their sonnets into dirges. His expectations fail. The man's thoughts are all a case of knives, cutting his soul at every point. O sirs, when God besieges the town of Mansoul, he sets his batteries against every gate. His artillery is turned against every part of the wall. His big shells burst in the centre of the heart. When he goes forth to battle, it shall be terrible for the man against whom he fights.

Discipline for the Obstinate.

I hear you say to me, "You are giving a very terrible description." I am not describing everybody that is saved. Many come to Christ very readily, and simply trust in him, and live at once. But, my hearer, you are not of that tender sort. You would not come. A mother's tears could not persuade you, your teacher's exhortations could not induce you; even the gentler dealings of God could not drive or draw you; and you have lived in sin till at last God has taken you in hand. Your conscience is aroused; you cannot go on any longer as you now are.

Oh, dear hearts, if God fights against you, throw down your weapons! Pull those feathers out of your caps! Down on your faces before him! Yield, and when you have yielded he will do you no harm; but he will stoop over you, and lift you up, and forgive you. The woman taken in adultery in the presence of Christ is a sample of what he will do with you, taken in the very act of rebellion against him. The tender Saviour said, "Neither do I condemn thee: go, and sin no more!" Dear soul, yield, yield, yield! Make no excuse. Offer no extenuation. Yield to the omnipotence of God, which, in your case, will be omnipotent love. He has wounded, and he will heal. He has torn you, and he will bind you up. "The Lord killeth, and maketh alive: he woundeth and his hands make whole."

I leave off when I have warned you to watch carefully that you do not go into sin. It is a blessed thing to be forgiven; but it is a more blessed thing to be kept from sin. Oh, what agony, what mischief, I have seen brought upon individuals and families by acts of carelessness which have afterwards led to acts of licentiousness! Steer clear of the lesser forms of sin, lest you so vex the Spirit that he shall turn to be your enemy, and fight against you.

III. Lastly, this text is a very dreadful one in reference to

Those who Die Impenitent.

Concerning those who die impenitent, what shall we say? What ought to be the truth about them? You—I speak only now of those who have heard the Gospel, of such as are sitting in this Tabernacle, where the warning and the promise are set before them—if you die impenitent, having wilfully rejected the great sacrifice of Christ, you will die with a vengeance. Jesus Christ has died, and you have refused the merit of his blood. You have wilfully and wickedly done despite to the mercy of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost; and this is in addition to all your other sins. Now, let me ask you—What is to be done with the man who will not have mercy when it is set before him? If a convicted criminal is invited to confess and receive pardon, and he will not do it, what remains but to carry out the sentence? Both justice and injured mercy require that it should be so.

When a man gets into the next world, who dies refusing Christ, and rejecting divine mercy, he will fight against God there, and, according to his ability, he will be a greater sinner there than here. If you will turn to this Book, you will not find between these two covers a solitary ray of hope for a man who dies without God, and without Christ.

At once look to Jesus crucified—Jesus crucified for the guilty, Jesus who came into the world, took our nature, and bare our sin and shame. He cries from the cross, "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth." I cannot speak to you like an angel from heaven, but I speak to you like a sinner saved from hell; and I implore you to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and you shall be saved; God bless you!

THE LATE DR. SAPHIR.

STUDENTS of the Bible in all lands will regret to learn that the famous Biblical scholar and earnest evangelical preacher is dead. He had never experienced robust health, but he seemed to possess so much mental and spiritual vitality that his physical frame partook of the vigor of his intellectual manhood, and retained its youthful freshness. The death of his wife, however, a short time ago, affected him deeply. Everyone could see that he had sustained a severe shock and he did not recover from the prostration which resulted from it.

Dr. Saphir, who at the time of his death, was sixty years of age, was a native of Hungary. He was of Jewish extraction, but embraced Christianity in his youth. He was at that time studying in the University of Berlin. He accepted the doctrine of Christ's propitiatory sacrifice in all its fulness, and resolved that all his future life should be given to preaching Christ and him crucified. He determined to go to Scotland to study, believing that there he could best obtain the help necessary to fit him for his life-work. He studied at Glasgow, and afterward at Edinburgh. His first sphere of labor after his ordination was among the German Jews of Hamburg, but after a time he returned to Scotland, where he prepared a series of tracts designed to meet Jewish difficulties in accepting Christ, and to convince God's chosen people that Jesus of Nazareth was he of whom Moses and the prophets did write. They were written in Hebrew, but were subsequently translated into English, Dutch and German, and were extensively circulated with the best results. A series of lectures on the Old Testament attracted public attention to Dr. Saphir, and he was urged to settle in England. He joined the Presbyterian Church and ministered at South Shields, and afterward in London. His learning and skill as a logician were much blessed wherever he labored, and were the means of winning many souls to Christ.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

The Man of Tarsus.*

IN one of his letters St. Paul describes himself "as of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew of the Hebrews; as touching the law a Pharisee." He was born at Tarsus in Cilicia, a place of which he was wont to speak with some consciousness of its importance. It was in his eyes "no mean city." We need not suppose that this statement is colored by the partiality of a native, for there is ample evidence that as a geographical and trading centre, and as a seat of learning, it was in fact, no mean city. Its situation was favorable; a navigable stream gave direct access to the Mediterranean; it had communication on the one hand with Syria, and on the other with the lands beyond the Taurus, and its trade was therefore considerable. As a boy he must have often watched the rafts of timber, which hewn in the forests of the Taurus, and floated down the river, were sent to the dockyards, or other places, as required. Here, too, he must have seen bales of goods, which having the names and marks of the owners on them lay on the quays. How profound an impression the busy mercantile life of Tarsus made on his young mind may be gathered from the fact that his style, his mode of thought and almost all his metaphors and illustrations are drawn from it. Nor is this the only debt he owed to Tarsus. We know from Strabo that Greek learning greatly flourished in Tarsus at this time. It is scarcely to be supposed that he should have lived in such a city without sharing the culture and the learning for which it was celebrated. We know that he thought and spoke in Greek with great accuracy and ease, and we know that such ease comes only to one who has practised the use of the language from infancy, and to whom it has become part of his mental life. No one could have spoken the speech given by Paul on Mars Hill if he had not had a perfect acquaintance with the spirit of Greek life and thought. Occasionally, too, he shows an acquaintance with obscure parts of Greek literature, which is remarkable, and can use sentences from them with great effect. Witness the verse quoted by him to the men of Athens, "For we are also his offspring," and also the passage about the Cretans (Titus 1:12). It was fitting that he who was to be the bearer and the messenger of a religion suited to all men, fitted to meet and satisfy all human needs, should have seen with his own eyes and felt in his own life the pressure of Pagan religions as all who lived at Tarsus must have felt them.

Imprisonment and Execution.

In the final words of his history Luke tells us that Paul abode two whole years in his own hired dwelling [in Rome] and received all who went in unto him, preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching the things concerning the Lord Jesus Christ with all boldness, none forbidding him. . . . One thing is clear, that the trial of the Apostle did not take place during the two years mentioned. In the absence of accusers the trial was necessarily postponed. The result was that the Apostle was kept a prisoner for an indefinite period. The imprisonment was as lenient as was consistent with safe keeping. He was permitted to live in his own house; his friends were allowed free access to him; and he could communicate by letter with as many as he pleased. We learn, however, from a passing reference (II. Tim. 4:16, 17,) that when he wrote that letter his first trial was past and that he was acquitted. "At my first defence no one took my part, but all forsook me: may it not be laid to their account! But the Lord stood by me and strengthened me . . .

and I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion." On his liberation he seems to have left Rome, and travelled by the usual route to Macedonia, as he expected to do when he wrote the Epistle to the Philippians. (Phil. 2 : 24.) In the Second Epistle to Timothy we find that the Apostle is back in Rome. He had recently been at Troas, Corinth, and Miletus. At Troas he had left a cloak with Carpus, with books and parchments. So this journey must have been quite recent. At Miletus he had left Trophimus in sickness, and Erastus he had left at Corinth. In Rome he had been again imprisoned and was persuaded that the end was near. But he has still some hope that he may be again delivered; at all events, he writes to Timothy, "Do thy diligence to come before winter." We see that Paul's time was fully occupied, that in the interval between his first and second imprisonments he was in many places, and was pressed with anxieties and cares as much as ever. He may indeed have travelled as far as Spain, as he formerly intended, and as a very early tradition affirms . . . . We earnestly long to know the cause which led to his second imprisonment. He may have been arrested at Nicopolis and sent to Rome for trial. Traces appear of the fact that his second imprisonment was much more severe than his first. "I suffer hardship with bonds as a malefactor" (II. Tim. 4 : 15.) Many were ashamed of his chain, and many foreseeing danger, took themselves out of the way. Indeed in this epistle he says that Luke alone was with him when he wrote, but at his former defence not even he. Whence it is probable that Luke wrote his Acts of the Apostles about this time, continuing his history down to the time he was with Paul. Eusebius adds to his history of that time the brief sentence, "Paul is therefore said to have been beheaded at Rome." Thus at the will of a capricious madman, the great Apostle of the Gentiles ended his long career of suffering, and of work, and by the sharp stroke of the headman's sword entered into his rest.

A NIHILIST ON DR. TALMAGE.

A NOTABLE incident was related at the Friday evening Prayer-meeting in the Brooklyn Tabernacle by Rev. B. B. Tyler, D. D., Pastor of the Church of the Disciples, New York. Referring to the large congregations which gather every Sunday to hear Dr. Talmage and the vastly larger audiences which he addresses through the press, Dr. Tyler said that the influence of those sermons was working in many beneficent ways that were not fully realized. They were a blessing to the whole nation. A proof of the fact came under his own notice during a recent journey in the West. Among the persons with whom he conversed was a prominent Nihilist who had come to this country to disseminate the doctrines of the Order. Dr. Tyler asked him what success he was having. The Nihilist admitted that he was discouraged. He had made few converts and had been especially disappointed with his failure among the miners and ranchmen from whom he had expected many recruits. "Those are the people who generally join us with enthusiasm," he said, "but there are obstacles to the work here that I did not know of." Dr. Tyler asked the nature of the obstacles. "Well," said the Nihilist, "there is a preacher named Talmage over in the East, whose sermons are printed in the papers. I find them everywhere. They have them right out in the backwoods; you can find them in the ranchmen's huts and there is an evangelist on earth that believes or teaches that the signing of a card saves any one, or that it is an 'evidence of the fact that a man had really been converted.'

"The object of the card-plan is to ascertain who have professed faith in Jesus Christ, where they reside, and what is the church of their choice. Mr. Harrison does this very thing, only he gets the names in a blank book. Usually the evangelists who use cards simply say the signers have 'professed faith in Christ,' or, they have 'confessed Christ.'

"Of course neither Mr. Harrison nor any other evangelist can settle the fact of a man's conversion. It is a matter between the believer and God. All an evangelist can know about it is, if the 'seeker,' or 'inquirer' has complied with the conditions laid down in the Word of God, then he is saved. But has he done that? The evangelist can only know this by the fruits of conversion, subsequently in their lives.

"This was one reason why John Wesley organized the class meeting; and why the M. E. Church adopted the six-month's probation plan."

THE BOER TREK IN SOUTH AFRICA.

(See Illustration.)

THE gravity of the Boer movement grows with each budget of news. The warlike Dutch farmers have formed a project which is exceedingly attractive to men of eminence in all sections of South Africa. They propose to establish a State in Mashonaland, which will be called The Republic of the North. It is now stated, that the Boers, to the number of twenty thousand, are pledged to the scheme. The Boer plan is to assemble on the southern bank of the Limpopo River organize the forces, and settle the plan of action, then cross the river and immediately proclaim the Republic. The leaders are said to be men of determination, ambitious to be prominent in the new state. They come from the Transvaal, the Free State and even from Cape Colony itself. Their elevation to the rank of leaders appears to be chiefly due to the vigor of their dislike to Imperialism in any form. Their present intention is to cross the river on or about June 1.

That serious trouble will ensue there can be no doubt. The fierce and hardy Boers have not forgotten their victories over the British forces in the former conflict, and cannot be made to believe that England can send any army against them strong enough to hold the country. On the other hand, the disastrous campaign is also fresh in the minds of British statesmen, and will doubtless prompt them to avoid their former mistake of under-rating the military skill of the Boers. Portuguese interests also appear to be threatened by the Boer project as Mashonaland where they propose to settle is claimed by Portugal as well as England.

Strong efforts are apparently being made by Paul Kruger, the President of the Transvaal the miners' cabins, and wherever you find the men reading those sermons it is of no use talking Nihilism to them. They believe in God and they love their country and respect the laws and institutions. Talk is wasted on them." Dr. Tyler thought the public had cause to be thankful for such a condition of things. It was a reason for national congratulation that when a Nihilist came here to preach dynamite, assassination and anarchy he found the soil pre-empted by the Gospel of peace and could find no congenial ground in which to sow his dangerous seed.

THE "CONVERT CARDS."

A PARAGRAPH in Rev. Thomas Harrison's article on "Shepherding the Lambs," published in this journal on May 6, forms the subject of a letter written to us by the eminent evangelist, Dr. L. W. Munhall. He thinks the remarks of Mr. Harrison may give rise to a misconception which would be misleading and unjust. If such a misconception has been produced it should be removed at once.

Dr. Munhall says:—"I do not believe that Republic, to prevent the incursion. He has promised the British authorities that it shall not take place, but if the "trekkers" have the force stated, it is not likely that he will be able to keep his promise. The colonists in Cape Colony are earnestly pressing the Imperial Government to prepare for war. "If," they say, "England will not protect the country it is time for the colony to declare itself independent." This declaration has had the effect of arousing the Government to action. It thus seems probable that the proposed "trek" will not be made without bloodshed.

The word "trek," which appears so frequently in the despatches, comes from the Dutch, trekken, and means to draw, to travel by a wagon or to journey in search of a new settlement. The present Republic of the Transvaal is the result of a trek. The Boers, or Dutch farmers and cattle raisers, who settled in Cape Colony in the sixteenth century, trekked northward and established the Republic of the Transvaal when the English took possession of the Cape. They believe that another trek further northward has now become necessary, and will be equally successful. Our illustration represents a Boer trekking wagon.

THE TEMPLE OF THE TOOTH.

(See Illustration.)

ONE of the most famous temples of Buddhism in the world is the Delado Maligawa, or Temple of Buddha's Tooth, a picture of which appears on this page. It is situated in Kandy, Ceylon, and was built many centuries ago by the Singhalese Kings, as a shrine for the dental relic of Buddha. The reverence thus displayed for the relic was not wholly and purely religious in its nature. A current popular tradition had it that whosoever was the possessor of the tooth was the divinely appointed sovereign of the whole island of Ceylon, with its two million inhabitants. The beauty of the temple, and the extreme sanctity of the relic, attracted great crowds of worshippers. Under Portuguese supremacy the Roman Catholics endeavored to break up the senseless worship. The tooth was seized and carried to the Archbishop of Goa, who, with his own hands, ground it to powder. The usual effect of persecution followed. In a short time the Buddhist priests were again exhibiting the tooth, and assuring the devout believers that it had been miraculously reconstituted from the powder and restored to its proper shrine. It was then as large as a horse's tooth, but the priests declared that the increase in size was the result of the miracle, and doubtless they were credited; for if the devotee could believe in a miracle he could as easily believe in its reputed effects. The tooth is still on exhibition, and multitudes of Buddhists go to see it, to recite their prayers and make their offerings. Among the latter are two magnificent tusks of ivory, shown in the picture, and beside these, the black box, which is the treasury of the temple, is always well filled. The Island of Ceylon is now under English rule, and Christian missionaries are laboring there to enlighten the people and lead them to him who is greater than Buddha.

THE CAPTAIN'S BARGAIN.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

BY JULIA McNAIR WRIGHT.

[Published by special arrangement with The National Temperance Society.]

To Go, or Not to Go.

Mrs. LIZA put Pink into a high-chair, placed her at the table, and tied a bib under her chin. All Liza's motions were quick and nervous; now their energy was intensified by wrath. She bounced the waif into another high-chair, and tied a bib under his chin. Surely this was not out of deference to his dirty clothes. Probably it was out of deference to her own feelings, and her table-cloth.

The door opened and a boy, who made an amazing amount of noise in walking, came in and sat down by Captain Zekiel, at the end of the table. The Captain's remorse continued; indeed, it deepened. He repented of every mouthful of food, even as he ate it.

Pink, mollified by the sight of supper, leaned across the table which separated her from Pink, applying herself to her little mug of milk, drained it to the last drop, and burst into a loud wail for more. At once the little visitor held out his own mug to her with both his small, grimy hands saying, "Tate mine." Pink, unhesitant, took it all. It was freely given. Never until now had the boy had before him, at one meal, meat and potatoes, gravy, bread, butter, and milk. He could spare the milk. Supper over, the Captain and the noisily-walking boy took a lantern and went out. "Wobbie" again shrunk behind the stove. He had a vague feeling that is Mrs. Liza saw too much of him she might put him out in the rain. Heretofore, weather had never offered any restraint to those who wished to thrust him out of doors.

The house-mother undressed Pink and put her to-bed in the next room. It looked a wonderful room to Robbie. It had a bed, a crib and a trundle-bed, all of home manufacture; two great, bright, braided mats on the floor; white curtains at the window; two or three gay prints on the wall, and a little table with a red cover. What a paradise!

Madame Liza next washed her tea-dishes, set bread-sponge, and made her kitchen tidy. Meanwhile the Captain returned and again sat desolate in the corner. Then Mrs. Liza took a little tin tub, put plenty of hot water therein, laid a sponge, a crash towel, a square of brown soap, and a bottle of ammonia on a chair, and, reaching behind the stove for Robbie, said, "Now I'll make you clean if you're going to sleep in my trundle-bed."

She stripped off his one garment, a gray flannel "confection" of pants and waist, and plumped him into the tub of water. Whatever this dame did she did thoroughly, especially in the cleaning line. She administered soap and ammonia with an unsparing hand; she rubbed, she scoured, she rinsed, she polished with the crash towel. The soap-suds went into Robbie's eyes, mouth and ears. Well, what if it did? He set his lips together, squeezed his her little guest, set her small, white teeth together, and opening her red lips in a grin, exhibited, as with pride the double, gleaming row. The boy smiled at her benignly. Why should he not smile? Mrs. Liza had heaped his plate liberally with potatoes and gravy. Presently Pink filled a spoon from her own plate, and, leaning over, thrust it into the stranger's mouth. This was hospitality. Then, instantly, the changeful maid lifted herself in her chair and gave "Wobbie" a resounding whack on the head. He winked back the tears like a little hero, and only nodded at her. What was a blow with a pewter spoon, to a boy eating all he wanted of hot potatoes? The n eyelids tight shut, held his breath, and let her scrub. The water was lovely warm, the soapy sponge was soft; unconsciously to himself something in his nature seemed responsive to this cleansing process. As Mrs. 'Liza scoured away the grime the short hazy horror of the past seemed to fall away from him, and he was a new boy in a new world.

"There! Now for your head!" said Mrs. 'Liza.

She stood him up in the tub, braced against her knees. The little man vaguely felt as if his head had already a full share of the scouring, but he uttered no remonstrance. Ammonia made his scalp burn, his eyes rain silent tears, his breath vanish utterly—and then the combs! A remorseless coarse comb, a tenfold remorseless fine comb! Mrs. 'Liza seemed to forget that his head was any more sensitive than a croquet-ball. She combed up, down, forward, backward, sidewise. Her victim was dumb as an Indian suffering torture. He shut his eyes tight, doubled up his little fists into two red balls, thrust his elbows in admonitory fashion into his own ribs, and—let her comb. No doubt he reflected that no amount of combing was so bad as to be seized ruthlessly by a handful of curls, and have your head knocked against the wall; or to be given a fling and sent reeling across a room to hit your head on the edge of a table, and raise a big lump to last for a week; nor was standing to be combed half as bad as to cower shivering and trembling under a bed and watch a drunken man and a drunken woman throwing bottles, tongs, coals, or chairs at each other. All these had been of the varied experiences of "Wobbie's" brief sojourn here below. What, he and we ask, was the most vigorous combing in comparison? Besides, there was the stove—a beautiful shining stove, with the fire twinkling through two isinglass doors. A stove all warm and clean was more than a treat to a little man in April who had been uninterruptedly cold since last October. Robbie basked before the stove. It is true he might have basked as well as basked but for the happy accident that Dame 'Liza turned him round now and again in the exigencies of combing.

Finally: "Now you're clean!" said Mrs. 'Liza. She lifted him to her lap, wiped his feet, and stood him on the floor before her. The heat, the scrubbing, the rubbing, had made all his little body pink as a rose from head to heel. His clean wet hair, after the last passage through it of the comb, had divided into great dark curls that fell over his shoulders. He looked tranquilly at his genius, with large, brown, steadfast, sleepy eyes. He was cherubic.

Mrs. 'Liza went to a blue chest, and took out a new garment of unbleached cotton. "I made it," she said, addressing herself to the room in general—"for Pink, with allowances for growing—I didn't think a little beggar would get the first wear of it." Then she dropped the garment over his head, pulled his arms into the sleeves, and buttoned it about his neck. The little beggar in this straight white array, was more angelic than ever. It is written of old, "Some have entertained angels unawares." Then Mrs. 'Liza led her beggar to the bedroom, his little feet pattering obediently in time with her own hasty tread. As Bop had pre-emption rights to the front of the trundle-bed, she lifted the beggar in behind him. Bop, feeling something warm and soft slipping in beside him, asserted his ownership, by kicking out a fat leg, and driving his bed-fellow well against the wall, then turning on his back and striking a fat fist into Robbie's eye. But what did that matter? Robbie's eyes were already closing. What were a few kicks and punches compared to a delicious, clean, soft, warm bed? A wonderful feeling of general well being made up of cleanliness, softness, satiety, absorbed him. Sweet dreams came thronging to bear him away into slumber-land.

Mrs. 'Liza, a fond mother, bent to kiss the red head of Captain 'Zekiel's youngest image. Was it only one of Robbie's dreams, that for the first time in his experience a hand lingered for an instant in maternal touch on his head?

Mrs. 'Liza went back to her kitchen. She poured more hot water into the little tub, washed the wail's forlorn suit, and hung it close to the fire to dry. Then, without a word to her Captain, she sat down to darn stockings.

Meanwhile the Captain was watching all these proceedings out of the corner of his eye. There had been similar scenes once before.

The last stage of his intoxication had passed; 'Zekiel was himself again. He had expected not merely a domestic storm, but a tornado of the fiercest description. It had been violent, but brief, and its last forces had been spent in combing that curly head. The Captain seeing the stray infant's heroic conduct while being washed and combed, his genial manners to Pink, and his wisdom in hiding behind the stove, had told himself that "the boy was a reg'lar little brick." And then, how beautiful he was! Even doting parents admitted that the Captain's Bop was homely. Pink was a pretty child, but of a diabolical disposition—but this boy! what a straight, well-knit little figure! What great brown eyes, what curls! What a skin, like cream! What a smile!

An infinite longing to own him, filled the soul of the child-loving Captain Allen. Brought up and living all his life in the wooded silence of the mountain-side, the Captain was filled with that intense unspoken beauty-worship which made the herdsmen and hunters of ancient Greece see demi-gods, fauns, nymphs, dryads in the woods and streams. Oh, this beautiful child, could he yield him up to the desolation of the county poorhouse, where toothless old paupers mumbled, and a stray idiot and lunatic or two mouthed and gibbered? Could he go back to the admiring chorus of the women, the constable, and say, "Here's the boy; my wife won't have him"? Yet Mrs. 'Liza, by virtue of that head-on-her-shoulders, was the true head of the house; moreover, they were very poor, and Mrs. 'Liza was very hard worked, and—well—what cannot be gained by fighting, may sometimes be gained by waiting—so the Captain went to bed.

By five next morning, the Captain called "the Hands," and a great bustle began, getting out the lumber for Mr. Combe. "Allen's Mill," an ancient, tumble-down structure, with a huge under-shot wheel, stood on the side of a mountain stream never too dry to drive the saw-mill, but now full-flushed with the breaking up of the mountain snows and the spring rains, a wide swift creek, hurrying into the Schuylkill, and capable of carrying down rafts. Therefore, Captain 'Zekiel and his "Hands," were finishing making rafts of stout bark-covered logs for underpinning, and on these the other lumber was to be loaded. Then a tiller being rigged, the "Hands" and Mr. Combe would navigate one raft the nine miles of waterway to Lacy, and Captain 'Zekiel would take down the other.

The Captain worked in a fury of zeal. He meant to leave no time for 'Liza to remonstrate with him about the stray boy, or to repeat her orders to carry him off on the first raft. The Captain was wont to prepare himself for unusual labors by a glass of Old Rye, but this morning it would not be well to recall to 'Liza, by drinking his last evening's indiscretion. Moreover, if there was one thing above another that made that good woman wrathful, it was to see the Captain indulging in Old Rye. Therefore unaided by his usual fortifier, the big Captain worked like a Hercules. He had no time to eat; he snatched his bread and bacon, and ate as he rolled logs over the banks by mighty kicks. Eliza, with the baby over one arm, and the bill of the lumber in her right hand, came out to see that Mr. Combe got what he paid for, and no more.

The Captain worked. "The Hands" worked. Mr. Combe arrived and he worked. Mrs. 'Liza made coffee and brought it out to them. The great yellow boards were piled high on the rafts. The Captain wrought prodigies. He talked—for 'Liza's benefit

Makes the Weak Strong

The way in which Hood's Sarsaparilla builds up people in run down or weakened state of health, conclusively proves the claim that this medicine "makes the weak strong." It does not act like a stimulant, imparting fictitious strength from which there must follow a reaction of greater weakness than before, but in the most natural way Hood's Sarsaparilla overcomes that tired feeling, creates an appetite, purifies the blood, and in short, gives great bodily, nerve, mental and digestive strength.

THE CAPTAIN'S BARGAIN.

"If you'll build three or four hotels and stores at Lacy, and get the lumber of me, Mr. Combe, I think of getting more machinery here in the mill. My wife thinks if we made shingles now—things are looking up in Lacy, Mr. Combe, and all over the country."

"So they are. I brought the Jamaica, Captain; will you have a glass to help you along?"

The Captain's mouth watered, but there was 'Liza!

"No, thank; no, not any. 'Pears to me I'm working a leetle better without it."

Presently Mrs. 'Liza went into the house. The Captain trembled. Now she was getting the boy ready to go off on the raft. She came out; the Captain was passing; she beckoned him to the bedroom window. All was over. She was about to bid him carry off his bad Bargain. He approached slowly; looked in as 'Liza's finger directed. On the pillow of the trundle-bed sat Pink in her nightgown. In one hand she held a wooden horse, trophy of her father's jack-knife; in the other a rag-doll, triumph of her mother's needle. On his knees before her—a veritable copy of Reynolds' "Little Samuel," though the Captain and 'Liza did not know it—was the boy. One arm held securely a blue earthen bowl of bread and milk, left on the table for Pink's breakfast; the other hand was busy conveying loaded spoonfuls of this refreshment to Pink's mouth. Pink held her mouth wide as a young robin, and the boy, neat-handed, put the spoon safely within the yawning rosy cavity. Now and then Pink graciously turned a spoonful to his mouth. The Captain and 'Liza laughed and went away. Later both children were dressed and out playing. Pink hurt her finger on a board, and her ready shriek arose.

"Don't ky, boy!" called out Robbie's silvery voice as he ran up, holding his curly head low. "Don't ky; pull my hair if you like; then you'll laugh."

Pink pulled with a will and laughed. "Now you feel nice, boy," said the stranger.

"Ain't boy—am gell," said Pink. "Yes; now you're glad, gell," said her guest.

Then the waif approached "the Hands" occupied in taking a bit of luncheon. Though spoken of in the plural, "the Hands" was but one, a boy of fifteen—not even a whole boy, thought Robbie, only a piece of a boy. He had only one leg. A wooden leg of domestic make was firmly strapped to the stump of the missing left leg; and, as if to balance this deficiency, "the Hands" had also lost his right eye. Probably in courtesy to his having two hands, and also because every mill should need and have more than one workman, the Captain spoke of his fragmentary coadjutor as "the Hands."

Robbie surveyed this boy with interest. "Is you going to work all day?"

"No; I'm going down to the town on the raft."

"Did 'the lady send you away?" asked Robbie in awed tones.

"Oh, no; I'm coming back."

"Does the lady let you stay?"

"All right; she does."

"Does the lady like you?"

"The Hands" laughed. Mrs. 'Liza

had heard. She did not like the waif less for calling her "the lady."

The rafts were made and loaded. All was ready for a start. Mrs. 'Liza and the children were nowhere to be seen. The Captain could fly unnoticed, possibly. But that hardly seemed fair to 'Liza. With reluctant steps he approached the kitchen-door. His wife was sewing. Bop sat on the floor. "Wobbie" had organized a play. "Me an' you gell is bears. We'll run at him on our knees. We'll bark ow, ow, ow, only not too loud, gell, to make him ky. Come on, gell—ow, ow, ow!" Like the classic Bottom, Wobbie roared as gently as any sucking dove.

"'Liza," said the Captain faintly, "we're—going—down."

"All right," said 'Liza, never lifting her eyes.

"You—you don't want to send for anything, 'Liza?"

"No," said the dame, calmly.

"I'll get back by—seven, 'Liza."

"You won't if you don't hurry off," said 'Liza.

The Captain went off stupefied. Well, he had given her a fair chance. The rafts started. As they got well into mid-stream, Captain 'Zekiel saw his family on the bank watching. His wife had the baby in her arms. "Wobbie" held Pink's hand. The rafts were well made and well piled up. There was a long oar fitted at both ends of each. Mr. Combe and "the Hands" manipulated the first raft. 'Zekiel alone proudly managed the second.

When the rafts reached Lacy, almost the first person Captain 'Zekiel saw was the constable. His heart fell. The wretched mother had come back to claim that boy! "She's found?" he asked.

"What, the tramp woman, that left the young one? You'd better believe she ain't. She'll never turn up. You've got the boy on your hands, sure enough, Cap'n; and everybody in Lacy is talking how good it is of you, too."

Oh, suppose he had brought the boy back!

"Have a glass, Cap'n, before you start for the train?" asked Mr. Combe, for politeness' sake.

Ah, it would not do to anger 'Liza by going home in any one of his three abnormal states. She would send the boy away then sure, and everyone was saying how good he was, too! Besides, suppose in the exhilaration of the rum he should pick up another boy!

"No, thank you," said Captain Allen, and went home, without the taint of Jamaica, to his household. There were no storms that night, and Pink was not fretting. The boy in a corner was building cob-houses for her to knock over. Mistress Allen said, "I have never had such a day's peace with Pink since she was born."

While Pink was being put to bed, the waif climbed on Captain Allen's knee, and sat with his head leaning on the good man's broad breast. Captain Allen was not in the corner that night; he was not full of remorse; he sat by the stove and whistled "Blue Bonnets Over the Border."

The next day and the next passed, and no word was said about the boy. But the position was becoming strained; there was not that freedom of intercourse between the Captain and his 'Liza which is pleasing in the conjugal relation. Topics of conversation were scarce between them. The Captain felt that the "affair Wobbie" must be definitely settled. He took courage in his hands. "'Liza, I'm going down to Lacy to get an order this afternoon. Are you resolved that I shall send this little man to the poorhouse?"

Pink at the word flung herself headlong on the floor, and, whirling her legs and arms like the fans of a wind-mill, shrieked at the top of her lungs. The alarmed Bop joined the pæan; Babel reigned. The little man knew that his fate wavered in the balance. By one of those divine instincts of childhood, he cast himself, not upon the Captain, but rushed, white with terror, to lay hold on the skirts of 'Liza. The Captain bowed his head, as a criminal before the judge. The hour of 'Liza's triumph had come! Blessed be the conqueror who knows how to administer a victory.

"The boy may stay so long as you, 'Zekiel, don't drink a drop, and you, Pink, don't have another tantrum."

These were the words of Eliza.

"WE WOULD SEE JESUS."

BY MARGARET J. PRESTON.

We would see Jesus, when our hopes are brightest,
And all that earth can grant is at its best;
When not a drift of shadow, even the lightest,
Blurs our clear atmosphere of perfect rest.

We would see Jesus, when the joy of living
Holds all our senses in a realm of bliss,
That we may know He hath the power of giving Enduring rapture more supreme than this.

We would see Jesus, when our pathway darkens,
Beneath the dread of some impending ill;
When the discouraged soul no longer harkens
To Hope, who beckons in the distance still.

We would see Jesus when the stress of sorrow Strains to their utmost tension heart and brain;
That He may teach us how despair may borrow,
From faith, the one sure antidote of pain.

We would see Jesus when our best are taken,
And we must meet, unshared, all shocks
of woe;
Because He bore for us, alone, forsaken,
Burdens whose weight no human heart could know.

We would see Jesus when our fading vision,
Lost to the consciousness of earth and sky,
Has only insight for the far elysian;
We would see Jesus when we come to die!

DR. TALMAGE says: "A great deal of sorrow is caused to young hearts and old by the thought that Christmas comes but once a year," but he continues, "why not extend the glorious season of joy, gladness and good-will throughout the year?" This beautiful thought has been brought rather forcibly to our attention of late by the hundreds of letters we daily receive, asking for "Christmas Boxes." What! Christmas Boxes in March, the idea! who ever heard of hanging up stockings in the Spring-time? But then the people have to use soap the year round and nearly twice as much is used in summer as in winter—you wouldn't think that—would you? But it is a fact, and if folks want "Sweet Home" Soap and wish to make the whole household merry with lots of useful, pretty, valuable and ornamental things, why not do it now as well as in December? and so we extend "Our Mammoth Christmas Box" off for a limited time. Another thing! There was such an awful rush of orders last Christmas that some of our friends did not get the goods as soon as they expected. It aint so now, you can have the Mammoth Christmas Box when you want it. Better order at once.

Very Soapfully Yours,

ONE WEEK'S WORK.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON PREACHED IN THE NEW BROOKLYN TABERNACLE LAST SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 24, 1891.

The First Week of the World's History—The Same Result in a Week of Ages—The Poor Prospect of the First Day—An All-Comprehensive Word—Light the First Necessity—Woven of the Robe of God—The Great Cry of Philosophers and Sages—The Second Day's Labor—The Lesson of Abundant Water—The Creation of the Third Day—The Ancestors of our Fruit Trees—The Curtain Drawn on the Fourth Day—The Fifth Day's Work—Life in Water and Land and Air—The Sixth Day the Climacteric Day.

"And the evening and the morning were the sixth day." Genesis 1:31.

FROM Monday morning to Saturday night gives us a week's work. If we have filled that week with successes, we are happy. But I am going to tell you what God did in one week. Cosmogony, geology, astronomy, ornithology, ichthyology, botany, anatomy are such vast subjects that no human life is long enough to explore or comprehend any one of them. But I have thought I might in an unusual way tell you a little of what God did in one week and that the first week. And whether you make it a week of days or a week of ages, I care not, for I shall reach the same practical result of reverence and worship.

The first Monday morning found swinging in space the piled-up lumber of rocks and metal and soil and water from which the earth was to be builded. God made up his mind to create a human family and they must have a house to live in. But where? Not a roof, not a wall, not a door, not a room was fit for human occupancy. There is not a pile of black basalt in Yellowstone Park or an extinct volcano in Honolulu so inappropriate for human residence as was this globe at that early period. Moreover, there was no human architect to draw a plan, no quarryman to blast the foundation stones, no carpenter to hew out a beam, and no mason to trowel a wall. Poor prospect! But the time was coming when a being called man was to be constructed and he was to have a bride; and where he could find a homestead to which he could take her must have been a wonderment to angelic intelligences. There had been earthquakes enough, and volcanoes enough, and glaciers enough, but earthquakes, and volcanoes and glaciers destroy instead of build. A worse-looking world than this never swung. It was heaped up deformities, scarifications and monstrosities. The Bible says it was without form. That is, it was not round, it was not square, it was not octagonal, it was not a rhomboid. God never did take any one in his counsels, but if he had asked some angel about the attempt to turn this planet into a place for human residence, the angel would have said, "No, no; try some other world; the crevices of this earth are too deep; its crags are too appalling; its darkness is too thick." But Monday morning came. I think it was a Spring morning and about half past four o'clock. The first thing needed was light. It was not needed for God to work by, for he can work as well in the darkness. But light may be necessary, for angelic intelligences are to see in its full glory the process of world-building. But where are the candles, where are the candelabra, where is the chandelier? No rising sun will roll in the morning for if the sun is already created, its light will not yet reach the earth in three days. No moon or stars can brighten this darkness. The moon and stars are not born yet, or, if created, their light will not reach the earth for some time yet. But there is need of immediate light. Where shall it come from? Desiring to account for things in a natural way you say, and reasonably say, that heat and electricity throw out light independent of the sun, and that the metallic bases throw out light independent of the sun, and that alkalies throw out light independent of the sun. Oh, yes; all that is true, but I do not think that is the way light was created. The record makes me think that, standing over this earth that Spring morning, God looked upon the darkness that palled the heights of this world, and the chasms of it, and the awful reaches of it, and uttered, whether in the Hebrew of earth, or some language celestial I know not, that word which stands for the subtle, bright, glowing and all-pervading fluid, that word which thrills and garlands and lifts everything it touches, that word the full meaning of which all the chemists of the ages have busied themselves in exploring, that word which suggests a force that flies one hundred and ninety thousand miles in a second and by undulations seven hundred and twenty-seven trillions in a second, that one word God utters—Light! And instantly the darkness began to shimmer, and the thick folds of blackness to lift, and there were scintillations, and coruscations, and flashes and a billowing up of resplendence, and in great sheets it spread out Northward, Southward, Eastward, Westward, and a radiance filled the atmosphere until it could hold no more of the brilliance. Light now to work by while supernatural intelligences look on. Light, the first chapter of the first day of the week. Light, the joy of all the centuries. Light, the greatest blessing that ever touched the human eye. The robe of the Almighty is woven out of it, for he covers himself with light as with a garment. Oh! blessed light!

I am so glad this was the first thing created that week. Good thing to start every week with is light. That will make our work easier. That will keep our disposition more radiant. That will hinder even our losses from becoming too sombre. Give us more light, natural light, intellectual light, spiritual light, everlasting light. For lack of it the body stumbles, and the soul stumbles. Oh thou Father of Lights, give us light! The great German philosopher in his last moment said "I want more light." A minister of Christ recently dying cried out in exultation, "I move into the light!" Mr. Toplady the immortal hymnologist in his expiring moments exclaimed, "Light! Light!"

Heaven itself is only more light. Upon all superstition, upon all ignorance, upon all sorrow let in the light. But now the light of the first Monday is receding. The blaze is going out. The colors are dimming. Only part of the earth's surface is visible. It is six o'clock, seven o'clock, eight o'clock; obscurity and darkness. It is Monday night. "And the evening and the morning were the first day."

Now it is Tuesday morning. A delicate and tremendous undertaking is set apart for this day. There was a great superabundance of water. God by the wave of his hand this morning gathers part of it in suspended reservoirs and part of it he orders down into the rivers, and lakes and seas. How to hang whole Atlantic Oceans in the clouds without their spilling over except in right quantities and at right times was an undertaking that no one but Omnipotence would have dared. But God does it as easily as you would lift a glass of water. There he hoists two clouds each thirty miles wide and five miles high and balances them. Here he lifts the cirrus clouds and spreads them out in great white banks as though it had been snowing in heaven. And the cirro-stratus clouds in long parallel lines so straight you know an infinite Geometer has drawn them. Clouds which are the armory from which thunder-storms get their bayonets of fire. Clouds which are oceans on the wing. No wonder, long after this first Tuesday of Creation week, Elihu confounded Job with the question, "Dost thou know the balancings of the clouds?" Half of this Tuesday work done, the other-half is the work of compelling the waters to lie down in their destined places. So God picks up the solid ground and packs it up into five elevations which are the continents. With his finger he makes deep depressions in them, and these are the lakes, while at the piling up of the Alleghanies and Sierra Nevadas and Pyrenees and Alps and Himalayas the rest of the waters start by the law of gravitation to the lower places, and in their run down-hill become the rivers, and then all around the earth these rivers come into convention and become oceans beneath, as the clouds are oceans above. How soon the rivers got to their places when God said: "Hudson and James and Amazon, down to the Atlantic; Oregon and Sacramento down to the Pacific." Three-quarters of the earth being water and only one-quarter being land, nothing but Almighty could have caged the three-fourths so that they could not devour the one-fourth.

Thank God for water and plenty of it. What a hint that God would have the human race very clean: Three-fourths of the world water. Pour it through the homes and make them pure. Pour it through the prisons and make their occupants moral. Pour it through the streets and make them healthy. There are several thousand people asleep in Greenwood, who, but for the filthy streets of Brooklyn and New York, would have been to-day well and in churches. Moreover, there never was a filthy street that remained a moral street. How important an agency of reform water is, was illustrated by the fact that when the ancient world got outrageously wicked, it was plunged into the Deluge and kept under for months till its iniquity was soaked out of it. But I rejoice that on the first Tuesday of the world's existence the water was taught to know its place, and the Mediterranean lay down at the feet of Europe, and the Gulf of Mexico lay down at the feet of North America, and Geneva lay down at the feet of the Alps, and Scroon Lake fell to sleep in the lap of the Adirondacks. "And the evening and the morning were the second day."

Now it is Wednesday morning of the world's first week. Gardening and horticulture will be born to-day. How queer the hills look, and so unattractive they seem hardly worth having been made. But now all the surfaces are changing color. Something beautiful is creeping all over them. It has the color of emerald. Aye, it is herbage. Hail to the green grass, God's favorite color and God's favorite plant, as I judge from the fact that he makes a larger number of them than of anything else. But look yonder! Something starts out of the ground and goes higher up, higher and higher, and spreads out broad leaves. It is a palm tree. Yonder is another growth, and its leaves hang far down, and it is a willow tree. And yonder is a growth with mighty sweep of branches. And here they come—the pear and the apple, and the peach and the pomegranate, and groves and orchards and forests, their shadows and their fruit girdling the earth. We are pushing agriculture and fruit culture to great excellence in the nineteenth century, but we have nothing now to equal what I see on this first Wednesday of the world's existence. I take a taste of one of the apples this Wednesday morning, and I tell you it mingles in its juices all the flavors of Spitzbergen and Newtown pippin and Rhode Island greening and Danvers winter sweet and Roxbury russet and Hubbardston nonesuch, but added to all, and overpowering all other flavors is the Paradisaical juice that all the orchards of the nineteenth century fail to reach. I take a taste of the pear, and it has all the luxury of the three thousand varieties of the nineteenth century; all the Seckel and the Bartlett of the pomological gardens of later times, an acidity compared with it. And the grapes! Why, this one cluster has in it the richness of whole vineyards of Catawbas and Concord and Isabellas. Fruits of all colors, of all odors, of all flavors. No hand of man yet made to pluck it or tongue to taste it. The banquet for the human race is being spread before the arrival of the first guest. In the fruit of that garden was the seed for the orchards and gardens of the Hemispheres. Notice that the first thing that God made for food was fruit, and plenty of it. Slaughter-houses are of later invention. Far am I from being a vegetarian, but an almost exclusive meat diet is depraving. Savages confine themselves almost exclusively to animal food, and that is one reason that they are savages. Give your children more apples and less mutton. The world will have to give dominance to the fruit diet of Paradise before it gets back to the morals of Paradise. May God's blessing come down on the orchards and vineyards of America, and keep back the frosts and the curculio. But we must not forget that it is Wednesday evening in Eden, and upon that perfect fruit of those perfect trees let the curtain drop. "And the evening and the morning were the third day."

Now it is Thursday morning of the world's first week. Nothing will be created to-day. The hours will be passed in scattering fogs and mists and vapors. The atmosphere must be swept clean. Other worlds are to hove in sight. This little ship of the earth has seemed to have all the ocean of immensity to itself. But mightier craft are to be hailed to-day on the high seas of space. First, the moon's white sail appears and does very well until the sun bursts upon the scene. The light that on the previous three mornings was struck from an especial word now gathers in the sun, moon and stars. One for the day the others for the night. It seemed as if they had all within twenty-four hours been created. Ah, this is a great time in the world's first week. The moon, the nearest neighbor to our earth appears, her photograph to be taken in the nineteenth century, when the telescope shall bring her within one hundred and twenty miles of New York. And the sun now appears, afterward to be found eight hundred and eighty-eight thousand miles in diameter, and, put in astronomical scales, to be found to weigh nearly four hundred thousand times heavier than our earth; a mighty furnace, its heat kept up by meteors pouring into it as fuel, a world devouring other worlds with its jaws of flame. And the stars come out, those street lamps of heaven, those keys of pearl, upon which God's fingers play the music of the spheres. How bright they look in this Oriental evening! Constellations! Galaxies! What a twenty-four hours of this first week—solar, lunar, stellar appearances. All this Thursday and the adjoining nights employed in pulling aside the curtain of vapor from these flushed or pale-faced worlds. Enough! "And the evening and the morning were the fourth day."

Now it is Friday morning in the first week of the world's existence. Water, but not a fin swimming it; air, but not a wing flying it. It is a silent world. Can it be that it was made only for vegetables? But, hark! There is a swirl and a splashing in all the four rivers of Pison, Gihon, Hiddekel, and Euphrates. They are all a-swim with life, some darting like arrows through split crystal, and others quiet in dark pools like shadows. Everything, from spotted trout to behemoth; all colored, all shaped, the ancestors of finny tribes that shall by their wonders of construction confound the Agassizs, the Cuviers and the Linnauses and the ichthyologists of the more than six thousand years following this Friday of the first week. And while I stand on the banks of these Paradisaical rivers watching these finny tribes, I hear a whirr in the air and I look up and behold wings—wings of larks, robins, doves, eagles, flamingos, albatrosses, brown-threshers. Creatures of all color, blue as if dipped in the skies, fiery as if they had flown out of the sunsets, golden as if they had taken their morning bath in buttercups. And while I am studying the colors, they begin to carol and chirp and coo and twitter and run up and down the scales of a music that they must have heard at heaven's gate. Yes. I find them in Paradise on this the first Friday afternoon of the world's existence. And I sit down on the bank of the Euphrates, and the murmur of the river, together with the chant of birds in the sky puts me into a state of somnolence. "And the evening and the morning were the fifth day."

Now it is Saturday morning of the world's first week and with this day the week closes. But oh, what a climacteric day! The air has its population and the water its population. Yet the land has not one inhabitant. But here they come, by the voice of God created!—Horses grander than those which in after time Job will describe as having neck clothed with thunder. Cattle enough to cover a thousand hills. Sheep shepherded by him who made for them the green pastures. Cattle superior to the Alderneys and Ayrshires and Devonshires of after times. Leopards so beautiful, we are glad they cannot change their spots. Lions without their fierceness and all the quadruped world so gentle, so sleek, so perfect. Look out how you treat this animal creation, whether they walk the earth or swim the waters or fly the air. Do you not notice that God gave them precedence of the human race? They were created Friday and Saturday morning, as man was created Saturday afternoon. They have a right to be here. He who galls a horse, or exposes a cow to the storm, or beats a dog, or mauls a cat, or gambles at the pigeon-shooting, or tortures an insect, will have to answer for it in the Judgment-day. You may console yourself that these creatures are not immortal and they cannot appear against you, but the God who made these creatures, and who saw the wrong you did them will be there. Better look out, you stock-raisers and rail-road companies who bring the cattle on trains without food or water for three or four days in hot weather, a long groan of agony from Omaha to New York. Better look out, you farmer riding behind that limping horse with a nail that the blacksmith drove into the quick. Better look out, you boys, stoning bull-frogs and turning turtles upside down, and robbing birds' nests.

But something is wanting in Paradise and the week is almost done. Who is there to pluck the flowers of this Edenic lawn? Who is there to command these worlds of quadruped and fish and bird? For whom has God put back the curtain from the face of sun and moon and star? The world wants an emperor and empress. It is Saturday afternoon. No one but the Lord Almighty can originate a human being. In the world where there are in the latter part of the nineteenth century over fourteen hundred million people, a human being is not a curiosity. But how about the first human eye that was ever kindled, the first human ear that was ever opened, the first human lung that ever breathed, the first human heart that ever beat, the first human life ever constructed? That needed the origination of a God. He had no model to work by. What stupendous work for a Saturday afternoon! He must originate a style of human heart through which all the blood in the body must pass every three minutes. He must make that heart so strong that it can during each day lift what would be equal to one hundred and twenty tons of weight and it must be so arranged as to beat over thirty-six million times every year. About five hundred muscles must be strung in the right place and at least two hundred and fifty bones constructed. Into this body must be put at least nine million nerves. Over three thousand perspiring pores must be made for every inch of fleshly surface. The human voice must be so constructed it shall be capable of producing seventeen trillion five hundred and ninety-two billion one hundred and eighty-six million forty-four thousand four hundred and fifteen sounds. But all this the most insignificant part of the human being. The soul! Ah, the construction of that God himself would not be equal to if he were any the less of a God. Its understanding, its will, its memory, its conscience, its capacities of enjoyment or suffering, its immortality! What a work for a Saturday afternoon! Aye! Before night there were to be two such human and yet immortal beings constructed. The woman as well as the man was formed Saturday afternoon. Because a deep sleep fell upon Adam and by divine surgery a portion of his side was removed for the nucleus of another creation, it has been supposed that perhaps days and nights passed between the masculine and feminine creations. But no! Adam was not three hours unmated. If a physician can by anæsthetics put one into a deep sleep in three minutes, God certainly could have put Adam into a profound sleep in a short while that Saturday afternoon and made the deep and radical excision without causing distress. By a manipulation of the dust, the same hand that moulded the mountains moulded the features, and moulded the limbs of the father of the human race. But his eyes did not see, and his nerves did not feel, and his muscles did not move, and his lungs did not breathe, and his heart did not pulsate. A perfect form he lay along the earth, symmetrical and of God-like countenance. Magnificent piece of Divine carpentry and Omnipotent sculpturing, but no vitality. A body without a soul. Then the Source of all life stooped to the inanimate nostril and lip, and, as many a skillful and earnest physician has put his lips to a patient in comatose state and breathed into his mouth and nostril, and at the same time compressed the lungs, until that which was artificial respiration became natural respiration, so methinks God breathed into this cold sculpture of a man the breath of life, and the heart begins to tramp, and the lungs to inhale, and the eyes to open and the entire form to thrill, and with the rapture of a life just come, the prostrate being leaps to his feet—a man! But the scene of this Saturday is not yet done, and in the atmosphere, drowsy with the breath of flowers, and the song of bobolinks, and robin-redbreasts, the man slumbers, and by anæsthetics, divinely administered, the slumber deepens until without the oozing of one drop of blood at the time, or the faintest scar afterward, that portion is removed from his side which is to be built up the Queen of Paradise, the daughter of the great God, the mother of the human race, the benediction of all ages, woman the wife, afterward woman the mother. And as the two join hands and stroll down along the banks of the Euphrates toward a bower of mignonette and wild rose and honeysuckle, and are listening to the call of the whip-poor-will from the aromatic thickets, the sun sinks beneath the horizon. "And the evening and the morning were the sixth day."

What do you think of that one week's work? I review it not for entertainment, but because I would have you join in David's Doxology: "Great and Marvelous are Thy Works, Lord God Almighty;" because I want you to know what a homestead our Father built for his children at the start, though sin has despoiled it; and because I want you to know how the world will look again when Christ shall have restored it, swinging now between two Edens; because I want you to realize something of what a mighty God he is and the utter folly of trying to war against him; because I want you to make peace with this Chief of the Universe through the Christ who mediates between offended Omnipotence and human rebellion; because I want you to know how fearfully and wonderfully you are made, your body as well as your soul an Omnipotent achievement; because I want you to realize that order reigns throughout the universe, and that God's watches tick to the second, and that his clocks strike regularly, though they strike once in a thousand years. A learned man once asked an old Christian man who had no advantages of schooling, why he believed there was a God, and the good old man, who probably had never heard an argument on the subject in all his life, made this noble reply: "Sir, I have been here going hard upon fifty years. Every day since I have been in this world I see the sun rise in the east and set in the west. The north star stands where it did the first time I saw it; the seven stars and Job's coffin keep on the same path in the sky and never turn out. It isn't so with man's work. He makes clocks and watches; they may run well for awhile, but they get out of fix and stand stock still. But the sun, and moon, and stars keep on this same way all the while. The heavens declare the glory of God." Yea, I preach this, because I want you to walk in appreciation of Addison's sublime sentiment when he writes:

The spacious firmament on high
With all the blue ethereal sky
And spangled heav'ns, a shining frame,
Their Great Original proclaim.

In reason's ear they all rejoice
And utter forth a glorious voice
Forever singing, as they shine,
The hand that made us is divine.

CHRISTIAN WORK IN JAPAN.

AST January an article was published in this journal describing an effort that was being made by Mr. J. McLain Brown, an American missionary to reach the University students in Tokio, Japan. A portrait of Mr. Brown and a picture of the ruins of the burned Tabernacle in which the work had been conducted, accompanied the article. We now give on this page a picture of the new Tabernacle, which has been erected, and on page 333, portraits of seven young students, who have been won by God's blessing on Mr. Brown's labors, to seek Christ for themselves. Respecting the latter picture, Mr. Brown writes:

"Four of the leading colleges are represented in the group shown in the photograph. These seven, who have been in my Bible classes, have asked for and are now receiving instruction preparatory to baptism, and our hearts are so full of gratitude to our heavenly Father that we cannot praise him enough. My Sunday Bible class, which is evangelistic, has now thirty-five scholars, the greater part of them students of the Imperial University. The Tuesday night training class has fourteen members. And week before last a fine fellow by the name of Akutsu, came to me and entreated me to give Christian instruction to him and five of his fellow students in the higher middle school. He has been in my Sunday class, but as he is studying surveying his class has to go out and do practical surveying on Sunday afternoon, and therefore could not come. Notwithstanding that my time is nearly all occupied, I had them come on Saturday night, and we had a blessed time. Akutsu accepted Christ as his Saviour, and another young man said that he had all his doubts removed, and both prayed fervently. The third was greatly impressed, and I am asking God for the souls of these five, because they come from the school that has antagonized Christianity. These fellows in the higher middle school of the Imperial University are the students that committed the assault on Dr. Imbrie last spring. We have a band of twentyself-supporting persons (including the wives of the members,) at work in different parts of the Empire, teaching and preaching among the people.

Unsectarian Work.

"Four of our workers here are classed as follows—Kimura, our godly Japanese singer and leader of the choir, is a congregationalist, a graduate of the Doshisha, Kiota college. Gaunt-lett is an Episcopalian, and his father is rector of a church in Wales. He is our organist. Dr. Eby is a Methodist. They are all as broad as the day is long, and want souls saved anyway that will bring them the regeneration of the Holy Ghost. I brought my certificate from the Lutheran church at Cumberland. The Christian men that come to our training class come from other churches, and we don't ask them any questions, but say to them, come and take of the water of life freely.

"On Wednesday, January 7th, the Sunday School was organized with Mr. Ambair, a member of the Japanese House of Parliament, as superintendent, J. Kono, B. A., assistant superintendent, and Mr. Sakurai as secretary and treasurer. The first Sabbath, there were sixty-four scholars present. Now the school has run up to eighty-five, although we have had only three sessions. Now a word about our band meeting. This meeting took place on the 2nd of January, and lasted several days. Two of our number travelled about one thousand miles in order to get here, and spent one night in a Jinrikisha (a man buggy) between Kumamoto and Nagasaki. I have been in a great many deliberate assemblies before, but I never saw business done by common consent. The deference shown each other proved to my mind that there are men on earth that literally fulfill the divine command.

"All the proceedings were tempered with much prayer, and as a result since the brethren have returned to their respective fields of labor, they write me that the divine power abides with them. Without my knowledge and consent (for my wife was sick and I was absent the afternoon the election took place) they made me the secretary and treasurer of the Self-Supporting Band, and allowed me, in addition to what I get from friends in America, enough to keep the 'wolf' from the door. Well, I am like Brother Sweeney, I cannot help saying praise the Lord! We need every cent that we can get in order to push the work, as there are native helpers coming to us that will have to be cared for out of the fund, so that any amount that the Lord puts it in the hearts of my friends to send me lightens the exchequer of the Band fund that much."

In a subsequent letter Mr. Brown asks for books on the Second Advent, and adds "How this blessed truth of our Lord's return takes hold on our young men!" This is what is wanted in Japan.

DR. TALMAGE'S HELP TO THE FALLEN.

A PATHETIC story is sent to us from Albany, Ga., which shows how the wide circulation of Dr. Talmage's sermons is being blessed of God. At a recent session of the Methodist Church of that town, a woman was received into membership who had for some years lived a life of profligacy and open shame.

In relating her experience she said that for a long time her conscience had tortured her. She knew that she was a lost woman and she was continually in dread of the time when she must stand before the bar of God. She believed that she was beyond the reach of mercy. Separated by her notorious character from religious association, the message of pardon for the contrite through Jesus did not reach her ear. One day recently, however, she read a sermon by Dr. Talmage, and its Gospel message brought light and hope to her heart. She sent for the Rev. J. W. Roberts, the pastor of the Methodist Church, and asked him if it was true as Dr. Talmage said, that even such as she might come to God and find pardon. She was assured that it was true. There and then she humbled herself before God and pleaded for mercy through Christ. Soon the peace and joy of salvation filled her heart.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

An Ignoble Use for a Flag—A Soldier Traced by a Blood-Stained Book—A Remarkable Suit.

UNDER Concealed Under the Stars and Stripes was taken last week from a house in New York. A girl who was sitting-up all night nursing a sick person heard a noise in the street about three o'clock. Looking out of window, she saw, by the light of the electric lamp, two Irishmen, one of whom she knew, coming out of a house opposite, carrying a bundle wrapped in the national flag. Later in the day it was found that a burglary had been committed. A club-room had been entered, and spoons and forks and two silver cups had been stolen. The girl told what she had seen, and the two men were traced and arrested. The plunder, still covered by the Stars and Stripes, was found in their possession. It was an ignoble use for the venerated emblem, and was not excused by the fact that the offenders were citizens of foreign birth. They should have had more respect for the flag under which they live. But their offence was venial in comparison with that of men who use the Christian profession to conceal a wicked life. The practice is all too common now, as it was in old time, when the prophet complained of his contemporaries who did evil, but were punctilious in religious observance, "and," as he said, "so they wrap it up." (Micah 7: 3.)

A Prisoner's Paintings have Astonished the visitors to the prison at Sing Sing, N. Y. Four years ago a man who had been convicted of grand larceny was sentenced to six-years' imprisonment and was confined at Sing Sing. When the law was passed forbidding the prisoners working, this man spent his time in making pen-and-ink sketches. Principal Keeper Connaughton, who is always studying the peculiarities of the prisoners in his keeping, observed the man's taste and skill, and permitted him to try his hand at decorating the chapel walls. He went to work first on the north wall of the chapel, on which he painted a representation of the Prodigal Son. He did so well that the remainder of his time in prison was occupied in the same work. His last painting, "The Last Supper," he completed a few months ago. His sentence, with deductions for good conduct, expired on Wednesday last and he was discharged. It is not the first time that the discovery of an unsuspected talent has been made in a period of shame and discipline. It may be hoped, however, that this was not the only discovery about himself that the convict made in prison. His future life may be a better one if he learned, too, the fact, which also may have been unsuspected before, that his nature is corrupt and that only in Christ is there hope of strength for permanent reformation. (Hos. 13: 9.)

A Blood-Stained Book of Psalms was Last week the means of relieving the suspense of a family in Ohio. It appears that early in the war a young man enlisted in the 126th Ohio volunteers. He was known as a brave soldier and kept his family informed of his movements down to 1864. On May 6 of that year the battle of the Wilderness was fought and after that the family heard no more of him. Inquiries were made of his comrades and the officers of the regiment, but no information was obtained. A few weeks ago his cousin was in communication with Gen. Gordon of Georgia and asked him if he had ever chanced to hear of the missing soldier. Gen. Gordon sent the question to an Atlanta journal which published it. On May 18 an answer was received. It came from a man who had been a Confederate soldier and had been wounded in the battle of the Wilderness. He said that while in the field-hospital a young wounded Union soldier was brought in and laid beside him. Both were expecting death and they talked of the impending change. The Union soldier had a book of Psalms which was stained with blood from his wound. This helped them in the trying time. The Union soldier died in the hospital leaving the volume in the hands of the Confederate, who recovered. He has the book still and on looking into it when Gen. Gordon's question was published, he saw on the fly-leaf the name of the man about whose fate his family knew nothing. They now know through the inscription in the book the time and place of his death. The Confederate wrote underneath, "I hope he is in heaven." The family are sure to echo that hope, but as to that they are still ignorant for it depends on whether his name was inscribed in another book which no living man has seen—the Book of Life. (Rev. 20: 12.)

A Remarkable Suit to Cancel the Sale of Real Estate was tried last week in New York. It appeared from the evidence that a house worth twenty thousand dollars is the property of a widower who has two sons. He inherited it under the will of his deceased wife, who bequeathed it to him for his life, with the stipulation that after his death it should pass to his two sons in joint ownership. The father is now fifty years of age. His sons, knowing the terms of their mother's will, and being sure that if they outlived their father they would eventually own the house, recently disposed of their interest in it. They sold it to a saloon-keeper for six hundred dollars, he to enter upon possession at the death of their father. They allege that they were under the influence of liquor when the bargain was made, and they now appeal to the courts to cancel the sale. They must be very foolish young men, but even they would probably have refused to make such a bargain in their sober senses. Yet it is common for men who are considered shrewd to make an infinitely worse bargain, for they sacrifice eternal life to obtain money or pleasure in this world. (Mark 8: 36.)

A Man, Whose heart was Shaken out of its place by an accident on the railroad, died at his home near Birmingham, Ala., on May 20. In November, 1889, he was working as brakeman on a freight train on the Georgia Pacific Railroad, running between Birmingham and Columbus, Miss. He was climbing up the side of a box car while the train was passing through a cut. A rock projecting out from one side of the cut struck him in the left side knocking him off the car. He was unconscious a long time, and when picked up the doctors said his injuries were all internal. They found that his heart had been moved over on the right side of his chest, eight inches by actual measure from its normal position. The doctors said the man would die in a few hours, but he did not, and in a few days was able to walk about and suffered very little pain. His heart, however, did not return to its proper position. He sued the Company for $30,000 damages, but as he was apparently well the jury gave him only $3,500. A few months after he was injured he began to lose flesh. As he became reduced in flesh he suffered great pain in his chest, and finally hemorrhages set in from which he died last week. After death an autopsy was made, and it was found that not only the man's heart, but all his internal organs had been moved from their natural position by the shock which in the end caused his death. The jury would probably have given him a larger sum had they known that his injuries were fatal, but they were deceived by his robust condition. The world and the church are often similarly deceived by moral character. Many men are apparently so good that they are regarded as children of God, but God condemns them because they draw near to him with their mouth and honor him with their lips, but they have removed their heart far from him (Isa 29: 13)

Canadians who have Settled in the United States are being urged by the Dominion Government to return to their native land. A special agent who has been travelling through the New England States reports that he finds large numbers of Canadians who are out of employment or who are working for small salaries who bitterly regret coming across the border. He said: "These people were induced to come to the United States under the idea that they would get higher wages and better employment, but they realize that they have exchanged the substance for the shadow. Wages all over the United States are lower to-day than in Canada, and I have the most reliable evidence to prove it. There is plenty of employment in Canada for good, steady men, and living is cheaper. The difficulty in the majority of cases is that they have not the money to get back." Many people who have been tempted by the hope of gain to leave God's house for the world, are in like condition, but there is no such difficulty in their case. God promises to receive them freely. (Hosea 14: 4.)

PROF. WILLIAM H. GREEN

The Newly-Elected Moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly.

(See Portrait.)

THE one hundred and third General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, which convened at Detroit, Mich., on Thursday last, accomplished the difficult and delicate task of electing a Moderator with unexpected ease and celerity. Dr. Dickey, of Philadelphia, who was the candidate of the progressive party in the Assembly for the office, proposed the election of Prof. William Henry Green, of Princeton, and he was chosen by acclamation.

Dr. Green, whose portrait is given on this page, is sixty-six years of age. He was born near Bordentown, N. J., and was educated at Lafayette College. After teaching classics and mathematics for three or four years he went to Princeton, graduating in Theology in 1846. He was pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia for a time, and a Professor of Princeton in 1851. He has now occupied the chair of Oriental and Old Testament literature in that institution for forty years. His scholarship in this department is unsurpassed. In addition to his work as an instructor, he has published a Hebrew grammar, a Hebrew Chrestomathy, Moses and the Prophets, which was a reply to Robertson Smith and Kuenen; The Hebrew Feasts, a reply to Wellhausen, and many other works. He was one of the translators of Lange's Commentary, and was one of the committee on the Revised Version of the Bible. Dr. Green is recognized as the highest authority in America on the conservative side in the higher criticism of the old Testament. The Assembly is to be congratulated on having for its presiding officer a man so well qualified, so far as learning goes, to deal with the questions which it will have to consider in relation to the appointment of Dr. Briggs mentioned on page 331 of this issue.

THE WORLD'S LAST DIVISIONS.

How the World will be Divided in the Days Preceding the Millennium.

BY REV. HENRY STURT.

OF the four monarchies represented by the Great Image in Daniel 2: the fourth was the Roman Empire. This monarchy is represented in two stages—by the iron legs in the first stage, and by the clay-iron feet and toes in the second stage. The iron was Roman Imperialism. The Roman Empire was in this first stage of its history when Christ was born, being then in its unity, and the height of its glory, under Augustus Cæsar. This fourth empire closes in a ten-fold division, represented by the ten toes of the image and they are all composed of iron and clay. Its first division was into East and West, corresponding to the two legs of the image. But its final division will be into exactly ten kingdoms. If you take a map of you will see now it embraces all the countries around the Mediterranean Sea, and stretches from the Euphrates in the East to Britain in the West. According to the vision, this will finally fall into ten kingdoms, with democratic forms of government.

The Roman Empire

Historically, the growth of the image is from the head downward, beginning with absolutism, and ending with democratic monarchies. At this stage the Stone strikes the image and grinds it to powder. The Stone then takes the place of the image, but far exceeds its dominion, and 'fills the whole earth.'

We must bear in mind that the vision has carried us on to the 'latter days,' and far beyond the period of the first Advent of our Lord, which took place during Augustus Cæsar's reign, when the Roman Empire was in its unity, and in its iron stage of Imperialism. It cannot, therefore, be Christ's first Advent which is referred to by the Stone which smites the image but must be something yet to come. For it does not smite the image until its growth is complete; and that final stage is clearly not yet fully reached.

The Ten-Fold Division

of the fourth empire, represented by the ten toes of the image, is clearly shown in Daniel 8: 24, where the ten horns of the wild beast are said to be 'ten kings that shall arise' out of the fourth kingdom. For 'kings' and 'kingdoms,' it will be observed, are used interchangeably. No commentator, living or dead, has yet been able to show the past accomplishment of this ten-fold division of the Roman Empire, taking in the whole extent of it, in its eastern and western divisions.

Probably such kingdoms as England, France, Austria, Italy and Spain, will remain much as they are until the ten-fold division is complete. A further enlargement of Greece may be expected and the complete independence of Egypt. There will also doubtless be a separation of Syria from the rest of Turkey, and other changes in the Balkan States recently separated from the Turkish Empire, by the Russo-Turkish War, and also in the Rhenish provinces now held by Germany.

But the chief addition to our information which Daniel's seventh chapter contains is the rise and history of which springs out of one of the ten, and subdues three others, and then, after a career of lawlessness and rebellion against the Most High, and persecution of the saints for three years and a half, as shown in Daniel 7: 25, is brought under the judgment of the Ancient of Days, as described in verses 9-11. In verse 26 we see the career of this evil power runs on to the end, that is, to the close of "the times of the Gentiles," to which the vision of the image reaches; thus harmonising with the words of Daniel to Nebuchadnezzar, that God had shown him what was to come to pass in "the latter days." It is of the greatest importance to notice these time marks, if we are to give a consistent explanation of the prophecies of God's Word. This power which lifts itself in lawlessness against God is the great Antichristian development, which the Scriptures in so many places distinctly show will mark the end of the present age.

Daniel's vision of the ram and goat is contained in Daniel's eighth chapter and from the interpretation at verses 20 and 21 we learn that the former represented 'the kings of Media and Persia,' and the latter

The King of Grecia

But the interest of the chapter centres in the latter. This Grecian Monarchy is represented in the vision of the image by brass, and in the vision of the four beasts by the winged and four-headed leopard. The great horn between its eyes, it is said, "is the first king"—i. e., Alexander the Great. When that was broken, four came up in its place to represent the four-fold division of his empire, which took place at his death, among his four generals. Ptolemy took Egypt, Cyrene, Cælo-Syria and some of the southern parts of Asia Minor; Cassander took Macedon and Greece; Lysimachus took Thrace, Western Bithynia, Lesser Phrygia, Mysia, and Lydia; Seleucus took all the rest, commonly called Syria. But here again our attention is drawn to a little horn springing out of one of the four. It stretches its power towards the south and east and towards the pleasant land—i. e., Palestine. It becomes a great persecutor of the saints, represented in verse 10 by "the stars and the host of heaven." It destroys the sacrificial worship, and "casts down the truth to the ground" (verse 12).

Special attention in this case too must be paid to which fix the period when the vision is to be fulfilled. These are very different and clear. In verse 17 it is said to refer to "the time of the end;" in verse 19 it is called "the last end of the indignation;" in verse 23 it is said to be "the latter time of their kingdom"—i. e., the four kingdoms rising out of Alexander's Empire, and in verse 25 the evil king, represented by the little horn, is said to "stand up against the Prince of princes"—i. e., Christ.

The four kingdoms into which Alexander's Empire fell were swallowed up in the Roman Empire. But this prophecy shows they will reappear in the latter days, which will be "the latter time of the kingdom." In a word, they will be four of the ten into which the Roman Empire will then fall. The little horn is the same in both cases, rising within the same territory, at the same period, and having the same marks of evil. But this vision shows more clearly that this evil power will rise somewhere in the Eastern part of the Roman Empire, which has been so strangely overlooked by those who have tried to find the fulfillment in the Western half, as if the Eastern had never existed.

We see, therefore, that the four divisions of Alexander's Empire will re-appear as the "time of the end" draws near. Greece has already done so, though it has not yet attained its full dimensions. Egypt is doubtless just on the borders of independence. When, in the impending rupture of the Turkish Empire, Syria is taken away from it, then the four will once more exist (the remaining portion of Turkey, around Constantinople, being the fourth), and "the latter time of their kingdom" will have come, when the "fierce king" will stand up and run a brief career of fearful rebellion against the "Prince of princes." Then will follow the session of the "Ancient of Days" and the judgment "because of the great words which the horn spake." And then the Son of Man will be invested with the sovereignty of the earth, and all the nations shall be ruled and blessed by him.

HEZEKIAH THE GOOD KING.

S. S. LESSON FOR JUNE 7, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
II. CHRON. 29: 1-11. GOLDEN TEXT, I SAM. 2: 30.

The King's Difficult Task—Complicated by his Father's Misdeeds—Re-opening of the Lord's House—Hezekiah's Motto—His Appeal to the Priests—Repairing the Negligence of the Preceding Reign—The Type of Nineteenth Century Religion—The Great Dedication Service.

HEZEKIAH had the misfortune of being the son of a very bad father. It was no light thing for a young man of twenty-five years of age to take the reins of government in the Lord's land out of the hands of a father whose sins had been so great that for his sake "the Lord brought Judah low." (chap. 28: 19.) It was no easy matter to institute a reform when the national religion had been completely overturned, and all religious observances subverted by rank idolatry. But circumstances are not all-powerful, and Hezekiah, if he had a bad father, had, on the other hand, a good adviser, and an earnest, praying friend in the prophet Isaiah. Who can estimate the value of such a friend? God, who called Hezekiah to his vocation, provided him with this incalculable blessing and encouragement. Hezekiah was raised up by God and he did not let the grass grow under his feet. "He, in the first year of his reign, in the first month, opened the doors of the house of the Lord." It was a bold stroke; priests, prophets, (with the exception of Isaiah and Joel,) politicians, poets and scribes, had all lapsed into idolatry; was it not an unwise and dangerous thing to run so utterly counter to general opinion, and that so early in his reign? Might it not have been better to wait a little, and win the people gradually? Worldly wisdom would have said so, but with Hezekiah the question was a vital one, a question for eternity. God was everything to him; without God he could do nothing and the young king knew his God well enough to count definitely on his support in all that he did by his direction. "God first" was practically his watchword. He knew that if the idolatrous priests and prophets stirred up a revolution against him, they could only do what God permitted them, nothing could be by chance and he counted God responsible. By the order of the king, the doors of God's house were opened, before he had given himself time to inspect the army and revise the laws, or to attract any attention to himself as the newly crowned sovereign. He wished it to be understood that he reigned over God's people in the fear of God. There is great wisdom in making a bold stand for God. When a young Christian man enters an office for the first time, it is well that he should let all his companions know on whose side he is, the very first opportunity. If they urge him to accompany them to the theatre or music hall, he has the best of chances to say, "I am not my own, and I cannot dispose of myself, I must go where God calls me." Raillery and mockery may follow, but he has taken his stand, and all his companions know that he is not afraid to be known as a Christian.

To be a Reformer,

Having begun the work of reformation in person, and so led the way, Hezekiah next aroused the priests; no legendary etiquette prevented his dealing with them in all faithfulness. He brought them and the Levites together. The king well knew that if the teachers were not reformed, any movement of reform among the people would fail of its ultimate object. Hezekiah's appeal was unmistakable in its clearness and definiteness. "Hear me, ye Levites, sanctify now yourselves,"—no putting off, no delay—"and sanctify the house of the Lord God of your fathers." Themselves first, then the house, both must be unreservedly the Lord's. "And carry forth the filthiness out of the holy place." "For our fathers have transgressed," etc. Thank God we are redeemed, not "with corruptible things," but with incorruptible, even "with the precious blood of Christ," from our sins; from "this present evil world;" from living to ourselves, and from the "vain conversation (or manner of life) received by tradition from our fathers." While we are bound to honor our parents, we are not bound to make their lives the standard for ours. Jesus says, "follow me."

The generation of Ahaz had "shut the doors of the house of the Lord"—the way into the sanctuary was blocked up, the altar of burnt offering, the witness that through the shed blood, the poured out life, there was atonement for sin, had stood unused, the way to God was untrodden. They had "put out the lamps." It was God's ordinance that the lamp should

"Burn Always."

(Exod. 27: 20.) It was a precious type of the light which he intended his people should be; "Ye are the light of the world, a city that is set on a hill cannot be hid." (Matt. 5: 14.) When God's children cease to be the light of the world, when the light which is in them is darkness, O "how great is that darkness," how infinitely greater than if they never had been children of light! They had "not burned incense, nor offered burnt offerings in the holy place." God had been ignored; independence of God had been the order of the day. His Word was not read, his songs were not sung, his laws were not obeyed, his guidance was not sought, and the religion which was substituted for his worship was that which ministered to the senses and tastes of the people, not to the honor of God. What is intrinsically but the sin of Ahaz, who shut up the doors of God's temple, put out the lamps, stopped the sacrifices, and put idols in the place of God? The spirit of the age is "no God," at least, "no God who hears prayer, who interferes with us, who moves, and speaks, and acts. We want a God whom we can admire at a distance, a beautiful idea, not a real God who can have a claim upon us, and to whom we are responsible? No, we will have none such."

Nineteenth Century Religion

Hezekiah was not afraid to trace the desolation of Judah to their sins against God. "Wherefore the wrath of the Lord was upon Judah and Jerusalem, and he hath delivered them to trouble, to astonishment, and to hissing, as ye see with your eyes." The same supercilious smile would curl the corners of the lips of irreverent scoffers then as now, and probably if the young king had had his eye on man he would have had a hard time of it.

Then the king held a solemn dedication service and offered for all Israel; it was a national confession and humiliation (ver. 21-24), and then only was the voice of praise heard. It is easy to sing and praise God when no burden of sin is on the conscience. Then sacrifices and thank offerings succeeded, and the city and the temple which had been filled with idols were now all alive with worshippers, and the Lord had done it through his faithful servant. "And Hezekiah rejoiced, and all the people, that God had prepared the people, for the thing was done suddenly." Thus quickly, thus completely, a whole nation returned to their God, when their ruler himself took the lead!

One month later, the greatest passover feast ever known in Judæa was celebrated. The revival was at its height. Even from Israel many came up to it. It was continued twice the ordinary time, lasting a fortnight, instead of a week only. And the result was an abolition of idolatry, destruction of idols, the re-establishment of God's worship throughout the whole land, and then such an abundant offering for the maintenance of the Levites and of the worship of God, that chambers had to be prepared in the house of the Lord to contain the superfluous offerings! Could it be a loss to Judæa politically that Hezekiah's reign began thus? Would that every king and ruler put God thus first; would that all who rule over men should thus lead the way in serving God!

THE FAITHFUL GOVERNOR,

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for June 7. "Them that honor me, I will honor."—1. Saml. 2: 30.

NINETEEN four hundred years ago, the kingdom of Corea, which was then under the peaceful rule of a monarch of the ancient line of the Tunguse, was invaded by an army, which crossed the Sea of Japan, and began to advance on its principal cities. The Kaoli-Wang, or sovereign of the little kingdom, summoned his feeble army to resist the invasion. From the borders of the Yellow Sea, which washes the South and West shores of the kingdom, to the Sea of Japan, which bounds it on the East, came the patriots; from the plow, from the loom, from the mines they came, and from the fishing boats, all flocking to Seoul, the capital city and the chief fortress of the kingdom.

To the South of Corea is the famous Gate, which, as all Easterns know, is the key by which the brave Coreans have held their country safe from enemies for many centuries. Here a strong guard was posted, under the brave leader, Oyama, who was appointed Governor of the Gate and ordered by the Kaoli-Wang to hold it at all hazards with his troop of swordsmen and spearmen. It had been the custom for many generations in Corea to light fires on the mountain tops, as a signal to the dwellers below, one fire meaning that all was peaceful and two indicating the approach of an enemy. On the evening of the third day after Oyama and his troop had been stationed at the Gate, they discovered fires on every mountain top within sight. The invaders had left their ships and were now marching on the Coreans.

What followed is told in the royal chronicles of the kingdom. Three armies attacked at different points, and on the North, the weak forces of the Coreans, notwithstanding that many among them performed prodigies of valor, were soon overcome and scattered. Driven back with a remnant of his arms to the capital, the king, to avoid further slaughter consented to receive an embassy from the enemy.

During the negotiations the fallen monarch was approached by a courier from the south, with the news that all was not yet lost, that Oyama still held the gate, although his troop had been reduced very greatly by the fierce onslaughts of the enemy. The courier bore to the king the assurance from Oyama that never while he lived would he surrender the Gate. This stray morsel of comfort had no effect, however, as far as the situation at Seoul was concerned. The capitulation was complete; the terms degrading. The deposed monarch was doomed to exile and those chiefs who had been foremost in the field, to decapitation.

It was a sad day in Seoul when the decree went into effect, which pronounced the usurper king of Corea and ruler of its people. With the arrival of his imperial consort, Queen Sho, and her retinue, there began a reign of great wickedness, such as had never before been witnessed in the little kingdom. The Coreans were shocked at the vicious practices of the Court, and the boldness of its beautiful Queen, who, save in military matters, assumed the government of the kingdom to a greater extent than her spouse. The best portions of the land were given to her favorites. Beautiful farms, the richest mines and the cotton and silk, the accumulations of many years of industry were absorbed by the invaders.

Amidst all these changes, there remained one man on the peninsula who refused to bow the knee to the usurper or to do homage to his wicked Queen. This was Oyama. One by one, his brave band, who had held the gate had been slaughtered; but Queen Sho had commanded her soldiers to take Oyama alive. So impressed had she been by his bravery that even this usurper discerned in the man a great spirit. Brought before Queen Sho, she interrogated him as to his lineage and training, and finding that he was descended from a noble branch of Tunguse stock, she was minded to do him honor.

"Give your alliance to our rule," said the beautiful Queen, "and you will be appointed Governor, not of the Gate, but of the entire province. Nay, it is our pleasure not to stay here much longer, but to place our new territory which we have conquered, under the hand of a Viceroy. If you will but bow the knee, I, Queen Sho, will name you for that post and you shall remain in your beloved Corea."

The old Governor shook his head.

"It may not be, most noble Queen," he said. "I have sworn fealty to my king, while I live, and I may not renounce my oath."

The Queen started up excitedly and cried:

"What! will you, a slave, dare to refuse an honor when Queen Sho is the giver? I will add wealth—much wealth. Yes, the richest mines of gold and silver shall be for your private use, so that you may maintain the position of Viceroy with a splendor becoming it."

But again the Governor shook his head and turned away.

"Queen, tempt me no more," he said. "I would be less worthy than a dog if I forgot my allegiance to Corea's king."

"Seize him" cried the usurper in anger at the stubbornness of the old Corean. "Say you the king, while I am king of Corea? Know, slave, that we can punish traitors as well as bestow favors."

And he ordered four of his guards to seize Oyama and bind him. He was cast into a prison, in the darkest part of the fortress of Seoul, where lay for many days.

Meanwhile, the revelry at Seoul continued and day and night were alike given up to carnival and sin. The oppression of the people, by the usurper had become intolerable. Finally, in revenge for some act of unusual cruelty done by the usurper's personal order, a soldier of Seoul shot a shaft at the monarch, which, true to its aim, sped to his heart. On the usurper's death, Queen Sho at once seized the reins of government with a strong hand. Her chiefs stood in terror of the masculine Queen, who, although beautiful, was a barbarian at heart.

The Coreans, taking advantage of the demoralized condition of affairs, decided that the time had come to make an effort to regain their lost freedom. Again the watchfires blazed on the hills. In an unexpected hour, the patriot army, led by the Kaoli-Wang in person, burst upon the astonished Queen at Seoul. Slaughter, brief but terrible, followed. The Queen, her courtiers and generals, surprised over their cups, fled to the inner part of the fortress, where the wicked Sho found herself hemmed in by the Corean troops. Even while they fled they had kept their wine-cups in their hands.

"Pour more wine," cried the Queen, and a slave obeyed. As the wine sparkled, she called on her nobles to drink a draught. As they drained it the Queen also drank.

"No Corean slave shall ever make captive of Queen Sho," she cried to her nobles, "for we shall all be dead before they reach us."

She spoke truly, for she had slipped poison into the draught, and when the Coreans came they found the floor strewn with dead.

When the morning sun again shone over the Corean hills, the city showed little evidence of the carnage of the previous night. A prisoner of the fortress guided his followers to the dungeon where Oyama lay. He was brought to the light and was warmly welcomed by the king.

"I have heard, O Oyama, even in my distant exile, how you were tempted and how you refused what other men would have grasped at, and were true to your allegiance to me. Them that honor me I will honor. I now proclaim you Governor of Corea, and next to ourselves, your word shall be obeyed throughout this kingdom while you live."

Thus it was that Oyama received his reward for his fidelity to his king.

OURSELVES RESPONSIBLE.

OUR disposition is much of our own making. We admit there is great difference in natural constitutions. Some persons are born cross. See that man with a long face, that never shortens into a laugh. Tell me, did not his mother have trouble with him when he was small? Why, he never was pleased. Did he not make riots in the nursery among looking-glasses and glass pitchers? Was his nurse ever able on her knee to jolt down his petulance or shake up his good humor? Did he not often hold an indignation meeting flat on the floor, his hands, his head, and feet all participating in the exercise? Could not his father tell you a story of twelve o'clock at night, with hasty toilet, walking the floor with the dear little blessing in his arms? A story that would be a caution to old bachelors.

Then there are other persons who, from childhood, while they are not at all petulant, yet show a sad and melancholy turn of mind which seems ineradicable. Although their lot may be comfortable, they have, all their life long, the appearance of having met with afflictions. Others are from infancy light and happy. They romp, they fly. You can hear their swift feet in the hall. Their loud laughter rings through the house, or in the woods bursts into a score of echoes. At night you can hardly hush their glad hearts for slumber, and in the morning they wake you with their singing. Alas! if then they leave you, and you no more hear their swift feet in the hall, and their loud laughter ringing through the house, or in the woods bursting into a score of echoes; if they wake you no more in the morning with their sweet song; if the color go out of the rose, and its leaves fall; if angels for once grow jealous, and want what you cannot spare; if packed away in the trunk or drawer there be silent garments that once fluttered with youthful life, and by mistake you call some other child by the name of the one departed! Ah me! Ah me!

But while we may all from our childhood have a certain bent given to our disposition, much depends upon ourselves whether we will be happy or miserable.

You will see in the world chiefly what you look for. A farmer going through the country chiefly examines the farms, an architect the buildings, a merchant the condition of the markets, a minister the churches, and so a man going through the world will see the most of that for which he especially looks. He who is constantly watching for troubles will find them stretching off into the gloomy wilderness, while he who is watching for blessings will find them, hither and thither, extending into harvests of luxuriance.

Like most garments, like most carpets, everything in life has a right side and a wrong side. You can take any joy, and by turning it around, find troubles on the other side; or you may take the greatest trouble, and by turning it around, find joys on the other side. The gloomiest mountain never casts a shadow on both sides at once, nor does the greatest of life's calamities. The earth, in its revolutions, manages about right; it never has darkness all over at the same time. Sometimes it has night in America, and sometimes in China; but there is some part of the earth constantly in the bright sunlight. When you have trouble, keep turning around, and you will find sunlight somewhere. Amid the thickest gloom through which you are called to pass, carry your own candle. A consummate fret will in almost every instance come to nothing. You will not go to such a merchant's store, nor employ such a mechanic, nor call such a minister. Fretfulness will kill anything that is not in its nature immortal. There is a large class of persons in constant trouble about their health, although the same amount of strength in a cheerful man would be taken as healthiness. Their digestion being constantly suspected of unfaithfulness, finally refuses to serve such a master, and says, "Hereafter make way with your own lobsters," and the suspicious lungs resign their office, saying, "Hereafter blow your own bellows."

MEDICINE OF SUNSHINE.

WE think that all our city folk ought somehow to get every week a few hours in the clear, unmixed sunshine as the Lord pours it out of the heavens. Last Sabbath was a day of unusual duties, and Monday morning, with loud-clamoring work all about us, we said, our call this morning is to the fields. We made a bold dash, and at a speed that no one dared halt, we were soon beyond the city limits. As we hastened past, a brother clergyman shouted, "Whither away?" We answered, "In quest of sunshine!" And was there ever a brighter luxury? The cup of the morning had been washed out by a shower; the hum of the city became fainter, and we found what we wanted floating on the lake, tangled in the bushes, rippling among the green grass, dripping from the sky—sunshine. Glorious sunshine! With it we filled our eyelids, our mouth, our hands. We opened our entire physical capacity to take it in. We took out our soul and saturated it in the lush light. We absorbed it in all our pores, and rolled it around our nerves; and after we could hold no more inside, lifted our face and held it so aslant that it ran down over us—the sunshine. What do the blind do without seeing it? How can the factory employees get on without feeling it? Let all the ministry on Monday morning be turned out into it. By the following Saturday night it will ripen all the acidity out of the sermons. The world wants more sunshine in its disposition, in its business, in its charities, in its theology. For ten thousand of the aches and pains and irritations of men and women we commend the sunshine. It soothes better than morphine. It stimulates more than champagne. It is the best plaster for a wound. The good Samaritan poured out into the fallen traveller's gash more of this than of wine and oil. Florence Nightingale used it on Crimean battle-fields. Take it into all the alleys, on board all the ships, by all the sick-beds. Not a phial full, nor a cup full, nor a decanter full, but a soul full. It is good for spleen, for liver complaint, for neuralgia, for rheumatism, for failing fortunes, for melancholy. We suspect that heaven itself is only more sunshine.

BRIEF NOTES.

Among the communicants who have recently joined the Tabernacle Church, in New York, of which Dr. W. M. Taylor is pastor, have been three Chinamen and one Armenian.

The Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church closes its financial year with a debt of $18,000. It was feared a short time ago that the debt would have been larger.

The oldest missionary in India is said to be the American Presbyterian, the Rev. John Newton, who is still at his post in Lahore, at the age of seventy-eight. He began his missionary labors in Calcutta in 1835.

The sixty-fifth anniversary of the American Home Missionary Society will be held June 2d-4th, at Saratoga, N. Y. The receipts of the New York office were: From contributions, $302,240.07; from legacies, $158,759.48; in all, $460,999.55.

The Seaman's Friend Society expended last year $362.70 for the relief of shipwrecked and destitute seamen. It also sent out 438 loan libraries. Its missionaries have labored in many ports in Europe, Asia, and South America, besides those of our own land.

Rev. Dr. Samuel McBride has tendered his resignation of the pastorate of the Centennial Baptist Church, in Adelphi Street, Brooklyn, to take effect on June 1. He has undertaken to labor for some time with the American Association for the Evangelization of Ireland.

The Standing Committee of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of Northern New Jersey has made itself conspicuous by objecting to the consecration of Dr. Phillips Brooks as Bishop of Massachusetts. The standing committees of New York, Albany, and Rhode Island have signified their approval.

Bishop J. M. Thoburn, of Calcutta, says in a letter to the publisher of this journal, received last week: "I am glad to tell you that our work goes on with many signs of progress. We are greatly encouraged. We have more inquirers than we can properly attend to. I believe a better era has dawned upon our mission work."

Mr. James H. Cannon, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Evangelist closed his work at the Home Camp Meeting at Bedford St. M. E. Church, New York, on May 22. The Meetings have been a great blessing to the Church. On May 24, he commenced a series of meetings at the Johnson St. M. E. Church, Brooklyn, Rev. Thomas Littlewood, Pastor.

Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D. D., pastor of Bethany Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, has established a chapter of the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip. Its two rules are (A) to pray daily for the conversion of young men and (B) to make an earnest effort every week to bring at least one young man within the reach of the Gospel of Christ.

A pathetic request which it is a pleasure to comply with reached this office last week. Mr. John Francis Allen who is laboring in the Leper Settlement of the Hawaiian Islands, wrote that some kind friend has been sending him THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a year past. He found it so helpful in his work and it was so much appreciated by the poor sufferers that he misses it sorely now that for some reason his unknown friend has ceased to send it. He asks us to send it to him regularly. We shall do so and hope that God will continue to use it in that abode of misery to his glory.

The Training School for Sunday School Workers and Pastors' Helpers at Springfield, Mass., has just issued its report. Its object is to train laymen to be efficient Sunday School Superintendents, missionaries and pastors' lay helpers. Its courses of study include Bible and Church History, Bible Study, Vocal music, etc., and the term is two years. Upward of seventy men who have graduated from the school are now usefully employed in Baptist, Congregational, Presbyterian and Methodist Churches and the School has received calls for forty-five more. Further particulars may be obtained from the Superintendent, Rev. E. P. Armstrong, 60 Sherman Street, Springfield, Mass.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Western Cyclones—A New Political Party—Rear-Admiral Braine Retired—Queen Natalie Expelled—A Fatal Dynamite Explosion—The Ocean Post-Offices a Success.

WESTERN Missouri was visited by a tornado on May 21st, which wrecked stores, dwellings, barns and other buildings, and killed and injured many people. At the town of Mexico, in that State, the family of a farmer named Duffy was buried in the ruins of their dwelling; the house of William Stransburg was carried bodily away, and its inmates fatally hurt; a horse standing in the road was picked up by the wind, carried a mile away and dashed to death on the ground, and a heavy mowing machine was torn to shreds. Remarkable stories of narrow escapes are related. The tornado swept a clean path three hundred yards wide through several counties, passing eastward. About twelve people are known to have perished. Cyclones and violent hail storms occurred in Iowa and Illinois.

The Birth of a New Political Party at Cincinnati serves to make the week a memorable one. For three days, a gathering, comprising Farmers, Knights of Labor, Nationalists, organized railroad employees, Single Tax and Low Tariff men, Greenbackers and hard money men, was in session in the same hall on Vine Street in which Gen. Hancock was nominated for President by the Democrats in 1880. Senator Peffer was President of the Convention. After much discussion and many speeches by such notabilities as Gen. Rice, of Kansas, Hon. Jere Simpson, Hon. Ignatius Donnelly, Col. Livingston, President of the Farmers' Alliance and others, together with a very remarkable address by Master Workman Powderly, of the Knights of Labor, opposing the proposed organization at this time, the new party was formed. The name chosen was that of "The People's Party." The platform favors the abolition of national banks as banks of issue, and the substitution of legal tender treasury notes for national bank notes; the unlimited coinage of silver; the prohibition of alien ownership of land; equal taxation, national, State and municipal; a graduated income tax; government control of railroads and telegraphs; direct vote for President, Vice-President and United States Senators. It is probable that the People's Party may nominate a Presidential ticket in 1892.

One of the Heroes of the American Navy, Rear-Admiral Daniel S. Braine, retired from the service on the 18th inst., having reached the statutory limit of age. Admiral Braine, who was a New Yorker by birth, (and whose portrait is given in this column,) entered the Navy as a "middy" in 1846, and worked his way up, by pluck, gallantry and intelligence, to the very top of his profession. He participated in almost all the important naval engagements along the Atlantic Coast, during the late war, at the close of which, he was commissioned Rear-Admiral, and assigned to the command of the South Atlantic Squadron. He was one of the most popular commanders in the Navy, a fine seaman and warm friend of the late Admiral Farragut.

Unless King Humbert of Italy or his Ministers speedily devise some effective means to stop the unprecedented exodus of his subjects, some of his fairest provinces will be depopulated. The American Consul at Gibraltar reports that, in four weeks, over 20,000 Italians have shipped to this country and thousands are preparing to follow. They come from the provinces and the Consul intimates that they are by no means the most desirable class of immigrants. In some sections all the men have left and there are now only women to plow the farms and trim the vineyards. The United States Immigration Commission is now considering ways and means to check this flood of new arrivals, which they are abundantly empowered to do under the new immigration law.

One Thousand Pounds of Blasting Powder done up in twenty-five packages, which was being conveyed on a flat car on the New York Central Railroad, near Tarrytown, N. Y., on May 19th, suddenly exploded, killing outright thirteen men, who were riding on the car, and injuring twenty-two others. Ten of the killed and nearly all of the injured were Italian laborers. The explosion was caused by the spark of a passing locomotive. The effect in the neighborhood was terrifying, houses being shaken and many people thrown to the ground. The car was shattered to kindling wood, the track was torn up for many yards, and fences, trees, and lumber piles leveled and scattered. People at a distance saw the great flash and a huge cloud of smoke, laden with beams of timber and human bodies, rising in the air and the earth shook for miles around.

"Plenty Horses," the Sioux Chief, who assassinated Lieut. Casey, during the Indian rising in South Dakota last January, has been placed on trial the second time for the crime, at Sioux Falls in that State, the first trial having resulted in a disagreement. "Plenty Horses" is the son of "Strong Bear," a relative of "Two Strikes," the warlike Brule Chief, who, after the death of "Sitting Bull," became the leader of the hostiles. Lieut. Casey was reconnoitering the hostile camp in company with two Cheyenne scouts, "White Moon" and "Rock Road," and was shot by "Plenty Horses" as he was returning. The victim was one of the bravest men in the service and a very popular and rising young officer. "Plenty Horses," (whose portrait is given in this column,) was on scouting duty when he killed the Lieutenant, and in his defence claimed that he had simply done the duty of a soldier. The result of the Indian troubles and the facts connected with the death of Lieut. Casey were fully published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at the time.

Paris and London have Been Excited During the week by alarmist rumors from Portugal, intimating that a revolution had already begun. While these were unfounded, there is no doubt that a government crisis still prevails. On the 21st inst. a cabinet was organized, with General De Sousa as President, Senhors Januario and Pimental having successively attempted in vain to fulfill this duty for the king. Portugal has sent to London a large amount of gold, to guarantee a portion of her indebtedness and this, together with the fact that the gold excitement in Paris and London has practically subsided, may avert the threatened financial crisis. All the foreign banks have been strengthened by the American specie exports, $45,000,000 in gold having been sent abroad this year. The Russian demand for gold in London still continues, and much of that which has been withdrawn by Russia in the past month has been replaced by gold from this country. Fortunately this country is able to stand the drain. Much of the specie will be returned to pay for grain and cotton.

Queen Natalie of Serbia, the Unhappy Wife of Ex-king Milan, was the central figure in a most exciting incident at Belgrade, the capital of Serbia, last week. The Regents, who were under the influence of the ex-king, sent troops to Natalie's Palace with orders to escort her out of the country. This action was the outcome of the long and bitter quarrel between the Russophile party and the politicians who espoused the cause of Milan. Sometime ago, a proposition was made to the Queen that both she and Milan should live outside of Serbia during the minority of the young King Alexander, and that the country should be left to the government of the Regents and the Skuptschina or Parliament. Natalie refused, and was sustained by the opposition in the Skuptschina. Premier Rischics then decided to expel her by force. She was dragged from her rooms, placed in a carriage and surrounded by a military guard, and was being taken to the depot, when the Servian students rallied in great numbers, beat off the soldiers and drew the carriage back to the palace, after releasing the horses. For a whole night, a conflict raged between the military and the students, several men being killed and over fifty wounded, when the Queen, to avert further bloodshed, decided to leave. At daybreak on the 19th, she took a special train for the Hungarian frontier. Queen Natalie, whose portrait is given in this column, is the daughter of a Colonel in the Russian Imperial Guard and of Princess Sbroudga of Roumania. She is thirty years of age and was married to King Milan in 1875, separating judicially from him three years ago. She is a woman of rare beauty and fine accomplishments and is a great favorite with the people of Serbia, who have stood by her during all her troubles.

After a Stern Chase of Many Hundreds of miles, the U. S. Cruiser Charleston, not even having caught sight of the Chilean contraband steamer, Itata, seems to have abandoned the chase. This, it is said, has been done on the promise by the insurgents that the Itata will be surrendered without resistance, pending a settlement of the question whether or not she has violated the neutrality laws. Preparations had been made to seize her at Iquique, if she could not be headed off earlier. Secretary Tracy holds that the Charleston would be justified in taking the Itata even in Chilean waters. The rebel cruiser Esmeralda, is believed to have met the Itata and supplied her with coal enough to proceed to her destination.

Postmaster-General Wanamaker is Delighted with the success of the experimental Ocean Post-Offices. There are now ten in successful operation and they shorten the delivery of the Atlantic mails from six hours to two days. These Post-Offices have already been described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Apropos, it is worthy of note that the English Postmaster-General, Mr. Raikes, has adopted an improvement on the present pillar letter-box (which is the equivalent of our lamp-post letter-box), whereby automatic machines are to be attached for the sale of postage stamps on the nickel-in-the-slot principle. The machine is about twenty inches high and the slot into which a penny is dropped is on top. On pulling a handle, a postage stamp drops into a tray at the back of the machine, the stamp being inclosed in a very small book which is filled with advertising. From this advertising the profit on the invention is derived.

THE CHRISTIAN'S WEAPON.

A NEW SERMON, PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

The Believer's Life a Life of War—Only one Weapon of Offence Provided—I. The Sword of the Spirit—The Word the Only Sword the Spirit Uses—Two-Edged—He Made It—Instructs in the Use of it—II. The Believer's Sword—It is Needed—For Hand-to-Hand Fighting—The Regulation Weapon—Daily Exercise in its Use—To be Employed First at Home.

"Take the Sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God." Ephesians 6: 17.

TO be a Christian is to be a warrior. The good soldier of Jesus Christ must not expect to find ease in this world: it is a battlefield. Neither must he reckon upon the friendship of the world; for that would be enmity against God. His occupation is war. As he puts on piece by piece of the panoply provided for him, he may wisely say to himself, "This warns me of danger; this prepares me for warfare; this prophesies opposition."

It is clear from our text that our defence and our conquest must be obtained by sheer fighting. Many try compromise; but if you are a true Christian, you can never do this business well. It is said that if we yield a little, perhaps the world will yield a little also, and that good may come of it. If we are not too strict and narrow, perhaps sin will kindly consent to be more decent. Our association with it will prevent its being so barefaced and atrocious. If we are not narrow-minded our broad doctrine will go down with the world, and those on the other side will not be so greedy of error as they now are. No such thing. Assuredly this is not the order which our Captain has issued.

No Neutrals.

Neither may we hope to gain by being neutral, or granting an occasional truce. We are not to cease from conflict, and try to be as agreeable as we can with our Lord's foes, frequenting their assemblies, and tasting their dainties. No such orders are written here. You are to grasp your weapon, and go forth to fight.

Neither may you so much as dream of winning the battle by accident. No man was ever holy by a happy chance. Infinite damage may be done by carelessness; but no man ever won life's battle by it. To let things go on as they please, is to let them bear us down to hell. We have no orders to be quiet, and take matters easily. No; we are to pray always, and watch constantly. The Captain's voice is clear as a trumpet—Take the sword!

It is noteworthy that there is only one weapon of offence provided, although there are several pieces of armor. The Roman soldier usually carried a spear as well as a sword. We have seen frequent representations of the legionary standing upon guard as sentry, and he almost always stands with a spear in his right hand, while his sword hangs at his side. But Paul, for excellent reasons, concentrates our offensive weapons in one, because it answers for all. We are to use the sword, and that only. Therefore, if you are going to this fight, see well to your only weapon.

I. First, the Word of God which is to be

is of noble origin; for it is "the sword of the Spirit." Here we note that the Holy Spirit has a sword. He is quiet as the dew, tender as the anointing oil, soft as the zephyr of eventide, and peaceful as a dove; and yet, under another aspect, he wields a deadly weapon. He is the Spirit of judgment and the Spirit of burning, and he beareth not the sword in vain. The Word of God in the hand of the Spirit wounds very terribly, and makes the heart of man to bleed. Do you not remember, some of you, when you used to be gashed with this sword Sunday after Sunday? Were you not cut to the heart by it, so as to be angry with it? That wound was deadly, and none but he that killed could make you alive. Do you recollect how, after this, your sins were slain one after another? Their necks were laid on the block, and the spirit acted as an executioner with his sword. After that, blessed be God, your fears, and doubts, and despair, and unbelief, were also hacked to pieces by this same sword. The Word gave you life; but it was at the first

A Great Killer.

The Holy Spirit wields no sword but the Word of God. This wonderful Book, which contains the utterances of God's mouth, is the one weapon which the Holy Ghost elects to use for his warlike purposes. It is a spiritual weapon, and so is suitable to the Holy Spirit. The weapons of his warfare are not carnal: he never uses either persecution or patronage, force or bribery, glitter of grandeur, or terror of power. He works upon men by the Word, which is suitable to his own spiritual nature, and to the spiritual work which is to be accomplished. While it is spiritual, this weapon is "mighty through God." The Word, in the Spirit's hand, gives no flesh-wound, but cuts into the man's heart, and so wounds him that there is no healing save by supernatural power.

This weapon is two-edged; indeed, it is all edge; and whichever way it strikes, it wounds and kills. He that uses the Word in may use it upon all his carnal hopes, and then strike back upon unbelieving fears; he may smite with one edge the love of sin, and then with the other the pride of self-righteousness. It is a conquering weapon in all ways, this wonderful sword of the Spirit of God. The Word, we say, is the only sword which the Spirit uses. I know the Holy Ghost uses gracious sermons; but it is only in proportion as they have the Word of God in them. I know the Holy Ghost uses religious books; but only so far as they are the Word of God told out in other language. Conviction, conversion, and consolation still are wrought, and only by the Word of God. Learn, then, the wisdom of using the Word of God for holy purposes.

The Word is the sword of the Spirit because it is of his own making. He will not use a weapon of human workmanship, lest the sword boast itself against the hand that wields it. The Holy Ghost revealed the mind of God to the minds of holy men; he spake the word into their hearts, and thus he made them think as he would have them think, and to write what he willed them to write: so that what they spoke and wrote was spoken and written as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. Blessed be the Holy Spirit for deigning to use so many writers, and yet himself to remain of this collection of holy books. We are grateful for Moses, for David, for Isaiah, for Paul, for Peter, for John, but most of all for that superintending Editor, that innermost Author of the whole sacred volume—even the Holy Ghost. It is "the sword of the Spirit" because he alone can instruct us in the use of it. You think, young man, that you can pick up your Bible, and go and preach from it at once, properly and successfully. You have made a presumptuous mistake. A sword is a weapon which may do hurt to the man who flourishes it in mere wanton pride.

The Veritable Author

Young soldier, you must go to the training ground of the Holy Spirit to be made a proficient swordsman. You will go in vain to the metaphysician or to the logician; for neither of these knows how to handle a spiritual weapon. In other arts they may be masters; but in the sacred use of divine theology they are mere fools. In the things of the Word we are dunces till we enter the school of the Holy Ghost. He must take of the things of Christ, and show them unto us. He must teach us how to grip this sword by faith, and how to hold it by watchfulness, so as to parry the adversary's thrust, and carry the war into the foeman's territory. Those of us who have been in this warfare thirty or forty years feel that we have not yet reached the full use of this sword; nay, I know for one, that I need daily to be taught how to use this mysterious weapon, which is capable of more than I have yet supposed.

But, chiefly, it is the sword of the Spirit, because he is the great Master in the use of it. We know what the use of the sword by the Spirit of God means, for within our own being he has left marks of his prowess. He has killed our doubts and fears, and left no more mistrusts to worry us. When the Holy Spirit deals with the lusts of the flesh, and the lusts of the eye and the pride of life, these also lie at his feet, trophies to the power of his mighty weapon, even the Word of God! The Holy Spirit is glorious in the use of this sword. He finds that this weapon suits his hand, and he seeks no other. Let us use it also, and be glad to do so. Though it is the sword of the Spirit, yet our feeble hand may grasp it; yea, and find in the grasping that somewhat of the divine

Power Comes unto Our Arm.

Dear brethren, is it not a very high honor put upon you, as soldiers of the cross, that you should be allowed, nay, commanded to take the sword of the Spirit? This we are to bear, and no other. Does the timid heart inquire, "Where-withal, my Master, shall I meet my adversaries?" "Here," saith the Holy Ghost, "take this! This is my own sword; I have done great marvels with it; take it, and nothing shall stand against you." When you remember the potency of this sword, when the Spirit tests it upon yourself, you may take it with confidence, and use it in your holy war with full assurance. That Word of God which could convert you, can convert anybody; if it could kill your despair, it can remove another man's despondency; if it has conquered your pride and self-will, it can subdue the like in your children and your neighbors. Having done what it has certainly done for you, you may have a full persuasion that, before its power, no case is hopeless. Wherefore, see to it, that you use from this day forth no other weapon than the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God.

II. This fairly lands me in the second portion of my discourse. The Word of God is the sword of the Spirit; but it is also to be our sword. Here I must begin again, and go over much the same ground.

We shall need a Sword.

Our warfare is not child's play: we mean business. We have to deal with fierce foes, who are only to be met with keen weapons. Buffets will not suffice in this contest; we must come to sword-cuts. You may be of a very quiet spirit, but your adversaries are not so. If you attempt to play at Christian warfare, they will not. To meet the powers of darkness is no sham battle. They mean mischief. Depend upon it that in this struggle you will be forced to come to close quarters. The foe aims at your heart, and pushes home. A spear will not do, nor bow and arrow; the enemy is too near for anything but hand-to-hand fighting. Brethren, our foes are not only of our house, but of our heart. I find an enemy within, which is always near, and I cannot get away from him. I find that my antagonist will get his hand on my throat if he can. No sling and stone will avail here, but we must take the sword. You have to slay your foe, or your foe will slay you. It is with us Christians as it was with the Highlanders in battle, when their leader called out to them, "Lads, there they are! If you dinna kill them they will kill you." There is no room for peace; it is war to the knife, not only now, but to life's end.

The use of the sword is needful for attack. I have reminded you several times already that it will not suffice for the Christian to guard against sin, and ward off temptation from himself; he has to assail the powers of evil. In our case, the best method of defence is an attack.

Do not merely say, "I will keep Satan out of my family by bringing up my children aright," but go to the Sunday School, and teach other children, and so carry the war over the border. God forbid that we should ever go to war as a nation! But if we were at war with some nation on the Continent, I should certainly say, "Let the Continentals have the battles on their own ground: we do not want a campaign over here." It is wise to keep the war in the enemy's own regions. If we had fought the devil more in the world, he might never have been able to invade the church so terribly as he has done. Attack with the sword, for it is your calling, and thus you will best defend yourself.

The Regulation Weapon.

Whatever others may say, it is sufficient for us that this is the regulation sword. A soldier is not left to choose his own equipment; he must carry such arms as his sovereign appoints. This is the regulation sword in Christ's army. The sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, is what you are bidden to take; and if you in wilfulness resolve to exchange it for another, you commit an act of rebellion, and you make the change at your own risk and peril. One might have thought, from what we have seen of late, that orders had come from headquarters that the soldiers were to lay down the sword of the Spirit, the Word of God, and take to lighter weapons. Entertainments, amusements, farces, and sing-song are now used to do what the Gospel has failed to achieve! Is it not sadly so? Well, if any will try these silly toys, I can only say that they have no command from their Lord to warrant them in their proceedings. Take all these things, and see what they will do; but you make the trial at your own risk, and on your own heads the result of failure will fall.

How to Use It.

We are not to bury the Word under other matters; but we are to take it as a sword: which means, as I understand it, first, believe it. Believe every portion of it; believe it with a true and real faith, not with a mere credal faith, which says, "This is the orthodox thing." Oh, for a closer study of the Word of God! Are there not some of you who never even heard or read all that the Lord has said? Are there not passages of the Bible which have never been read by you? It is a melancholy fact that there should be even a line of the sacred Scriptures which has never once come under your eye. Do read the Bible right through, from beginning to end. Begin tomorrow: nay, begin to-day, and go steadily through the whole of the sacred books, with prayer and meditation. Never let it be suspected by you that God has recorded truths in his Word which you have never even once read. Take the sword with the grip of sincere faith; hold it fast by a fuller knowledge, and then exercise yourself daily in its use.

Where to Begin.

The sword is to be taken for earnest fight. You will not be long before occasion arises in such a world as this. You will have to parry with it, to pierce with it, to cut with it, and to kill with it. "Where shall I begin?" says one. Begin at home, and, for many a day, you will have your hands full. When you have slain all the rebels at home, and long before that, you may take a turn at those around you in the world, and in the professing church. Inside your own heart you will find a band of bandits which should be exterminated. There will always be need to keep the sword going within your own territory. End this civil war before you go into foreign parts. When the war within the city of Mansoul has been victoriously carried through, besiege the heart of your friend, your child, your neighbor.

I have done when I have asked you to remember that the text is in the present tense: Take unto you the sword of the Spirit even now. What varieties of people there are here this morning! Believers have come hither in all sorts of perils; let them each one take the sword of the Spirit, and they will overcome every foe. Here, too, are seekers who wish to be Christians; but they cannot compass it. What is the matter this morning? "Oh," says one, "I have been in the habit of sinning, and the habit is very strong upon me." Fight sinful habits with the Word of God, as the sword of the Spirit: so only will you conquer your evil self. "Alas! Satan tempts me horribly," cries one; "I have been lately assailed in many ways." Have you? You are not the first. Our divine Lord in the wilderness was tempted of the devil. He might have fought Satan with a thousand weapons; but he choose to defeat him with this one only. He said, "It is written; it is written; it is written." He pricked the foeman so sorely with this sharp point, that the arch-adversary thought to try the same sword; and he also began to say, "It is written." But he cut himself with this sword, for he did not quote the passages correctly, nor give the whole of them; and the Master soon found the way to wound him still more. Follow your Lord's example.

"Oh, but," says one, "I am so low in spirits." Very well; fight despondency and despair with the sword of the Spirit. I cannot tell what your particular difficulty may be at this moment; but I give you this direction for all holy warfare—"Take the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God." You must overcome every enemy; and this weapon is all you need. God grant you aid, for Christ's sake! Amen.

PROF. CHARLES A. BRIGGS, D.D.

PROBABLY no name is so frequently on the lips of ministers and members of the Presbyterian Church at the present time as that of Dr. Briggs. Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, therefore, will be glad to have the portrait of the famous professor which is given in this column. Dr. Briggs has long been known as a writer on theological topics and his learning and ability are universally acknowledged even by his opponents. The cause of the unpleasant prominence now attaching to him arises from an address which he delivered at his recent inauguration as Professor of Biblical Theology in the Union Theological Seminary, New York. He had previously occupied the chair of Hebrew and cognate languages in the same institution. When the address was published many ministers declared that the doctrines therein enunciated on the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, and the middle state, were opposed to those of the Confession of Faith. Dr. Briggs, however, contends that the address contained nothing contrary to the Confession, as he understands it. The Presbytery of New York to which Dr. Briggs belongs appointed a committee to consider the question and, as published in this journal last week, has, on the recommendation of the committee, decided to place him on trial for heresy.

Charles Augustus Briggs is fifty years of age, having been born in 1841, in New York City. He studied in the University of Virginia from 1857 to 1860, in the Union Theological Seminary from 1861 to 1863, and in the University of Berlin from 1866 to 1869. On his return he became Pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Roselle, N. J., where he labored until 1874. He then became Professor of Hebrew in Union Theological Seminary from which he has now been transferred to the chair of Bible Theology. Among his best known works are Biblical Study, Messianic Prophecy, and Whither.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

One Hour from Suicide.*

CECIL stood leaning against one of the pillars of the Casino at Monte Carlo, with his back to the moonlight and with his eyes blinking painfully at the flaming lamps above the green tables inside. He knew they would be put out very soon; and as he had something to do then, he regarded them fixedly with painful earnestness, as a man who is condemned to die at sunrise watches through his barred windows for the first gray light of the morning. It occurred to him that before the fatal deed was done he ought to destroy the letters he had in his pocket, for then strangers could claim the right to read them. He took them out, and among reminders of debts unpaid, and threats of creditors there was a letter from his father which he had received several days ago, but had not read. He opened it now, though he thought he knew what it would contain. He expected remonstrance, upbraiding, perhaps renunciation, but it was not that. His father's letter was

A Letter to a Prodigal.

"I came to take this step through young Hargreaves, the new curate," his father wrote, "though he was but the instrument in the hands of Providence. He showed me the error of my conduct towards you, and proved to me that my duty and the inclination of my heart were towards the same end. He read this morning for the second lesson the story of the Prodigal Son, and I heard it without recognition and with no present application until he came to the verse which tells how the father came to his son when he was yet a great way off. He saw him, it says, 'when he was yet a great way off' and ran to meet him. He did not wait for the boy to knock at his gate and beg to be let in, but went out to meet him, and took him in his arms and led him back to his home. Now, my boy, my son, it seems to me as if you had never been so far off from me as you are at this present time, as if you had never been so greatly separated from me in every thought and interest; we are even worse than strangers, for you think that my hand is against you, that I have closed the door of your home to you and driven you away. But what I have done I beg of you to forgive; to forget what I may have said in the past, and only to think of what I say now. Your brothers are good boys and have been good sons to me, and God knows I am thankful for such sons, and thankful to them for bearing themselves as they have done. But my boy, my first-born, they can never be to me what you have been. I can never feel for them as I feel for you; they are the ninety and nine who have never wandered away upon the mountains, and who have never been tempted, and have never left their home for good or evil. But you, Cecil, though you have made my heart ache until I thought and even hoped it would stop beating, and though you have given me many, many nights that I could not sleep, are still dearer to me than anything else in the world.—You are the flesh of my flesh and the bone of my bone and I cannot bear living on without you. I can have only a few more years here now; but my boy, while I am here, come to me and make me happy for the rest of my life."

The Prodigal's Decision.

"Ah!" he said, with a quick gasp of doubt, "if I could. O, God," he cried, but so gently that one at his elbow could not have heard him. "if I could, if I could!" He tossed up his hands and drew them down again and clenched them in front of him, and raised his tired, hot eyes to the calm purple sky with its millions of moving stars. "Help me!" he whispered, "help me," and as he raised his head the queer numb feeling seemed to go, and a calm came over his nerves and left him in peace. He did not know what it might be, nor did he dare to question the change which had come to him, but turned and mounted the hill, with the awe and fear still upon him of one who had passed beyond himself for one brief moment into another world. When he reached his room he found his servant stealthily bending with an anxious face over a letter which he tore up guiltily as his master entered. "You were writing to my father," he said gently, "were you not? Well you need not finish your letter; we are going home."

"I am going away from this place, Walters," he said as he pulled off his coat and threw himself heavily on the bed. "I will take the first train that leaves here, and I will sleep a little while you put up my things. The first train you understand—within an hour if it leaves that soon." His head sank back on the pillows heavily as though he had come in from a long, weary walk, and his eyes closed and his arms fell easily at his side. The servant stood frightened, and yet happy, with the tears running down his cheeks, for he loved his master dearly. "We are going home" muttered the young man drowsily, "For he came to me when I was yet a great way off—while I was yet a great way off, he ran to meet me—" His voice sank until it died away into silence, and a few hours later when Walters came to wake him, he found his master sleeping like a child.

WOMAN'S STATUS IN CHINA.

The deplorable condition of women, especially poor women in China is vividly described in a letter to Spirit of Missions by Mrs. Frederick R. Graves, who is laboring with her husband at Wuchang. She says: "In China a woman is commonly described as 'the mean inhabitant of the inner apartment.' She does not eat with her husband, except when he is too poor to admit of ceremony. If guests are invited, she does not appear. Only when she becomes the mother of sons does she receive some respect. For they are a greatly desired gift, since only sons can worship the spirits of parents when departed, and burn paper money and all sorts of useful articles, in paper, for their use in the spirit land. Infanticide, as you know, is still a thing of the present in China.

"Until a woman reaches forty, and not then, if of higher class, it is not respectable for her to walk on the streets. As sedan chairs are expensive, a great mass of women, too poor to hire them, lead lives monotonous and secluded in the extreme."

A BEDOUIN FAMILY.

Some Characteristics of the Dwellers in the Arabian Deserts.

On the first page of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is depicted a Bedouin family group, taken from a photograph obtained by Dr. Talmage during his recent tour in Palestine. This group was photographed at Bethany, doubtless as the members were journeying through that part of the Holy Land. Their faces show very pronounced types of the descendants of Ishmael, as they are found in the deserts at the present day.

As nomads, the Bedouins can hardly be said to have more than a family history or series of genealogies. Shepherds, robbers or beggars, they have always preserved their racial peculiarities. They are found scattered over an immense territory, from Western Persia to the great Arabian Desert, and from Kurdistan to the Soudan. This pastoral, yet warlike people, have become wanderers, from the nature of their country, whose extensive steppes afford scanty grazing ground for the cattle of a great many separate tribes, and necessitate constant change. Neither is the soil suited to cultivation, save in occasional places, and these are tilled by vassals, as the Bedouins hold the farmers and the dwellers of villages in contempt, preferring to live in tents as their fathers did. These tents are arranged in an irregular circle, the inner space serving as a cattle pen at night.

Physically they are among the finest of the races, with splendid figures, brown-skinned, spare and wiry, and capable of enduring great fatigue. Morally, it must be admitted that the Bedouins are far from being models of good conduct. They believe in and practice polygamy, varying the custom by an occasional interchange of wives. They rarely marry out of the tribe. Among the few virtues that mark the desert-dweller as the best product of the Arab race, are a generous hospitality, a noble respect for old age and a rigid adherence to truth.

The group in our illustration (a Bedouin husband with his two wives and two children), belong to the great class of Arab mendicants to be found almost everywhere in the Holy Land. The torn and ragged costumes contrast strongly with the contented expression on the faces. Barefooted, poorly fed, but strong, these wanderers are happy if, after the day closes, they have enough food to prepare the evening meal and a tent to shelter them from the heavy night dews. Much good work has been done among the Bedouins in late years by devoted Christian missionaries in different parts of the East.

A NEW FIND OF MUMMIES.

(See Illustration.)

ANOTHER remarkable discovery of ancient mummies has been made in Egypt. In previous articles in this journal, a description has been given of the finding of the bodies of the ancient Pharaohs, with photographs of the Pharaoh of the Oppression, and the Pharaoh of the Exodus. They were found near Thebes, in Upper Egypt, and excavations have been continued in that locality. They have been rewarded by discoveries almost as valuable as those of the royal mummies.

While digging in the vicinity of the ruins of an ancient temple near Dar-el-Bahari, a vertical shaft was uncovered. Descending the shaft a gallery was found from which two flights of stairs led to two spacious chambers which were over eighty feet below the surface of the ground. Against the walls of the chambers were piles of sarcophagi, or ancient coffins, numbering one hundred and sixty three, ranged in regular order and with the evident care which the Egyptians of old time displayed in the preservation of the bodies of the dead. The inscriptions on the outer cases were still legible and were easily deciphered by the savants in charge of the excavations. It appeared from these inscriptions that the bodies within the sarcophagi were the priests of Ammon, and had been embalmed during the sway of the twenty-first dynasty, which according to our chronology was nearly 3,000 years ago. If this is correct, the men whose bodies were thus brought to light must have been contemporaries of King Solomon.

The most important discovery, however, was of a number of papyrus rolls which were found beside the mummies. It is probable that the rolls contain records of priceless historical interest. In the age of the world which is indicated by the inscriptions on the sarcophagi the priests were the recognized chroniclers of contemporary history. There is, therefore, good reason to hope that from these records, facts may be learned, which will supply information to fill the gaps now existing in Egyptian history and throw new light on the Bible. Mons. Grebaut is at the head of the expedition which has made the discovery. He has been patiently excavating in the district for upward of ten years and his labors have now been amply rewarded. The illustration represents the fellows, or Egyptian laborers, dragging the mummies to the surface from the chambers where they have laid hidden for thirty centuries. They will be sent to the museum at Bulak near Cairo where the bodies of the Pharaohs now are.

THE CAPTAIN'S BARGAIN.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

BY JULIA McNAIR WRIGHT.

[Published by special arrangement with The National Temperance Society.]

THE Peace of Ryswick put an end to war between England and France. Nine times has happy Utrecht seen the peace of Europe concluded within her walls, albeit often for too brief a space. The Peace of Amiens held out for a year false hopes of calm to the great Powers. The first Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle settled the question of the possession of the Netherlands; the second Peace signed in that Rhenish city seated Maria Theresa on an imperial throne. The "Holy Alliance" of Emperors at Vienna dictated terms to astonished France, suddenly bereaved of her Bonapartes. By the Peace of Westphalia Sweden reached the dignity of a State of the Empire. Side by side with these famous treaties we chronicle that of Lal's Mountain, where of Mistress Eliza Allen laid down the terms. Having formulated these conditions which were likely to secure her future domestic peace the good woman picked up her sewing and sat down by the window, mildly triumphant. The belligerents, Captain 'Zekiel and Pink, each laid hold of that disputed territory, Robbie, and left the kitchen. They went around the corner of the living-rooms, and below the mill, among the uninclosed underpinnings. Here, standing among the debris of many years, rusty tin, broken pottery, rotting chips, and mouldy shoes, they could look out on the great tireless wheel, slowly revolving, its moss-green buckets ever coming up dripping from the mountain stream, the slant western sunshine making rainbows of the falling drops.

Beyond the glistening wet wheel was the wooded further bank where birds built in the thick trees and pink crane's-bill and snowy bath-flowers leaned forth from the bracken and arum.

Captain Allen reached up along the dank, cobwebby rafters and took out a large clear-glass bottle. His strong arm described two or three great circles high above his head; then a crash mingled with the monotonous jar of the wheel and the rush of the waters, and certain large pieces of broken glass lay among the stones in the bed of the stream. The Captain said nothing, but his uplifted hand fell gently upon Robbie's curly head and lay there in the fashion of making a covenant. It was Pink's sweet, shrill voice that rose in speech—"Pink is a pitty gell! Pink don't have no tantums! No!"

But though all was thus satisfactorily concluded at the mill, the neighborhood took up the matter, and the neighborhood was a unit against Captain 'Zekiel and for Mistress 'Liza. "What did Captain Allen mean bringing home stray children in that style for his poor wife to worry over? Just like the whole Allen race, always too generous to be just. And they so poor!—loaded with mortgages of which they could scarcely pay the interest. And no house to live in, only two rooms under the mill. And poor Eliza so overworked, and at her wit's end to keep things decent. It was fair robbery of the children they had already, and——" The matrons held up their hands and raised their eyes in unspeakable reprobation of the Captain's reckless conduct.

in their difficulties, financial and domestic, just as he advised and instructed them concerning compound addition, geographic boundaries, or up-strokes and down-strokes in penmanship when they sat on the blue benches of the old school-house.

The schoolmaster boarded with Deacon Britt, the magnate of the district, and Captain Allen had no sharper censors than Deacon and Mrs. Britt. Therefore it was borne in on the mind of the schoolmaster that he should pay a visit to the mill. It might be some sort a pastoral visit. There was no church within seven or eight miles. The pastors of several denominations came up in turn, one Sabbath afternoon in a month, and held service in the school-house. When there was a fifth Sabbath in the month, the schoolmaster had a service. His was always a temperance meeting, and Captain Allen had been wont to feel and to say that the "schoolmaster was a good man, but going a leetle farther than was required of him."

The schoolmaster found Mrs. 'Liza busy. She had ripped up a pair of the Captain's out-worn trousers, and the four pieces were laid out before her on the long kitchen-table, while she stood regarding them like the Fate Atropos, with suspended shears. The schoolmaster was not a man of circumlocutions, and he presently introduced his theme.

"I hear the Captain has picked up another little boy. That must be very inconvenient for you, Mrs. Allen,—two besides your own."

"It appears to fit in very well just now," said 'Liza, with a dry laugh, regarding her work, as a general the plan of a battle-field.

"Any time, Mrs. Allen, when you find this too much for you, I'll speak to the guardians about the child," continued the schoolmaster.

"Well! I guess me and Captain Allen will be hard up," cried Mrs. 'Liza, valiantly, "when we can't do for a child we've seen fit to adopt. And we are not such heathens as to send a dear little innocent fellow to that hideous county alms-house. We will do better than that for him, if we are poor."

"I'm the last one to wish a child in the county-house," said the school-master. "I only spoke with a feeling for you. In such a matter more is to be regarded than money. The re-

The mentor and chief authority of the sparsely settled school district where stood Captain Allen's hereditary saw-mill was the schoolmaster. A grave, elderly, gentle, studious man, full of sympathy and empty of ambitions, he was content to live year after year among these simple folk, and now that more than two decades of his sway had gone by, he advised and instructed these mature married people sponsibility of a child is a great one, Mrs. Allen. The child is immortal, any work for the child runs far out, yes, through eternity. It is a work not only of feeding and clothing the body, but of nurturing the heart, the mind, the soul."

"I've precious little time to think in all those directions," said Mrs. Liza. "There isn't much I can do for the boy, but I can and will mother him."

Just then the child in question came in with Pink; he and she were leading between them the faltering steps of the eighteen-months-old Bop. The three went straight to Eliza, and leaned against her apron, as if she belonged equally to all of them. Tears came into the eyes of the master at this spectacle. He said, with a quiet tone:

"If you mother him, Mrs. Allen, you do the very best thing that can be done for him. Scripture, itself, cannot go beyond that, for it is written, 'As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you.'"

Perhaps it was owing to the report of the schoolmaster that the neighborhood ceased its criticisms and accepted "Wobbie" as part and parcel of the Allen household. And the child made good his place there. The Captain loved him as we love that which has cost us much. None but Captain Zekiel knew what his glass of liquor had cost him. None knew how he craved his life-long indulgence, and fought fiercely with appetite for the child's sake. None but the Captain knew how strong that appetite had become. It was like cutting off a right hand, or plucking out a right eye to deny it.

Mrs. Liza loved the boy as the pledge of her greatest victory, and the assurance of her family peace. She had been sorely troubled lest Captain Allen should ruin himself and disgrace his children by falling into drunkenness. Now her horizon cleared, the great cloud of her married life passed away under Robbie's sunny smile.

And then, there was Pink. The child was of a timid, lonely disposition and delicate health. Unwilling to play out of doors or alone, she had clung to the house and her mother, forever in the way, cross and unhealthy from lack of out-of-door air and proper sport. But Robbie was the very king of sports. From morning until night he was ready to frolic, and he rejoiced in the "greenwood tree" like another Robin Hood. All that he had ever seen of life or play he rehearsed daily, but always in genial, innocent fashion. His "let's play" became a formula for Pink's ills. He embraced the baby in the games, and all the baby's vandalisms. If the baby carried off playthings, and broke up toys, the scream of Pink's rage was arrested by "Let's play." "Let's play he was a wobbler," "Let's play he was a big dog," "Let's play he was the bobby takin' off ze sings for went." He taught Pink how to make houses of sticks and stones, and to furnish them with acorns, broken china and leaves and flowers. Bread, under the magic wand of his imagination become cake and pie; and water was milk, tea, coffee, soup. Out of doors, running, laughing, enjoying from morning to evening, getting healthful appetite and healthful fatigue, Pink grew plump, rosy, pleasant. Mrs. Eliza said she "never had known so much peace since she was married."

Above the Captain's living-rooms was a work-shop, where, when other work was slack, the Captain and "the Hands" made beehives, washing-benches, common doors, and did other such crude carpentry as was needed by the immediate neighbors. If the weather was bad, the shop became the playground of the children, where, under Robbie's leadership, they made boats, dolls, stores, out of chips and shavings.

On a rainy day in May they were thus in the shop, and at last the baby had fallen asleep on a pile of shavings, and Pink was building particularly high towers all by herself. Robbie climbed to the corner of the work-bench, and watched Jerry grooving a beehive for Deacon Britt.

"Jerry," said Robbie, "was you made with one leg and one eye?"

"Oh, no," said Jerry, "I had two legs and two eyes. But I lost 'em. I lost a leg, and I lost an eye."

"Do you think, Jerry, that I'll lose a leg and an eye?"

"Oh, I hope not," said Jerry, "for you've got as handsome a pair of eyes, and as handsome a pair of legs as anyone could wish to see. And then, you're not so unfortun'ate as I am. No one is ever so unfortun'ate. I was born unfortun'ate. In the first place, my father and mother died when I was a baby, and I had only my poor old granny to take care of me. When I was about your size I began selling papers, I kept on with that for two or three years, till one day, standing with my papers, as you may say, under my arm, looking at some men unloading a wagon of whiskey barrels, one of the men, having too much whiskey in him, let a barrel slip, and it rolled on my leg. They took me to the hospital, and my leg had to be cut off."

"Oh, dear!" sighed Robbie, deeply interested.

"When I was cured, and had a wooden leg, I went out with my papers again. Well, one night I went into a cobbler-shop, as I was in the cellar, we living in the attic; and the cobbler, he was took with what they call 'tremblings,' and began to sling things around rather permiskis, thinking there was rats on the floor. One of the things he slung was an awl, and it hit my eye—and that was gone—and they took me to the hospital again. They did something to the cobbler—give him six months or so—but that didn't put my eye back, did it, now?"

Robbie shook his curly head in grave negation.

"When I came out that time, the doctors give me two dollars, and I bought a kit and set up for a shoe-black. We lived in a alley off Water Street, Philadelphia. But after, along of the wet and cold of an awful bad winter, my granny died, and nobody was left to keep me a fire or a bit of hot victuals, why, I got the newmomy on my lungs, and I was took to the hospital; that was the third time. A mighty nice place is the hospital; it's warm, it's quiet, it's clean. You gets well-treated, good bed, good grub, clean clothes. Oh, I liked the hospital first-class, and I couldn't bear to leave it. Along of my bein' so unfortun'ate, they let me stop a good while. But I couldn't stop forever. Other folks wanted to come in, and I had to turn out. One of the doctors give me fifty cents, and the matron did me up an extry shirt and socks in a bundle, and—there I was, outside the gate. They told me to go to my friends. But you can't go to your friends when you haven't any friends you can go to, can you, now?"

Robbie shook his head to show that, in his opinion, decidedly you could not.

"Well, I hung round the hospital corner. It was in October. It began to get evenin', an' cold an' foggy, an' I bein' weak, an' only little past 'leven," added Jerry, apologetically, "I sat on the curbstone an' I cried my hardest. Just then, long came Cap'n Allen. He stopped to ask what was up, an' when he seen me so very unfortun'ate—one eye, one leg, thin, and all that—he said, come along with him an' he'd see me all right. I'll allow," added Jerry, "from the way the Cap'n talked—for he had been havin' a glass or two—I made sure he owned half Pennsylvania; an' that I was goin' to be dressed in welwet, an' eat off silver dishes, an' be a Cresses all my days. But after all, what's the odds? I think I like it better as it is. It suits my one eye, and my wooden leg, and my raising. Besides, what more can a man want than enough to eat, a good bed, a good fire, clean clothes, and plenty to do? Ain't that enough for a man?"

Robbie was an admirable listener; he merely nodded to show that these were his views entirely.

"But when Cap'n Zekiel brought me home," cried Jerry, warming to his tale, "then there was a time. They hadn't no children then, and I'll allow that when a woman gets offered to her, for her first child, a boy 'leven year old past, with a peaked face yaller with sickness, and only one eye, and a wooden leg, nat'rally that woman wouldn't be expected to take kindly to it. The ma'am, she was mad. She says to Cap'n 'Zekiel, 'That boy's goin' down to Philidelphy in the next barge as ever goes down the river, and that is Deacon Britt's,' says she, 'an' it goes this day week.' When you come here, you know, and a little breeze was raised similar, I knowed how to feel for you. And when I see how much gumption you showed, keeping well out of sight behind the stove, an' lettin' the ma'am handle you as she liked, an' keepin' Pink pleased, I 'lowed you was the right sort."

THE CAPTAIN'S BARGAIN.

Robbie showed all his teeth in joy of this encomium.

"Well, you see, I didn't lay out to go back to the sidewalks of Philidelphy. I had a week to get on the good side of the ma'am. When I had been let stay in the hospital, after I was pretty well, I had gone round where I liked, and a good bit in the kitchen. So I knew how to do a thing or two. Next day I asked the ma'am to let me shine the knives, an' black the stove, seein' I'd learned how to handle shoe-brushes. She let me. Then I 'lowed I could wash the dishes. Next thing I 'lowed I could do was mop the floor and clean the windows. Then, one day, when I heard the ma'am tell the Cap'n she couldn't get into this shop, he kep' such a plaguery litter, I came up here an' cleaned it all up, an' shoof the tools, an' went an' asked her come see how nice it looked. I knowed she couldn't abide the noise of my leg, so one day I says to her that there was soine good in a wooden leg. Boys with two own legs can be mighty softly if they like, and sneak into the closet, an' listen behind doors, 'but wherever I am, you're bound to hear me,' says I; and the ma'am she 'lowed there was some sense in that.

"The day that barge of Deacon Britt's was to go down stream, I rose up early, an' told the ma'am that as there'd been a big frost, if she'd let me go up the mounting, I could bring her a lot of nuts, an' I 'lowed as she might like to have a pile of chestnuts and hickorys for winter. She told me to go, an' yov may make up your mind I didn't get back till dark night, when I made sure that blessed barge was well down past Lacy. Then I came in with a bag of nuts, an' 'lowed I could get twice as many more, if she'd let me go again. I've never heard any more talk about sendin' me down to Philidelphy. For the first two years and a half I did a grist of housework, and minding Pink when she come, but I'll 'low I never was a master-hand with children. For a year and a half now, I've been the only man the Cap'n's had, an' me an' the Cap'n gets along remarkable—yes, remarkable. Because, you see, I don't mind work, an' if you're goin' to work, you might just as well work hard. You've got to do something in this world, haven't you? Well, then, I say, why not as well work as anything?"

From the vigorous way in which Robbie nodded his head, those seemed to be his ideas exactly.

So this was the history of the Captain's other Bargain. Neither had that been a bad bargain, Mrs. 'Liza being witness. Jerry did a deal more work than most boys of fifteen who have the full compliment of legs and eyes. He had a certain knack of handling a saw, a hammer, a plane; and if a neighbor came to have a bit of work done, while Captain 'Zekiel was up on the mountain looking at such stray lots of standing timber as might be offered him, Jerry was capable of doing whatever was to be done. If "the ma'am" wanted a nail driven, or a stool made, or soft-soap boiled, Jerry was on hand prompt to execute the commission. He had been to school winters until he could read and write after a fashion, but Jerry said he "didn't take to learning; a man couldn't do everything in this world, could he?"

It was in May that Mistress Eliza made a proclamation to her household. She said she had had enough of nicknames. Pink, for her red, infantile countenance, had been called Pink, until no one knew her name was Elizabeth. Bop had been adopted as short for "baby," which was a euphemism for Ezekiel. This new Bargain of the Captain's should not have a nickname. No Robbie for him. He looked a princely child, with a right to have a full name—Robert; and nothing but Robert was henceforth to be the style of The Captain's Bargain.

PERFECT THROUGH SUFFERING.

God never would send you the darkness.

If He felt you could bear the light;
But you would not cling to His guiding hand
If the way were always bright;
And you would not care to walk by faith,
Could you always walk by sight.

'Tis true He has many an anguish
For your sorrowful heart to bear,
And many a cruel thorn-crown
For your tired head to wear:
He knows how few would reach heaven at all
If pain did not guide them there.

So He sends you the blinding darkness,
And the furnace of seven-fold heat;
'Tis the only way, believe me,
To keep you close to His feet,—
For 'tis always so easy to wander
When our lives are glad and sweet.

Then nestle your hand in your Father's
And sing, if you can, as you go;
Your song may cheer some one behind you
Whose courage is sinking low;
And, well, if your lips do quiver—
God will love you better so.

J. E. JEWETT, Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for ten cents or 100 for twenty cents. Postage stamps taken.

It is remarkable how Hood's Sarsaparilla freshens and invigorates the tired body. It creates an appetite, purifies the blood, and really does "make the weak strong."

THE IRISH LAD AND THE SCEPTIC.

An infidel, entering a railway station, heard an Irish boy, who was sitting on the doorstep, singing,

"There'll be no more sorrow there,
There'll be no more sorrow there."

"Where?" inquired the sceptic, whose mind was impressed by the words.
"Where is it there'll be no more sorrow?" The boy answered,

"In heaven above,
Where all is love,
There'll be no more sorrow there."

The infidel hastened to take his seat in the train; but the simple words of that hymn or chorus had found a lodgment in his mind. He could not drive them from his thoughts. They were fixed. A world where there is no sorrow! This was the great idea that filled his mind. He dwelt upon it—revolved it over in his thoughts. It was the message by the Spirit that led him to the Saviour, who delivers the lost and ruined from sin here, and raises them to that world of glory where sin and sorrow are unknown.

FAITH IN IDOLS SHAKEN.

Mr. Bailey, a missionary of Quaboe, West Africa, writes: "The great Juju idol house, which had been allowed to go to wreck, was being repaired, many of the people speaking out freely against the Gospel and its preacher. As soon as I saw the rebuilding commenced, I called upon the three chiefs who are entrusted with the keeping of the Juju and his house. Two of them denied any knowledge of the rebuilding. I had not to visit the third chief, for as soon as he heard I had come to town for the Juju house palaver, he came to see me, and acknowledged that it was he who had ordered the house to be rebuilt. At the same time he wished me to understand that he did not now believe in the Juju, neither did he offer sacrifice to him. 'Why then are you having the house built?' 'Because of the many palavers and difficulties the people of Impanek are making with me, and even some of the people of our own town. They tell me I am making the Juju very angry with all the people; and that if he makes plenty of people sick they will make palaver with me; and if he sends too much rain or too much sunshine, whatever he does to punish the people, they will make palaver with me. These are the reasons why I have ordered the house to be built.' After I had spoken to him of the foolishness of believing that the Juju possessed any such power, I asked him whether he was going to hear God's voice or the voice of the people of Impanek. I showed him that he would not be able to excuse himself when he stands before the great judgment seat of God by saying, 'It was because of the people of Impanek;' that God would say, 'Why did you build that house after you knew it was wrong to do it?' It did not matter what the people of Impanek said at all, but only what God said. I left him, evidently much impressed by what he heard; he promised to discontinue the building, and has faithfully kept his promise, and has also attended our Christian church every Sabbath since."

DR. TALMAGE'S DECORATION-DAY SERMON.

"I will say to the North, Give up, and to the South, Keep not back." Isaiah 43 : 6.

JUST what my text meant by the North and South, I cannot say, but in the United States the two words are so point blank in their meaning that no one can doubt.

They mean more than East and West, for although between those two have been rivalries and disturbing ambitions and infelicities and Silver Bills and World's Fair controversies, there have been between them no batteries unlimbered, no entrenchments dug, no long lines of sepulchral mounds thrown up. It has never been Massachusetts Fourteenth regiment against Wisconsin Zouaves; it has never been Virginia Artillery against Mississippi Rifles. East and West are distinct words and sometimes may mean diversity of interest, but there is no blood on them. They can be pronounced without any intonation of wailing and death-groan. But the North and the South are words that have been surcharged with tragedies. They are words which suggest that for forty years the clouds had been gathering for a four years' tempest which thirty years ago burst in a fury that shook this planet as it has never been shaken since it swung out at the first world-building. I thank God that the words have lost some of the intensity which they possessed three decades ago; that a vast multitude of Northern people have moved South and a vast multitude of Southern people have moved North and there have been intermarriages by the ten thousand and Northern Colonels have married the daughters of Southern Captains, and Texas rangers have united for life with the daughters of New York abolitionists and their children are half Northern and half Southern and altogether patriotic. But North and South are words that need to be brought into still closer harmonization. I thought that now when we are half way between Presidential elections and sectional animosities are at the lowest ebb and now just after a Presidential journey when our Chief Magistrate, who was chiefly elected by the North, has been cordially received at the South, and now just after two Memorial days, one of them a month ago strewing flowers on Southern graves and the other yesterday strewing flowers on Northern graves, it might be appropriate and useful for me to preach a sermon which would twist two garlands, one for the Northern dead and the other for the Southern dead, and have the two interlocked in a chain of flowers that shall bind forever the two sections into one; and who knows but that this may be the day when the prophecy of the text, made in regard to the ancients may be fulfilled in regard to this country and the North give up its prejudices and the South keep not back its confidence. "I will say to the North, Give up, and to the South, Keep not back."

But before I put these garlands on the graves, I mean to put them this morning a little while on the brows of the living men and women of the North and South who lost husbands, sons and brothers during the civil strife. Nothing is more soothing to a wound than a cool bandage, and these two garlands are cool from the night dew. What a morning that was on the banks of the Hudson and the Savannah when the son was to start for the war! What fatherly and motherly counsel! What tears! What heart-breaks! What charges to write home often! What little keepsakes put away in the knapsack or the bundle that was to be exchanged for the knapsack! The crowd around the depot or the steamboat landing shouted, but father and mother and sister cried. And how lonely the house seemed after they went home and what an awfully vacant chair there was at the Christmas and Thanksgiving tables! And after the battle, what waiting for news! What suspense till the long lists of the killed and wounded were made out! All along the Penobscot and the Connecticut and the St. Lawrence and the Ohio and the Oregon and the James and the Albemarle and the Alabama and the Mississippi and the Sacramento there were lamentation and mourning and great woe, Rachel weeping for her children and refusing to be comforted because they were not. The world has forgotten it, but father and mother have not forgotten it. They may be now in the eighties or the nineties, but it is a fresh wound and will always remain a fresh wound. Coming down the steep of years the hands that would have steadied those tottering steps have been twenty-eight years folded into the last sleep. The childlessness, the widowhood, the orphanage, who has a measuring-line long enough to tell the height of it, the depth of it, the infinity of it? What a mountain, what an Alps, what a Himalayah of piled-up agony of bereavement in the simple statement that three hundred thousand men of the North were slain and five hundred thousand men of the South were slain, and hundreds of thousands long afterwards through the exhaustions there suffered, going down to death!

I detain from the top of the tomb these two garlands that I am twisting for a little while that I may with them soothe the brow of the living. Over the fallen the people said: "Poor fellow! What a pity that he should have been struck down!" We did not, however, often enough say: "Poor father! Poor mother! Poor wife! Poor child!" and so I say it now. Have you realized that by that wholesale massacre hundreds of thousands of young people at the North and the South have never had any chance? We who are fathers stand between our children and the world. We fight their battles, we plan for their welfare, we achieve their livelihood, we give them the advice of our superior years. Among the richest blessings of my life I thank God that my father lived to fight my battles until I was old enough to fight for myself. Have you realized the fact that our civil war pitched out upon the farm-fields of the North and the plantations of the South a multitude that no man can number, children without fatherly help and protection? Under all the advantages which we had of fatherly guidance, what a struggle life has been to the most of us! But what of the children, two and five and ten years of age, who stood at their mother's lap with great, round, wondering eyes, hearing her read of those who perished in the battle of the Wilderness, their father gone down amid the dead host? Come, young men and women who by such disaster have had to make your own way in life, and I will put the garland on your young and unwrinkled brow. Yes; you have had your own Malvern Hill and your own South Mountain and your own Gettysburg all along these twenty years. Come! And, if I cannot spare a whole garland for your brow, I will twist in your locks at least two flowers, one crimson and one white, the crimson for the struggle of your life which has almost amounted to carnage, and the white for the victory you have gained.

Before I put the two garlands I am twisting upon the Northern and Southern tombs, I detain the garlands a little while that I may put them upon the brow of the living soldiers and sailors of the North and South, who though in variance for a long while, are now at peace and in hearty loyalty to the United States government and ready if need be to march shoulder to shoulder against any foreign foe. The twenty-six winters that have passed since the war, I think, have sufficiently cooled the hatreds that once burned Northward and Southward to allow the remark that they who fought in that conflict were honest on both sides. The chaplains of both armies were honest in their prayers. The faces that went into battle, whether they marched toward the Gulf of Mexico or marched toward the North star, were honest faces. It is too much to ask either side to believe that those who came out from their homes, forsaking father and mother and wife and child, many of them never to return, were not in earnest when they put their life into awful exigency. Witness the last scene at family prayers up among the Green Mountains or down by the fields of cotton and sugar cane. Men do not sacrifice their all for fun. Men do not eat mouldy bread or go without bread at all for fun. Men do not sleep unsheltered in equinoctial storms for fun. There were some no doubt on both sides who enlisted for soldiers' pay or expecting opportunity for violence and pillage or burning with revenge, and thirst for human blood, but such cases were so rare many of you who were in the war four years never confronted such an instance of depravity.

As chaplain of a Pennsylvania regiment and as a representative of the United States Christian Commission, I was for a while at the front and in those hospitals at Hagerstown and Williamsburg and up and down the Potomac, where all the churches and farm-houses were filled with wounded and dying Federals and Confederates, I forgot amid the horrors to ask on which side they fought, when with what little aid I could take them for their suffering bodies and the mightier aid I could pray for their souls, I passed the days and months amid scenes that in my memory seem like a ghastly dream rather than possible reality. When a New Orleans boy, unable to answer my question as to where he was hurt, took out from the folds of the only garment that had not been torn off him in the battle a New Testament marked with his own life-blood and I saw the leaf turned down at the passage "My peace I give unto you, not as the world giveth give I unto you," it read just as though it had been a Northern New Testament. And when I sat down and took from a South Carolinian dying in a barn at Boonesville his last message to his wife and mother and child, it sounded just like a message that a Northern man dying far from home would send to his wife and mother and child. And when I picked up from the battlefield of Antietam the fragment of a letter which I have somewhere yet, for the name and the address were torn off, I saw it was the words of a wife to her husband telling him how the little child prayed for their father every night that he might not get hurt in the battle and might come home sound and, come home well, but that if anything happened to them they might all meet again in the world where there are no partings, it read just as a Northern wife would write to a husband away from home and in peril conveying the messages of little children. Oh, yes; they were honest on both sides. And those who lived to get home and are living yet were just as honest, and ought they not for the suffering they endured have a coronal of some kind?

THE START FOR THE WAR.

Yea, there was courage on both sides. They who were at the front know that. When the war opened, the South called the Northern men "mudsills" and the North called the Southern men "braggarts" and "pompous nothings," but after a few battles nothing more was said about Northern "mudsills" and Southern "braggarts." It was an army of lions against an army of lions. It was a flock of eagles mid-sky with iron beak against another flock of eagles iron-beaked. It was thunderbolt against thunderbolt. It was archangel of wrath against archangel of wrath. It was Hancock against Longstreet. It was Kilpatrick against Wade Hampton. It was Slocum against Hill. It was O. O. Howard against Hood. It was Sherman against Stonewall Jackson. It was Grant against Lee. And the men who were under them were just as gallant, and some of them are here and I detain the two garlands that I have twisted for the departed and in recognition of honesty and prowess put the coronals upon these living Federals and Confederates. North and South, we will make a great fuss about them when they are dead. There will not be room on their tombstones to tell how we appreciate them. We will have long obituary in newspapers telling in what battles they fought, what sacrifices they endured, what flags they captured, in what prisons they suffered, but all that will come too late. One word in the living ear of praise for their honesty and courage will be worth to them more than a military funeral two miles long or a pile of flowers half a mile high and ten bands of music playing over the grave "Star Spangled Banner" or "Way Down South in Dixie." Now, while they are in their declining years and their right knee refuses to work because of the rheumatism they got sleeping on the wet ground on the banks of the Chickamauga, or their digestive organs are off on furlough because of the six months of prison life in which their rations were big slices of nothing, and their ears have never been alert since the cannonade in which they heard so much they have been able to hear but little since, in these cases I call upon the people of North and South to substitute a little ante-mortem praise for the good deal of post-mortem eulogium. These two garlands that I twisted for Northern and Southern graves shall not be put upon the grass of the tomb until they have first encircled the foreheads of the living. I will let the front of the wreath come down over the scar of a scalp wound made by the sword of a cavalryman at Atlanta and droop a little over the eye that lost its lustre in the mine explosion at Petersburg. Huzza for the living! Calla lilies and camelias and amaranths and palm branches for the living!

But we must not detain the two garlands any longer from the pillows of those who for a quarter of a century have been prostrate in dreamless slumber, never oppressed by summer heats or chilled by winter's cold. Both garlands are fragrant. Both have in them the sunshine and the shower of this springtime. The colors of both were mixed by him who mixed the blue of the sky and the gold of the sunset and the green of the grass and the whiteness of the snow crystal. And I do not care which you put over the Northern grave and which over the Southern grave. Does any one say: "What is the use? None of them will know it; your Decoration-days both sides Mason and Dixon's line are a great waste of flowers." Ah! I see you have carried too far my idea that praise for the living is better than praise for the departed. Who says that the dead do not know of the flowers? I think they do. The dead are not dead. The body sleeps but the soul lives and is unhindered. No two cities on earth are in such rapid and constant communication as earth and heaven, and the two great Decoration Days of North and South are better known in realms celestial than terrestrial. With what interest we visit the place of our birth and of our boyhood or girlhood days! And have the departed no interest in this world where they were born and ransomed and where they suffered and triumphed? My Bible does not positively say so, nor does my catechism teach it, but my common sense declares it. The departed do know, and the bannered procession that marched the earth yesterday to Northern graves and the bannered procession that marched a month ago to Southern graves, were accompanied by two grander though invisible processions that walked the air, processions of the ascended, processions of the martyred, processions of the sainted; and they heard the anthems of the churches and the salvo of the batteries and they stooped down to breathe the incense of the flowers. These august throngs gathered this morning in these pews and aisles and corridors and galleries, are insignificant compared with the mightier throngs of heaven who mingle in this service which we render to God and our country while we twist the two garlands. Hail spirits multitudinous! Hail spirits blest! Hail martyred ones come down from the King's palaces! How glad we are that you have come back again. Take this kiss of welcome and these garlands of reminiscence, ye who languished in hospitals or went down under the thunders and the lightnings of Fredericksburg and Cold Harbor and Murfreesboro and Corinth and Yorktown and above the clouds on Lookout Mountain.

Among the thousands of gatherings at the North and at the South for Decoration Days, I am conscious that this service is unique and that it is the only one in which there has been twisted two garlands, one for the grave of the Northern dead and the other for the grave of the Southern dead. O, Lord God of the American Union, is it not time that we bury forever our old grudges? My! My! Can we not be at peace on earth when this moment in heaven dwell, in perfect love, Ulysses S. Grant and Robert E. Lee, William T. Sherman and Stonewall Jackson, and tens of thousands of Northern and Southern men who, though they once looked askance at each other from the opposite banks of the Potomac and the Chickahominy and the James and the Tennessee, now are on the same side of the River, keeping jubilee with some of those old angels who near nineteen centuries ago came down one Christmas night to chant over Bethlehem: "Glory to God in the highest; on earth peace, good will to men!"

I have been waiting for some years for some one else to twist the two garlands that I to-day twist, but, no one doing it, in the love of God and my country I put now my hand to the work and next spring if I am living and well, I will twist two more garlands for Northern and Southern graves, and every springtime until some man or woman whom I may have cheered a little in the struggle of this life, shall come out and put a pansy or two on my own grave. But if the time should ever come when this land shall be given over to sectional rancor and demagogism, and North and South, or East and West shall forget what the good God built this nation for, and it shall halt on its high career of righteousness and liberty and peace, and become the agent of tyranny and wrong and oppression, then let some young man whom I have baptized in infancy at these altars go out to Greenwood and scoop up my dust and scatter it to the four winds of heaven, for I do not want to sleep in a land accursed with sectionalism or oppression.

FLOWERS FOR THE HEROES.

And now I hand over the two garlands, both of which are wet with many tears, tears of widowhood and orphanage and childlessness, tears of suffering and tears of gratitude, and as the ceremony must be performed in symbol, there not being enough flowers to cover all the graves, take the one garland to the tomb of some Northern soldier who may yesterday have been omitted in the distribution of the sacrament of flowers, and the other garland to the tomb of some Southern soldier, who may, a month ago, have been omitted in the distribution of the sacrament of the flowers, and put both the wreaths gently down over the hearts that have ceased to beat. God bless the two garlands! God save the United States of America!

RECLAIMED THROUGH A HYMN.

A FEW nights ago a seafaring man rose in the Berachah Mission in West Thirty-second Street, New York, and asked permission to say a few words. No one, he said, had more reason than he to bless God, that he had put it into the hearts of Mr. and Mrs. Naylor to build that place and support it. About two years ago he was in New York for a few days while his ship was preparing for sea. He had not a cent in his pocket, for he had got drunk on the first day ashore, had treated the crowd and then gone to sleep. When he awoke he was on the sidewalk where he had been carried by men, who, before they left him, went through his pockets and took everything. Miserable in mind and body, as he wandered about aimlessly, he passed the Berachah Mission. They were singing inside a tune that seemed familiar. He waited and listened. It was a hymn he had heard his pious mother sing when he was a child. He went inside and sat down and wept like a child. God saved his soul that night and since then he had been home and had been welcomed like the Prodigal Son. From that day God had kept him, had cleansed his mouth of oaths and had taken away his desire for drink.

THE CHURCH OF THE STRANGERS.

Rev. Charles F. Deems and his Pastorate—An Interesting History of Christian Work in New York.

PROBABLY no church in the metropolis is better known throughout the length and breadth of the United States than the Church of the Strangers, in Mercer Street, New York, a picture of which is given on the first page of this issue, together with a portrait of the pastor, Rev. Charles F. Deems, LL.D. He was born in Baltimore, Md., in 1820, his father being a Methodist clergyman. Converted while still a mere boy, he chose the ministerial profession, and at fifteen years of age was sent to Dickinson College, Pa., where he graduated in 1836. Two years later, the young student, now twenty-one, was appointed Professor of Logic and Rhetoric in the University of North Carolina, which position he occupied for five years, afterwards becoming Professor of Natural Science in Randolph Macon College, Va. In 1860 Dr. Deems visited Europe for six months, and on his return organized a school in Wilson County, N. C. During the five years previous to 1865, he was Presiding Elder of the Wilmington and Newbern District in that State.

Full of the desire to work for the Lord in a broader field, he came to New York, and with the assistance of friends, hired a small chapel temporarily, where he began to preach. His first sermon on July 22nd, 1866, was preached to an audience of fifteen persons; but so marked were his ability and earnestness, that he soon became widely known. His audiences were composed of many persons of different denominations, and from this fact, the name of "The Strangers' Home" was adopted. Declining many tempting offers from colleges and other quarters, he stuck to his work on the lines he had laid out, and soon found himself with a large flock, but still without a regular church organization.

In January, 1868, thirty-two persons enrolled themselves under his ministry, and then was organized the "Church of the Strangers." Every year augmented the membership of the new church, and almost every Protestant denomination was represented on its rolls. Still, there were many difficulties; but as the work expanded, the courageous and devoted pastor found encouragement in his efforts. In 1869, the old "Commodore," Cornelius Vanderbilt, (whose portrait appears on the first page) who had attended the services frequently, purchased the Mercer Street Presbyterian Church and generously presented it to Dr. Deems for the use of the congregation. This munificent gift came at a time when it was doubly valuable, and at once put the Church on a substantial footing. Dr. Deems' acquaintance with Commodore Vanderbilt had begun in 1866, when he was living and preaching in Mobile, Ala. A Southern lady, who afterward became the wife of the Commodore, attended these services, and it was largely through her influence that Mr. Vanderbilt, several years later, was moved to interest himself personally in the organization of the new church in New York.

In his book, entitled A Romance of Providence, Dr. Deems tells how the Commodore catechized him carefully about his preaching, past history and expectations for the future. Fifty thousand dollars were needed at that moment for the purchase of the Mercer Street property, and towards this appalling sum, the clergyman had just eighty cents! The old Commodore extracted this confession from him. The pastor had resolved never to appeal for the money, believing that if God wanted him to stay in New York and do the work to which his heart inclined, the money would come. Looking him straight in the eye, Mr. Vanderbilt said:

"I will give you the church."

"Commodore Vanderbilt, you don't know me," said the clergyman; "there is not any man in America rich enough to have me for a chaplain."

The railroad king, who was accustomed to be solicited for money, was astonished to find one man who could refuse $50,000.

"Me have a chaplain!" he cried, "the Lord knows I have got as little use for a chaplain as any one man you ever saw. I want to give you this church and give it to you only. Now, will you take it?"

"Commodore," replied Dr. Deems, extending his hand, "if you give me that church for the Lord Jesus Christ, I will most thankfully accept it," and on that basis the gift was received.

The great trust thus imposed has been faithfully kept. The opening services of the Church of the Strangers occupied several days and many eminent divines took part, including Rev. Drs. Moran, from North Carolina, Munsey of Baltimore, Bacon of New Haven, Marshall, DeWitt, Prentiss, Booth, Schaff, Armitage, Prime, Mingins and others. Since that time, the Church has become an Evangelical land-mark in New York. In all departments of Christian work it has thriven, and the ministry of Dr. Deems, under God's blessing, has been the means of bringing many souls to Christ. Its Sunday School has steadily grown and now has hundreds of scholars. A pleasing feature is the Chinese Sunday School, which was organized in 1883, and where many young Chinamen, resident in New York, have been taught the principles of Christianity. Missionaries in far-off China have borne testimony to the good effects of Dr. Deems' tuition of these scholars, several of whom, on returning to their native land, have become useful as missionary helpers.

In Church work, every opportunity is utilized. The "Mothers' Meetings" never lag; the Missionary Societies are active and vigorous, the Gospel Mission (organized in 1885 and which provides for both sexes), is located in Bleeker Street where, night after night, services are held at which the waifs and strays of the great city listen to the story of Christ. Dr. Deems was one of the first among city pastors to emphasize the glaring discrepancy between the amount, per capita, given annually by church members to missionary work and the sum expended by the city on liquor every year. For the latter purpose, New York wastes annually sixty millions of dollars, while for Domestic and Foreign Missions, the total given throughout the whole United States, is only about five millions. The Church of the Strangers, true to its principles, not only gave liberally to the general mission field, but voluntarily undertook work in special fields at home and abroad, which it has ever since carried forward successfully.

In addition to his regular pastoral duties, Dr. Deems has found time for considerable literary work. The Home Altar, What Now? Weights and Wings, and many other volumes of a religious character from his pen, have been helpful to thousands of readers in leading them to the new life.

Although now in his seventy-second year, Dr. Deems is still hale and vigorous; he relaxes no effort in his ministry, and it is his greatest ambition to die in harness and not permit himself to fossilize as age advances. He has endeavored, during his whole career, to follow the leading of Providence, and his history shows that his trust in the Divine Master has been abundantly justified.

Rich and poor meet on equal terms in the Church of the Strangers and many touching instances are told of the experiences resulting from such meetings. One young woman—an orphan in utter destitution—wandered in, one cold November Sunday evening, and listened to the preacher's wondrous story of the Divine One, friendless and homeless, who suffered from cold and hunger. When the congregation dispersed, she went out again into the cold, but with renewed courage and better resolves; for when she strayed into the edifice, she had been on the verge of self-destruction. She afterward met a Christian woman who helped her to employment and to her she confided a wish to make a thank-offering in the church where she had heard that wonderful sermon that had saved her from herself. Strange to say, however, she was unable to find it, and could tell neither the name of the preacher nor the location of the building. Her new friend asked her to come and see her own pastor and, as they entered the Church, something familiar in the appearance of a glass door struck the girl. Seeing the preacher, she recognized him at once and after listening a few moments to his preaching, turned to her companion and said, while tears rolled down her cheeks:

"It is he, it is he!"

She was in the Church of the Strangers and listening to Dr. Deems, whose simple eloquence on that cold winter night, had led her to find the Saviour and true happiness.

THE GOSPEL IN A PIRATES' VILLAGE.

PASTOR Rodriguez, who is evangelizing in Spain, sends an account of his recent visit to Cadaques, a Spanish village washed by the Mediterranean, and overhung by the Pyrenees, which was once the resort of daring pirates and smugglers. Thus isolated, the inhabitants have for centuries lived in the darkness of superstition. The pastor resolved if possible to hold three meetings, so that all who were willing should have an opportunity of hearing the "good news" of a free salvation. On arriving, the first thing was to obtain permission from the Mayor to hold the meetings in a cafe. This was granted, and the town-crier duly announced the time and place. To his surprise and joy, the cafe would not nearly hold the numbers who wished to attend, so the ball-room was hired for the other two meetings, and was well filled. At the close, a young man asked for a number of tracts and copies of Miss Marsh's well-known prayer, which runs thus, "O God, wash me from all my sins in the blood of Jesus, and I shall be whiter than snow. Fill me with thy Holy Spirit, for Christ's sake." Wondering what he would do with them, he followed the young man down the street, and presently saw that he was joined by a shoemaker, who carried in one hand a large pot of paste and a brush ready for action in the other. As they walked along, his companion put tracts under the doors of the houses of the people who had not attended the meetings, whilst his friend pasted the large type prayer on street corners. One was placed outside a butcher's shop, and the mistress on seeing it said, "Read it to me, for I do not know how." On hearing the words, she exclaimed, "Que palabras mas preciosas!" (What beautiful words!) "No, no," said a bystander, "they are bad words, written by the Protestants." "I find them very good and shall not take them down," was the reply. The bill remained in that conspicuous position and was read by the passers-by.

A BRIGHT WITNESS.

In a letter from Puantun, in North China, Mr. Ament, a missionary of the American Board, relates the following incident of one of the converts, a girl six years old: "She was the eldest of three sisters who, with their mother, had been among the first to announce their purpose to follow the religion which the foreigner preached. No amount of ridicule could shake the resolve of these three girls. The eldest girl, Ling (Bright), took the lead in all good things, never allowing her younger sisters or other girls to interrupt Mrs. Jen in her explanations or interfere in any way with the studying that was going on. In this way she was most useful as well as very happy. Although she was betrothed to a heathen, she and her mother resolved to go on with the studies. Her fellow-villages point this out as remarkable heroism; and when we consider what it means to take such risks here in China, where the life and destiny of the young brides are in the hands of the mother-in-law, we realize that they exhibited no small degree of moral courage."

DIED DURING THE DEBATE.

Ex-Judge Breckinridge Expires in the General Assembly at Detroit.

WHILE the General Assembly now in session at Detroit, Mich., was engaged in the discussion of the case of Prof. Briggs, on Thursday last, ex-Judge Samuel Miller Breckinridge who had only a few moments before concluded an effective address opposing Dr. Briggs' election to the Chair of Biblical Theology, fell dead on the platform. On the conclusion of Rev. Dr. Patton's address in the afternoon, Judge Breckinridge began to speak in support of the veto. His concluding sentences were: "Now, brethren, I feel that I have discharged my duty, and I wish to be excused from further speech. My voice—troubles—I have—I have done my duty."

Then he grasped the table with his right hand and, sinking down, fell suddenly backward, his head striking the platform with terrible force. Physicians were called and the business of the Assembly was suspended. Every effort at resuscitation proved futile; within a few moments after he had fallen, the immense throng was informed that Judge Breckinridge was dead. The Assembly then joined in prayer and soon after adjourned.

Judge Breckinridge was born at Baltimore, November 3rd, 1828, and was educated at Princeton College and Centre College, Ky. In 1840 he settled in St. Louis, and practiced law. He was a prominent figure in politics. In 1871 he became elder of the Second Presbyterian Church of St. Louis, and was a member of the Assemblies of 1874, 1878, 1881, 1882, 1883 successively and also that of the present year. He was recognized as one of the leaders in public opinion in his State, and was a man of distinguished piety. A brave soldier, in the war, he fought on the side of the North. Judge Breckinridge leaves a wife and a large family.

A FAMOUS BOSTON ANNIVERSARY.

LAST Monday, The Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Massachusetts celebrated its two hundred and fifty-third anniversary in Boston, at Faneuil Hall. The programme for the day consisted of the Company meeting at the Armory and marching to the State House, where the Governor and invited guests were received and escorted to the church, where the anniversary sermon was delivered. This sermon has not been omitted once in a century, and was established long before the war of Independence, being interrupted temporarily during the trouble with Great Britain. It has been the custom of The Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company to invite the most eminent divines in the country to deliver the sermon on these occasions, and the records of their anniversaries show many distinguished names. Rev. Dr. Phillips Brooks, Bishop-elect of Massachusetts, was the preacher on a recent occasion. This year the invitation to deliver the anniversary sermon was extended to Rev. Dr. T. De Witt Talmage, the editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

After the sermon, the Company proceeded to Faneuil Hall, where the annual dinner was served, which was followed by the commissioning of the newly-elected officers by the Governor—a ceremony which has taken place on Boston Common from time immemorial. The clergyman who delivers the Anniversary sermon is appointed Chaplain of the Company for the year. As the Field Day of the oldest and most distinguished organization in America, it is one of peculiar interest and the good people of Boston never fail to turn out, en masse, to honor the occasion.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editor, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

flowers, but none a bouquet so large or so fragrant as hers. The dust on her boots and dress indicated that she had gathered the flowers herself on a country excursion. She looked at them admiringly and smelled them at intervals. But after one of her inspections she gave a wild cry, and flung them from her. As they struck the floor a small green snake wriggled out of the bouquet. All the women jumped to their feet in terror, but a man stepped forward and killed the reptile, and the panic was allayed. He picked up the flowers and handed them to the owner, but she shrank from them in horror, and would not touch them. She is not the first person who has turned in disgust from what formerly gave her pleasure. When the sinner has been truly awakened by the Holy Spirit, there is no need to prohibit his going to the theatre or engaging in doubtful amusements. Having realized the danger lurking in them he turns from them with loathing. (Rom. 6: 21.)

A Constable was Made a Prisoner by a Horse-thief in Texas recently. A press dispatch from Hillsboro, states that a warrant was issued by a court in Dallas for the arrest of a man on suspicion of horse stealing. After a long hunt the constable found him. There was no doubt of his identity, but the man was so plausible and professed his innocence so strongly, that the constable was favorably impressed by him. It was, however, his duty to take his man to court, so they set out together. He proved a pleasant companion and as the constable did not handcuff him they pursued their journey, more like friends than officer and prisoner. But suddenly, when they came to a lonely part of the road, the prisoner dealt the constable a heavy blow which stunned him. Before he recovered consciousness, the prisoner took a pair of handcuffs from the constable's pocket and handcuffed him to a barbed wire fence near by. He then robbed him of his pistol, money and watch and went on his way. It was some hours before a party passing by saw the constable's plight and liberated him. There are some men who have had a spiritual experience very much of the same character. The passions and appetites which should have been kept in subjection have been indulged, until, in an evil hour, they have gained the upper hand. Then the man has found himself bound by his love of liquor, or some other evil habit, a helpless prisoner. (1. Cor. 9: 27.)

A Perilous Voyage to Meet a Lover was Undertaken by a girl in Arkansas recently. During her school days the girl, who is an orphan, became acquainted with a young man of good position and education. The friendship continued after the girl left school and went to live with her aunt at Des Arc. The lover proposed marriage, but the girl's aunt had another husband in view for her niece, a relative of her own and she forbade the marriage. Rightly or wrongly the girl believed that her aunt had a pecuniary interest in urging this marriage upon her and she steadfastly refused the suitor favored by her aunt. Neither did she wish to marry the man she loved without her aunt's consent. He went back to his home at Deval's Bluff, therefore, to wait for a more propitious time. He told the girl that he would be ready to marry her whenever she was willing. Her life after that was not a pleasant one and finally after a stormy scene with her aunt in which hard words were used, she left the house. She found a friend of her lover and begged him to take her to him. He at once hired a boat and though it was getting dark and threatening rain, set out on the long voyage. The boatman pulled hard, but the night being dark he frequently struck a snag and more than once it seemed that they would all be drowned. The peril, darkness, and the rain, which came down in torrents before half of the journey was done, failed to disturb the girl, though her companion advised turning back. It took six hours to reach their destination, but they arrived safely. The lover was found and though it was then after midnight he aroused a minister who united them in marriage. The bride in telling the story said she was all the happier for the worries and the dangers she had passed through. If we could receive messages from our Christian friends who have passed beyond the grave they would be of the same tenor. The trials of life and the dark river of death safely passed they are happy in the love of him whose they are. (Rev. 21: 4.)

A Singular Superstition came to Light last week. It was noticed that on a Spanish vessel now lying in New York Harbor, the crew always went aloft at sundown. Inquiries as to the reason for their doing so elicited a quaint story. It was to the effect that many years ago a Spanish man-of-war in the Levant was overtaken by a sudden storm. Orders were given to shorten sail, but the ropes would not work. As a last resort the halyards were cut. It was afterward discovered that the sheaves, through which the ropes for shortening sails were rove, had been so tightly plugged up with sticks and other small obstructions that it was impossible for the ropes to slide through. It was urged that no human agency could have done it, and the deed was laid at the door of the evil one. Shortly after the occurrence a general order was promulgated directing that the crew of every Spanish war vessel be sent aloft to chase the fiends out of the sheave holes every evening at sundown. The practice, it appears, still continues. Every evening when the sunset gun is fired the crew go aloft and ascertain that all the tackle is in working order. As there is still a liability to sudden storms, the precaution is doubtless useful, though Satan was unjustly suspected of the old offence. It would be well if Christians, who really are exposed to his hostility, were similarly on their guard. If the love of money and pleasure and a worldly spirit find lodgment in the soul, it is better that detection should come in a time of calm self-examination, than under the stress of sudden temptation when eternal shipwreck may result. (II. Cor. 2: 11.)

A Modern Robinson Crusoe had a Strange experience recently. A New Jersey journal says that a fisherman of Greenville, went out as usual a few days ago in his boat. Coming in at night his vessel ran on a bank of sand off Oyster Island and capsized and sank. He took refuge upon the island. The tide was high, and there was barely enough of land exposed to afford him shelter. He could see the lights of his home on the shore as dusk deepened into night, and when they were extinguished he threw himself upon the rock of his island prison and tried to sleep. When day broke he tried to signal passing vessels, but they evidently did not see his signs. Finally he drew off his red shirt, and tying it to a fragment of driftwood, renewed his efforts to hail rescuers. Hunger began to gnaw, and with a bit of cord and a pin hook he caught some fishes and satisfied his cravings by eating them alive. Passing mariners meanwhile slighted his signals. They probably suspected that they were prepared for their delusion by mischievous boys. He remained on the island unrescued from Tuesday to Friday evening when a man who was on the bay with his boat, noticed the signal and went to his relief. His position on the island within sight of home was a type of the condition of many men who, living in a Christian land with a Christian training, are near the kingdom of God, but not in it. Many of them might be saved if ministers and Christian workers realized that help was needed. (Mark 12: 34.)

THE BOOK OF THE LAW FOUND.

S. S. LESSON FOR JUNE 14, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
II. CHRON. 34: 14-28. GOLDEN TEXT, PS. 119: 72.

Hezekiah's Godless Son—Punishment and Repentance—A Bad King Deposed—The Pious Boy-King—His Inspired Mentors—The Work of Reformation—The Lost Book Discovered—Taken to the King—His Desire to Obey—Light Sought from a Woman—Huldah's Message.

EZEKIAH was succeeded on the throne of Judah by his son Manasseh, who, coming to the throne at the age of twelve years, the son of Hezekiah's old age probably, fell under the influence of bad men, and became more blasphemous and openly daring in his sin and rebellion against God than even his grandfather Ahaz. Manasseh's wickedness is described as "Worse than the Heathen, whom the Lord had destroyed before the children of Israel." (II. Chron. 33: 9.) "That servant which knew his Lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes." (Luke 12: 47.) Manasseh was born in a godly household, the venerable form of the then aged Isaiah, was probably one of the recollections of his early years. Doubtless he was familiar with the temple worship, and even educated by godly scribes; and when his unregenerate heart inclined him to the practices of idolatry which put no check upon "the desires of the flesh and of the mind" (Eph. 2: 3), and which left his guilty conscience undisturbed, he knew he was doing wrong. For many years God bore with him, and spoke to him and to his people, "but they would not hearken." At last great distress came upon the land, and the king himself was loaded with chains, and carried to Babylon. There he humbled himself greatly before the God of his fathers," who, in his tender love and compassion heard and forgave him: "Then Manasseh knew that the Lord he was God."

The Boy King.

But Amon, his son, again dragged the land into idolatry, until, at the end of two-years' reign, his servant slew him, and made his son Josiah king. Only eight years old when he began to reign, Josiah became converted eight years later, when he was sixteen, and four years later he began a work of reformation. By the side of this boy king, God raised up a boy-prophet in the person of Jeremiah, and a faithful priest in the person of Hilkiah, both of whom must have been a great support to the young reformer. How many faithful ministers following in a church those who have been unspiritual and worldly are ready to have hands which hang down and feeble knees; how many such complain of their lot, and say, "If only I might begin the work, it would be so easy; but to revive a broken down church, to pull down so much in order to build up, demands such patience, and seems so to hinder the progress which an earnest worker desires to make, that I cannot face it." But, dear tired fellow-worker, how could thy education be carried on if thou hadst not these humbling annoyances perpetually? How couldst thou discover the depth of pride in thy heart, if thou hadst not so much to mortify thee? How couldst thou discover thy want of love, except thou hadst continually to do with those who are unworthy and unloveable, or how understand the depth of love in the heart of thy God except thou hadst also the "contradiction of sinners against" thyself to meet with? We need to remember continually that God schools his instruments while he uses them.

The usual work of reformation, which was characteristic of an awakening among the children of Judah went forward; idols were destroyed, the land was purged from their worship, and the temple of the Lord was repaired. But cleansing, needful as it is, the doing away of abuses, although indispensable, is not all which ought to result from a true, a deep, a divine work of grace.

A Great Discovery

was made during the process of cleansing the temple; Hilkiah the priest, found the book of the law in the house of the Lord! What then? Had God's Word become so disused that even its whereabouts was unknown? Where were the "teaching priests" (II. Chron. 15: 3; 17: 7, 9), which, in the days of Asa and Jehoshaphat, "taught in Judah, and had the book of the law of the Lord with them, and went about throughout all the cities of Judah, and taught the people"? It was terribly true that in measure as the Word of God fell into disuse the land fell into idolatry.

And what about so-called Christian countries in this age of boasted light and intelligence? It is the exception, rather than the rule to find those who are gathered together to worship God, with their Bibles in their hand. Then, at family prayer, it is a rare exception to find all the members of a family or institution really following the reader, or reading verse by verse, and taking a hearty and intelligent part in the real study of the Word. Then again, in private Bible study, many, even of converted people, are content to read a single text, or two or three verses in a hurried manner, morning and evening, without taking pains to let God speak to them, or to yield themselves to the Holy Ghost's light; as he opens up in the Word the certain mind and will of God. Is it any wonder that those who make so little use of the chart which God has given us, should miss their way? Is it any wonder that those who take so little pains to discover it should remain "unwise," not "understanding what the will of the Lord is?"

Hilkiah the priest and Shaphan the scribe were not afraid to bring the book of the law to the king Josiah. These three were

Men of One Mind.

How unspeakably precious is it when God gives us fellow-workers who have a single eye, and who, with us, seek only the glory of God! The most difficult things become easy to those who are united thus. The king took to heart the words of the law which he heard; he made no attempt to trim them, explain them away, or reason off the sharp edge of this sword of the Spirit; "he rent his clothes" because his heart within was moved. Then he sent a little band of faithful ones whom he could trust, saying, "Go, inquire of the Lord for me, and for them that are left in Israel and in Judah, concerning the words of the book that is found." To whom shall they go? Who had the clue to the mind of God? Who was there in all Judah that had the thread of prophetic testimony, and who might be trusted to ascertain at this crisis God's direct word for his people? This time it was not Jeremiah, but

A Godly Woman.

Hilkiah the priest and Shaphan the scribe were not ashamed to learn the mind of God through Huldah the prophetess. What a lesson for nineteenth century Christians! A king, a high priest, a divine, at the feet of a God-taught woman! Only intense reality would have so humbled the pride of man! But, on the other hand, only intense reality on the part of this woman would have made her simple enough, and therefore humble enough, to be God's messenger to such august personages. But this was no exceptional work to Huldah, she was not a prophetess just for this occasion; the habitual presence of God in which she lived made every man—king, high priest, or scribe, though he might be—infinately small in comparison.

Huldah's first message was to the king as a man, "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Tell ye the man that sent you:" and it was but a confirmation of all his terrible declaration of judgment. Her second message was to the king as king, "As for the king of Judah, who sent you to inquire of the Lord, so shall ye say unto him, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel concerning the words which thou hast heard; Because thine heart was tender, and thou didst humble thyself before God, when thou hearest his words . . . I have even heard thee also, saith the Lord. Behold I will gather thee to thy fathers, and thou shalt be gathered to thy grave in peace, neither shall thine eyes see all the evil that I will bring upon this place, and upon the inhabitants of the same."

Then the king held a national assembly, consisting of all the elders of Judah and Jerusalem, the priests and Levites and all the people, and then as the true kingly priest of his people, he took upon himself the reading of the Word of God. It was a scene to be remembered—a king reigning for God and by God, a king instructing his people in the way of the Lord. And then as a testimony that all he read was real to him, he "stood in his place, and made a covenant before the Lord to walk after the Lord, and to keep his commandments, and his testimonies, and his statutes, with all his heart, and with all his soul, to perform the words of the covenant which are written in this book." And, having thus set the example, "he caused all that were present in Jerusalem and Benjamin to stand to it." God send us rulers like this in these degenerate days!

MR. MORLEY'S BUSINESS.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for June 14. "The law of thy mouth is better unto me than thousands of gold and silver," Psalm 119: 72.

BUSINESS was over for the day in a large wholesale dry-goods house; the clerks and salesmen had dispersed to their homes, and the step of the night-watchman was the only one heard in the building, which an hour before, echoed with the hurried tread of three hundred busy employees. But a light was still burning in the private office of the proprietor, Mr. John Morley, where he and his manager sat talking.

"You see, Bailey," said Mr. Morley, "I have fixed on you because I can trust you. The doctor tells me I may die any day. I may live for years and I may not live a week. So I must have this thing settled."

"Yes, sir," said Bailey, "I see that. I wish I could induce you to make that other preparation you know of. It is of infinitely more moment to you to—"

"Oh yes, I know what you are going to say. As soon as this business matter is settled I will attend to the spiritual affair; but I cannot give my mind to it while the business question is open."

"I should have reversed the order," said Mr. Bailey, "I could not think of business while the peril of dying, unprepared to meet God, was hanging over me."

"Well, the other is my way, and now if you please we will talk business." It was the employer who spoke now; the note of friendship had dropped out of his voice. "Reginald, of course, is my heir," Mr. Morley continued. "Being my only son he will have everything. But he is only eighteen, and if he were of age, I do not feel sure that it would be wise to put the whole capital in his hands. The simplest way, of course, would be to sell the business after my death, and give him the proceeds. It would be a handsome fortune for a young fellow. It would fetch half a million I should say. But there is no way of investing it that would bring the income it does here. Now my idea is to have you carry on the business and pay him the net profits every year, after he comes of age. The business would be his, but he does not like business, and he would not interfere, and I should think he would have too much sense to sell it. Now, if you say so, I will make my will in that way. Will you promise to work faithfully for him as you have done for me?"

"I will, sir," said Bailey. "It would be a pity to let so good a business go."

"Then that is settled. I know I can depend on your promise. You will have no trouble with Reginald. He is a fine fellow, though disposed to be extravagant. But he will have a splendid income. It is something to be proud of, starting from nothing as I did, and be able to leave the boy such a fortune. I suppose, if you were to die, you could not leave that son of yours a hundred dollars?"

"I have not been a money-making man," said Bailey. "I have lived on the salary you have given me and paid my way, but I could not save. My boy will have to depend on himself. I have brought him up to trust God and fear him. I hope he will get along. I have impressed upon him that money-making is not the chief end of life, and that he must not sacrifice his principles even if he could gain a fortune by doing so."

"Yes, I can imagine your line of talking to him. I am not sure that it is the best way to train a boy who has his own way to make. A very tender conscience is apt to hold a man back from some good things."

"I would prefer to have him miss things that he cannot get without sin."

"Well, you have your own notions. I expect he will be as poor a man as you are."

"Very likely, but I shall be content if he is a better man. Righteousness pays, even in this world."

"Well and good, if you are satisfied. I fancy Reginald is in the better case, with a fortune in hand. That is the best proof of what pays best in this world." Mr. Morley rose with a well satisfied air and put on his hat. "I will have the will made at once," he said.

There was another momentous interview in that same office twenty years afterward. The two men who had talked there twenty years ago were dead and in the places they occupied were two others, conversing just as earnestly. The elder of the two was a well known capitalist and the younger the son of that Mr. Bailey who had accepted the trust for his employer.

"Then it is finally decided to sell, is it Bailey?" asked the capitalist.

"Yes, Mr. Thorne," Bailey replied. "Mr. Morley has no alternative. He has withdrawn all the capital that can be spared and his creditors are pressing him now. He must sell, and he will have very little of the proceeds; his debts will absorb the bulk of it."

"Is it possible! Such a sum in so short a time! How has it gone?"

"I am not sure. The largest part went in Europe. My father believed that he was gambling, and horse-racing, and leading a fast life."

"Ah, it is a very sad end to a brilliant beginning! How strange it seems that the good things of this life should so often fall to men who do not appreciate them. Now if it had so happened that you had been in young Morley's shoes, what a magnificent fortune you would have made out of this business. You would not be selling it to pay your debts. Why don't you try to get it now, Bailey?"

The young man looked up with a smile. "That is far out of my reach, Mr. Thorne. The utmost I hope for is that it may fall into the hands of some one who will retain me at a salary."

"Well, I authorize you to hope for something better. You and I will buy the business and run it as partners."

Mr. Bailey shook his head. "I have no capital at all, nor any hope of getting it."

"No, but you have something better, something that I have more need of in a partner, and that is conscience. I have capital enough. There are plenty of men who would be willing to join me in this thing and put in half the money, but that is not what I want. I should have to look after the business and watch my partner too. Now with you, I can leave the whole thing in your hands with perfect confidence. I know you to be a conscientious man, living in accordance with God's law. A man with a conscience and no capital is better for my purpose than a man with a capital and no conscience. I can trust you and I would rather have you for my partner than a millionaire."

MILLENNARIANISM.

The Ancient Faith of the Church Now Held by Eminent Scholars and Preachers.

BY REV. A. J. GORDON, D.D.*

THE orthodoxy of one age has not infrequently become the heterodoxy of another age. Of nothing is this saying more strikingly true than of the doctrine of our Lord's second personal coming. Justin Martyr, writing in the second century, states the doctrine of the millennial reign of Christ on earth subsequent to the first resurrection, and declares this to be the view of himself and "as many Christians as are right-minded in all things;" in the same paragraph adding that those who deny this doctrine, though "Christians" by name, are in reality atheistical and impious heretics." Whether Justin in this statement reflected the orthodox view of his age we will not affirm, leaving patristic scholars to settle that point. It is enough to remember that so eminent a Church historian as Prof. Harnack of Berlin, in summing up the testimony of the early fathers upon this question, gives this as his candid conclusion: "The claims of Millenarianism are sufficiently met by the acknowledgment that in former times it was associated—to all appearances inseparably associated—with the Gospel itself." And yet such has been the change of opinion, from the second century to the nineteenth century, that in our own day disciples have sometimes been excluded from our churches for holding the very view which Justin Martyr made a test of orthodoxy. Happily we may believe that a more tolerant sentiment towards this doctrine prevails among us at present; but unhappily there is a widespread misapprehension as to the primitive and orthodox standing of the reviving belief.

With only this too brief reference to the primitive historical claims of this doctrine, we refer in a word to

The Verdict of Exegesis.

Prof. Kendrick mentions four names as defenders of Pre-Millennialism, but he could have added those of Bengel and Delitzsch, and Lange and Stier, and Godet and Volck, and Bleek and Gebhardt, and Kleiwoth and Van Oosterzee, and Martensen and Ewald, and Rothe and Luthardt, and Auberlen and Christlieb, and Koch and Gehler, and Weiss and Schultze, and Hofman and Christiani, and Ebrard and Pfeleiderer, and Tregelles and Ellicott, and Faussett and Ryle, and so many others that we have not room to name them. The weight of learned opinion is now so preponderating in favor of this doctrine, that here we may almost apply the word consensus. And not only scholars. The significant and concurrent fact is, that what is the doctrine of scholars has likewise come to be the faith of the practical evangelists of our day—Moody and Varley and Whittle, the four Needhams, and Munhall and Chubbuck, and Pratt and Pentecost, who draw their teachings directly from the Bible, unbiased by the verdict of critical scholarship. These, with a great company of foreign missionaries, who are bold confessors of "the Blessed Hope," constitute the evangelistic wing of this great new reaction in eschatology.

John Bunyan's Millenarianism is well known and generally conceded, he maintaining the early patristic view that the seventh millennium will be the Sabbath of the World to be ushered in by the Advent of Christ. One of Bunyan's contemporaries—Benjamin Keach, an illustrious predecessor of Spurgeon in the pastorate, has left a very full confession of his views on this point. He was brought to trial Oct. 8, 1664, on the two charges of Anabaptism and Millenarianism. As he stood before Lord Chief-Justice Hyde, the representative of State-Church it was charged that he held "that the saints shall reign with Christ a thousand years." The judge pronounced this "an old heresy which was cast out of the Church a thousand years ago, and was likewise condemned by the Council of Constance five hundred years after, and hath lain dead ever since, till now this rascal hath revived it." Nevertheless, the stalwart Baptist preacher firmly defended his view, bringing out clearly the doctrine of the first Resurrection, followed by the Millennium and the reign of the saints, with Christ, and as the result he was condemned and sent to the pillory.

The Martyr Faith.

Dr. John Gill, the commentator and theologian has drawn out the Pre-Millennial scheme more fully and set forth the Scriptural arguments for it more cogently, perhaps, than any Baptist writer who has treated the subject. For a full statement of his views, we must refer the reader to his Body of Divinity and his Commentary on Revelation. Couple his testimony with that of Charles H. Spurgeon, who said, in a recent sermon, that there can be no Millennium without the presence of the visible Christ, "any more than there can be summer without the sun."

Hear Roger Williams' unequivocal utterance on the personal and imminent Advent of our Lord: "It is the council of God," he says, "that Jesus Christ shall shortly appear, a most glorious Judge and Revenger against all his enemies, while the heavens and the earth shall flee before his most glorious presence." But what did Roger Williams believe as to the condition of things on earth at Christ's appearing? Did he hold to that "from time immemorial" Baptist doctrine, the conversion of the world previous to the second Advent? Listen to him again. "The Lord will come when an evil world is ripe in sin, and Anti-Christianism; will come suddenly, and then will he melt the earth with fire and make it new. Till then I wait and hope."

I think we must conclude from these quotations that Millenarianism was the martyr faith of our denomination, even though it may not be the modern faith. The fact is, that this primitive doctrine of the Church has always tended to reappear with a fresh planting of the Gospel, and in a revival of spiritual religion. It is just as true that when the Church has entered upon a career of worldly prosperity, the tendency has been to repudiate this apostolic faith as antiquated, pessimistic, and out of joint with the times.

It is not putting it too strongly to affirm, with a thoughtful theologian, that this hope is made

"The Key-Note of all the Warnings and admonitions and exhortations of the Scripture." Is it made so in the preaching of our modern ministry? On the contrary, has not the doctrine fallen into such neglect that hundreds of Christians have to acknowledge that they have sat for years under an evangelical ministry without ever having heard a sermon on this theme? How many well-instructed, orthodox Christians have confessed their surprise in hearing us speak of the subject, saying that they never knew before that the Second Coming meant anything else but death!

I will ask you to listen for a moment on this point to the most eminent living Baptist preacher, like Daniel, "a man greatly beloved." In his last address to the alumni of his Pastor's College, Rev. C. H. Spurgeon said: "Once more, dear friends, our relation and position to our Lord is that of waiting for his coming. I do not know how far most of you are warmly affected toward the blessed truth of the Second Advent; but I trust that many of you believe it and are enlivened by faith in it. This great hope is gaining ground among lovers of evangelical doctrine. Our Lord may come right soon; certain signs raise our hopes very high. Let us take courage, and be of good heart; for while we lift Christ on high, and glorify his name, he is on the way to take up the quarrel of his covenant, and rout his foes."

HENRY J. VAN DYKE.

WE are all sorry to have him go. But if he must go, we are glad that he went without languishing. Sudden death was to him sudden glory. He was a stout preacher of righteousness. We shall not forget a sermon which we heard him preach in our boyhood, from the text, "Quit you like men! Be strong!" He was a mighty debater on the floor of ecclesiastical courts. He was a genial friend, and a resounding antagonist. It would be affectation in the writer of this editorial to ignore the fact that he was my strongest assailant for many years. All the world knows that we had a controversy. But it was settled one year ago. After a brotherly editorial in this paper in regard to him, he wrote me a letter full of kindness, and said he would welcome me at the gate of heaven when I came in. To that letter I replied, saying I was sure he would arrive in that better country, and that I would be the most disappointed man that ever lived if I did not get there, too, and saying, also, that I was glad to have the difference between us settled in our mortal state, for it would be extremely embarrassing for us to meet in heaven if there were an earthly controversy between us not settled. Now that he is gone, it is a consolation that we were friends again before his departure. He did much hard work for God and the Church, and has entered into rest. Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, they rest from their labors and their works do follow them. We say to all men and women, especially Christian men and women, get your controversies settled during this life. The most of the differences between Christian people are founded on misapprehensions, or come from the fact that we look at things from different standpoints. Explain, mediate, apologize, forgive. Let us have communion of saints in expectation of the life everlasting.

DROWNED IN LETTERS.

WE remember the day when we received our first letter by mail. The postage mark, the superscription, the entire appearance of the missive is fresh in our memory. Then came the time when we wrote letters for the pleasure of getting answers. But the time has come to some of us when the mail-box is a terror. We long since despaired of making response to all communications that came to us. They are piled up on the shelf, on the table, on the hat-rack, on the washstand, on the floor. Many of them have never yet been opened. We mean no disregard or unkindness to our friends or foes; but there are not enough hours in the day nor days in the year to answer our letters and do the work that God seems calling us to do. We enjoy letters of encouragement, and we file them away to read in days of disheartenment. They are like cool water to the thirsty lip on a hot day. But these thousands of begging letters that would swamp the millionaires if affirmatively answered; these questions about the best modes of investing money, about the proper way to conduct Churches, about courses of reading best to pursue, about what seminaries are best for young ladies, about the financial standing of some members of our Church, about the more approved plans of ventilation, about all things in heaven and on earth and lower down, at times throw us into a state of despair. Please to hold up!

VIRTUE IN GOOD TYPE.

EVERY few years there goes through China the ophthalmia, a disease of the eye which leaves thousands of people in partial or total blindness. Small print is doing the same work in this country. There are type-founders blasting the eyesight of the people. There are publishers who pride themselves on the number of words they can get within a square inch, and under the process we are suffering a great national ophthalmia. Better not read at all than kill your eyes with small print. God gives us only two organs of sight, and the penalty of trifling with them is life-long twilight or midnight of vision. There is consequently a great rush upon opticians for spectacles. Girls and boys of fifteen at school must have their eyeglass astride the nose. There is a fearful sarcasm in the action of the man who comes on the railway-train at Albany with spectacles for sale, as much as to say, "with those fine-print books and newspapers you have been slaying your eyes all the way from Buffalo; I come in as an optical undertaker, just to try on you this coffin of spectacles." Young men and maidens, nothing you can hang on the bridge of your nose in the way of eye-glasses can give you such dignity or grace as a clear eye, blue, or black, or hazel, unharmed by dissipation, unextinguished by the type-setters.

Authors and publishers are often chagrined at the blunders of the printing press. A Frenchman, having counted three hundred typographical errors in his favorite book, gave up the ghost, and got out of the world as soon as he could. We wonder that a similar departure was not witnessed when one of our popular magazines was, by mistake of the printer-boy, called "The Epileptic Review." But the worst of all typographical errors is that of small type.

Let publishers not forget the failing sight of the old. As age comes on, father and mother cannot go out as much as they used to, and are more dependent upon reading for entertainment. Put not before their diminished sight typography that blurs and confounds them. In plain print tell them the news of the world out of which they go, and the news of the world which they are about to enter. Let the hymn-book, and the Bible, and the religious newspaper be in distinct letter-press. The poorest compliment ever paid to the Lord's Prayer was the cutting it in small letters on a five-cent piece. It is a hard thing for an octogenarian to "read his title clear" in type smaller than nonpareil or agate. It is a grand thing to have a page so plain that old age can read it with or without spectacles. Mother had two pairs—her "near-sighted" spectacles and her "far-sighted" ones. She wore them both at once—one upon the forehead, and the other on the nose, the distance of the object deciding which pair she would use. But one day she took off the "far-sighted" spectacles with which she had often looked toward heaven, and put on the "near-sighted" ones: it was just as she went into the Gate.

BRIEF NOTES.

The Rev. Francis N. Zabriskie, D.D., the famous scholar and writer on Theology, died at Princeton, N. J., on May 13, at the age of forty-nine.

At the Communion Service of the English Congregational Union at its recent anniversary at the City Temple, London, non-intoxicating wine was used.

At the recent Convention of the Epworth League of the New York East District, it was stated that the League now numbers three thousand members in that district.

Dr. W. S. Rainsford, D.D., Rector of St. George's Church, New York, has made an appeal for a fund of $50,000 to endow the Home for Deaconesses in connection with the Church.

The Rev. Thomas F. Gaylor, Chancellor of the University of the South, at Sewanee, Tenn., has been elected Bishop of Georgia by the Diocesan Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions reports an increase of income for the past month, of $44,000 over the corresponding month of last year. During the eight months of the present financial year the total gain is $68,559.94.

Mr. James Dobson, the Wesleyan Mission Worker who conducts the services at Templar Hall, Liverpool, England, and has successfully labored among the dens of vice in that town, has landed on our shores. He was in need of rest and change of scene after his exhausting labors in Liverpool. He hopes to stay here a few months and gain some knowledge of our methods of Evangelistic work, as well as renewed strength, before his return.

The case of Dr. Briggs was before the General Assembly at Detroit on May 27, when Dr. Patton presented the report of the Committee on Seminaries. The Committee recommended the Assembly to "disapprove of the appointment of Dr. Briggs," and, in view of the fact that there appeared to be a difference of opinion between the Committee and the Directors of the Seminary as to the jurisdiction of the Assembly in the case, that a special Committee be appointed to confer with the Directors and report next year.

Mr. James H. Cannon, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD evangelist, has been remarkably blessed at the Johnson Street M. E. Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. He began a two-weeks' Home Camp Meeting, Sunday, May 24. A number of persons made profession of faith at nearly every meeting held. A large band of Christian Workers from the churches and missions, rendered efficient service. Sunday, June 7th, Mr. Cannon will open a series of Revival Meetings at the Asbury M. E. Church, Washington Square, New York, of which Dr. Stone is pastor.

The appeal made in this journal on May 9th, for funds to place a Sunday School Missionary in the field, has been promptly responded to. Dr. Paxson, the Superintendent of the work of the American Sunday School Union in the Southwest, whose portrait was given in that number, said that $700 was needed for the purpose. The publisher of this journal offered to contribute $200 of the sum, if the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would contribute the balance. This has now been done and Dr. Paxson has been notified that "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Missionary" may now be placed in the field.

Mr. Charles Cook, the modern John Howard, has been holding special services in the prisons of Denmark, Sweden, and Finland, with evident tokens of blessing. He has sent on Testaments to the Siberian prisoners; and is now in Russia, and expects to journey through Poland. Every facility has been afforded him by the authorities. All work is stopped in the prisons while he is there, and services are held in the prison chapels. The King of Sweden gave special directions to the directors to help him, and meetings were held in the Queen's Home for Discharged Prisoners. At one service at Abo, in Finland he addressed 300 men who are under life sentences.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Russia's Hebrew Exodus—Edison's Latest Electrical Wonder—Death of Congressman Houk—Florida's Long Senatorial Fight Ended—The War in Chili—General, Foreign and Domestic Notes.

FRANCE has taken a frightful revenge for the murder of two explorers by the natives of Grand Bassam, a settlement in Upper Guinea, on the African Gold Coast. An expedition was sent to the interior and fought a battle, killing 800 natives and laying waste and subduing the surrounding country. The explorers—Messrs. Papillon and Vaturet—were assassinated on the Upper Lahn River, where they were making researches for the development of trade. They are said to have adopted a mistaken policy in dealing with the natives, who were unused to meeting white men. Instead of being kind and persuasive, the explorers menaced the Bassamese, who thereupon shot them down.

Memorial Day was Observed Throughout the country on the 30th ulto., by veteran and other organizations, with the usual parades and floral tributes to the dead heroes of the Civil War. At all the great cemeteries there were gathered thousands upon thousands to do honor to the day sacred to the valiant dead. In New York, Boston, Washington, Philadelphia and Baltimore the parades were unusually fine and were witnessed by large crowds of spectators.

Menzel, the Coachman of Emperor William, is just now being made much of in Berlin for his courageous act in saving the Kaiser's life. Menzel was driving his royal master in the troika presented to William by the Czar of Russia, last winter, when the horses took fright. The Czar had previously warned William that troika driving was a risky affair, and that the horses, if they bolted, should be allowed to run straight ahead until they were exhausted. This advice might have been very good in the Russian capital whose broad, straight streets gave ample room for a runaway; but in Potsdam, where the streets are narrow and tortuous, it was quite different. So Menzel did the best thing under the circumstances and drove his runaway team right into a tree. The unlucky troika was ruined, the horses were badly injured, and the Emperor was shaken up but nowise hurt.

A Glass of Arsenic Solution, Mistaken for Ice water caused the death of Congressman Leonidas C. Houk, of Tennessee, at Knoxville, on May 25th. Mr. Houk, feeling heated, entered a drug-store and asked the clerk for ice water. The latter laid down the glass with the innocent beverage beside one containing poison and the Congressman grasped the wrong glass, swallowed its contents and expired in a few hours.

Henry Loeffenhoeffer, the clerk, though held blameless, is almost insane over his terrible error. Mr. Houk was born in Sevier County, Tenn., in 1836, of poor parents. He had but little schooling and learned the trade of cabinet-making, studying law at night. When twenty-three, he had mastered enough of the principles of jurisprudence to pass an examination for the bar. When the war broke out, he enlisted and was quickly promoted to be Lieutenant and afterward Colonel of the Third Tennessee. Illness compelled his abandonment of the military career and he resumed the practice of law. He was a member of the Convention which nominated Grant for President in 1868, was elected to the Forty-sixth Congress from the Second Tennessee District, and re-elected seven times in succession. In Congress he was recognized as the leader of the Southern Republican delegation. Mr. Houk (whose portrait is given above), was a felicitous speaker and ready debater, especially on war issues.

Russia is Now Beginning to Experience the recoil of her brutal policy towards the Hebrews. She aimed to drive away not the rich Jews, but the poor and middle-class traders, and their compatriots, including all the great Hebrew bankers of Moscow and St. Petersburg, have espoused their cause and are leaving Russian territory, after withdrawing all their moneys and calling in their investments and loans. This is exactly what the Czar's government did not anticipate, and it is now vainly trying to prevent an exodus such as probably has never been known in modern times. Indeed, when the great Jewish bankers abandon Russia, it will be impossible to avert the ruin of many thousands of native merchants. Gen. Ignatieff, Governor of Kieff, is credited with being the chief agent in the persecution, and thousands are quietly submitting to expulsion, rather than undergo imprisonment and deprivation of property. Berlin is full of the refugees, who are receiving all possible kindness from their fellow-Hebrews there; other thousands are flocking to London.

One of the Subjects under Discussion by the Presbyterian Assembly at Detroit, last week, was the report of the Committee on Sabbath Observance, which was presented by Colonel Elliott F. Shepard, of New York. The report declares against the tendency toward the violation of the Sabbath as evidenced in the opening of art galleries and reading-rooms. The Committee recommended the closing of the World's Fair gates on Sundays. Meanwhile the progress of the Fair buildings, at Chicago, is exceedingly rapid. In the illustration the front of the proposed Machinery Hall is shown, this structure being intended as one of the largest on the grounds. The design has been approved and the work is to be pushed. It will be a veritable palace of the mechanical arts.

Paris has been Indulging in the Luxury of a strike in which the people sided with the strikers, although it was to their manifest inconvenience to do so. The stage-drivers, being dissatisfied with their wages and general treatment, quit work and when the omnibus companies, with the assistance of the police, attempted to run the stages, rioting followed. Finally, as the outlook became serious, the government felt justified in sending troops to take the places of the new drivers, and soldiers ran the stages for a time. About one hundred and thirty strikers were arrested. The drivers secured a reduction of hours and the reinstatement of employees who had been discharged.

An American Railroad King of Two Decades ago died in London last week. This was James McHenry, who was chief promoter of the Atlantic & Great Western, and other railroads, and the leading spirit in several large syndicates, which furnished the capital to develop American railroad facilities. At different times in his career, Mr. McHenry had financial struggles with Gould, Drew, Vanderbilt and others. His more recent ventures were undertaken with the backing of such powerful European capitalists as the Bischoffscheims and other famous bankers of London and Paris. He was an intimate friend of more than one European monarch, and was deeply involved in a movement to restore Queen Isabella to the throne of Spain and, later, in a similar effort to reinstate Napoleon III, both of these monarchs having been useful to him in his enterprises.

Florida's long Senatorial Fight Ended on May

26th by the re-election of Wilkinson Call, defeating Mr. Mays, the rival candidate, after a protracted deadlock during which ninety ballots were taken without result. After it had been demonstrated to Call's opponents that the struggle would be a protracted one, a number of them disappeared and thus prevented the caucus from taking action. They were then ferreted out by a sergeant-at-arms and brought to the bar of the Senate Chamber to answer for contempt. Even when compelled to take their places in the joint ballot they still refused to answer to their names; but a sufficient number of votes was finally secured to decide the election. Mr. Call, whose portrait is given in this column, was born in Logan County, Ky., and removed to Florida when quite a young man. He was elected to the Senate by the Republicans in 1879 and re-elected in 1885. Soon after the war he was elected Senator, but owing to some informality, was not allowed to take his seat.

Fighting Continues in Chili Without Cessation and the country is being drained of blood and treasure to supply material for the fratricidal warfare. Thousand of Chilians have fled to the Argentine Republic for safety, their homes being ruined and their personal liberty menaced by President Balmaceda's troops, who are unceasing in the persecution of all who favor the Congress party. The jails are full of young men, sons of the best families in Santiago and Valparaiso. Meanwhile the revolutionists have not been discouraged by recent reverses and seem determined to keep up the war, which is expected soon to culminate in a decisive action at Santiago. There have been no further developments in the matter of the insurgent steamer Itata, but it is believed she will be peaceably surrendered to our government, to permit the case to be tried under the rules of international law.

Thomas Edison, the Electrical Inventor, has once more justified his right to be called the "Wizard of Menlo Park," by a most remarkable invention which he calls the Kinetograph. By this instrument which combines the phonograph with an electrical photographing machine that takes continuous photographs at the rate of forty-six per second, he claims to be able to reproduce not only the words of an orator or the music of a singer, but movements of the body and every phase of expression on the features. The music and the action of an entire choir, vocal, or instrumental, can thus be reproduced. The photographs are taken on a long gelatine roll, which is unwound rapidly and passed before the magnifying glass or thrown on a screen on which the figures appear in all the natural attitudes, and with even the smallest movements of the facial muscles, reproduced in perfection. Several successful experiments have already been made with the new invention; the box used being like that shown in the illustration. A, represents the funnel; B, the phonograph; C, the kinetograph, and D, the electric battery.

SHADOW AND SUBSTANCE.

A NEW SERMON, PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

A Divine Declaration—I. The Shadow Swept Away—The Meaning of the Offerings Forgotten—Removed Wholesale—Were Declared Unnecessary—Not to be Followed by Similar Types—II. The Revelation of the Substance—The Body Prepared—Occupied by a Pre-Existent Ego—III. The Declaration of Christ—In a Time of Failure—IV. Distinctly Foretold—V. A Delightful Mission.

"Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire; mine ears hast thou opened: burnt offering and sin offering hast thou not required. Then said I, Lo, I come: in the volume of the book it is written of me, I delight to do thy will, O my God: yea, thy law is within my heart." Ps. 40: 6-8.

WE have, in the use made of the passage by the inspired apostle, (Heb. 10: 5-7) authority for applying the quotation from the fortieth psalm to our divine Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. We rejoice that the Lord Jesus himself here speaks of himself. Who but he can declare his own generation? Here he is both the subject of the words and the speaker also. The word is from himself and of himself, and so we have double reason for devout attention. He tells us what he said long ago. He declares, "Then I said, Lo, I come."

I. Without further preface, I call upon you to notice, first,

The Sweeping Away of the Shadow.

"Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire . . . burnt offering and sin offering hast thou not required." When the Son of God is born into the world, there is an end of all types by which he was formerly prefigured. The symbols end when the truth itself is made fully manifest. The sacrifices of the law had their times and place, their teaching and their influence. Spiritual men could have found in the rites and ceremonies of the old law a very library of Gospel literature; but, alas! the people were carnal, sensual, and unbelieving, and therefore they often forgot even to celebrate the appointed sacrifices: the Passover itself ceased for long periods, and when the festivals were maintained, there was no reality in them.

After they had been chastened for their neglect, and made to wander in exile because of the wandering of their hearts after their idols, they were restored from captivity, and were led to keep the ceremonial law; but they did it as a heartless, meaningless formality, and thus missed all spiritual benefit: with in their hand they blindly groped about in the dark. They slew the sacrifices, and presented their peace-offerings; but the soul had gone out of the service, and at last their God grew weary of their formal worship, and said, "Bring no more vain oblations; incense is an abomination unto me." When once the life is gone out of the best symbolism, the Lord abhors the carcase; and even a divinely ordained ritual becomes a species of idolatry. Toward the time of our Lord's coming, the outward worship of Judaism became more and more dead: it was time that it was buried. It had decayed and waxed old, and was ready to vanish away, and vanish away it did; for our Lord set aside the first, or old, that he might establish the second, or new. The stars were no longer seen with their twinklings, for the sun had arisen.

The removal of these things was wholesale. Nothing of the old ritual or ceremonial law was spared. A clean sweep has been made of all the ancient rites, from circumcision up to the garment with its fringe of blue. These were for the childhood of the Church, the pictures of her first school-books; but we are no longer minors, and we have grace given us to read with open eyes that everlasting classic of "the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." Now is the brightness of the former dispensation eclipsed by the glory which excelleth.

And more, these sacrifices passed away with the mark upon them that they were not what God required. "Burnt offering and sin offering hast thou not required."

What did God Require

of man? Obedience. He proclaimed by Samuel, "To obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams." He saith in another place, "He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, But to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" The requirement of the law was love to God and love to men. This has always been God's great requirement. Absolute conformity to the standard of moral and spiritual rectitude which he has set up is his demand, and he can be content with nothing less. These things are not found in sacrifice and offering, neither do they always go therewith, and therefore the outward sacrifice was not what God required.

They were so to be put away as never to be followed by the same kind of things. Shadows are not replaced by other shadows. The ceremonials of Aaron are not to be followed by another set of carnal ordinances. There are some who seem to think that they are so to be. Instead of rites which God has ordained we have rites of man's invention.

The Blessed Ordinances

of our Lord Jesus Christ, such as baptism and the Lord's Supper, have been prostituted from their instructive and memorial intent into a kind of witchcraft. These are instructive to you if you have a mind to be instructed, and if you know the truths which they set forth; but do not imagine that men have come under another kind of ceremonialism, another system of ritual and rubric, for it is not so. The rites appropriate to priests are abolished with the Aaronic priesthood, and can never be restored: "He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second." When he cometh into the world these carnal ordinances must go out of the world. Sacrifice and offering, burnt offering, sin offering, and all other patterns of heavenly things, are swept away when the heavenly things themselves appear.

II. Thus much upon the shadows being swept away; and now, secondly, let us view

The Revelation of the Substance.

We find the Son of God himself appearing. We read here, and we hear him say—"Mine ears hast thou opened." The Lord himself comes, even he who is all that these things foreshadowed. When he comes he has a prepared ear. The passage to the heart seems to be sealed in the case of fallen man. But when the Saviour came, his ear was not as ours, but was attentive to the divine voice. He knew what the will of the Lord was, and he could say, "I do always the thing that pleases him." As man, he had a divine instinct of holiness, which made him to know and love the Father's will, and caused him to translate that will into his own life.

But our Lord came also with a prepared body: hence the apostle Paul, when he quoted this passage, probably taking the words from the Septuagint translation, writes, "A body hast thou prepared me." You will wonder how, in one passage, it should speak of the ear, and the next should speak of the body; and yet there is small difference in the sense. The whole body of Christ was prepared for him and for his great work. It was a body made highly vital and sensitive, probably far beyond what ours are; for sin has a blunting and hardening effect even upon the flesh, and his flesh, though it was in the "likeness of sinful flesh," was not sinful flesh, but flesh which yielded prompt obedience to his spirit, even as his whole human nature was obedient unto death, even the death of the Cross. His body was capable of great endurance, so as to know the griefs and agonies and unspeakable sorrows of a delicate, holy, and tender kind which it was necessary for him to bear. "A body hast thou prepared me."

He who assumed that body was existent before that body was prepared. He says, "A body hast thou prepared me. Lo, I come." He from old eternity dwelt with God: the Word was in the beginning with God, and the Word was God. Beloved, the human nature of Christ was taken on him in order that he might be able to do for us that which God desired and required. God desired to see an obedient man, a man who would keep his law to the full; and he sees him in Christ. God desired to see one who would vindicate the eternal justice, and show that sin is no trifle; and behold our Lord, the eternal Son of God, entering into that prepared body, was ready to do all this mighty work, by rendering to the law a full recompense for our dishonor of it! His body was prepared to this end. Incarnation is a means to atonement. Only a man could vindicate the law, and therefore the Son of God became a man. This is a wonderful being, this God in our nature. "Emmanuel" is a glorious word.

III. But now, thirdly, I call your attention to The Declaration of the Christ, made in the text: "Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire. Then said I, Lo, I come." Observe when he says this. It is in the time of failure. All the sacrifices had failed. The candle flickered, and was dying out, and then the great light arose, even the eternal light, and like a trumpet the words rang out, "Lo, I come." All this has been of no avail; now I come. It is in the time of failure that Christ always does appear. The last of man is the first of God; and when we have come to the end of all our power and hope, then the eternal power and Godhead appears with its "Lo, I come." When our Lord comes, it is with the view of filling up the vacuum which had now been sorrowfully seen. God does not desire these things; God does not require these things; but he does desire and he does require something better; and lo, the Christ has come to bring that something.

When he appears, it is as the personal Lord. Lay the stress upon the pronoun, "Lo, I come." The infinite Ego appears. "Lo, I come." "In him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." He comes forth from the ivory palaces to inhabit the tents of manhood. He takes upon himself the body prepared for him of the Lord God, and he stands forth in his matchless personality ready to do the will of God. "It pleased the Father that in him should all fullness dwell." Everything is stored up in his blessed person, and we are complete in him. Observe the joyful avowal that he makes—"Lo, I come." This is no dirge: I think I hear a silver trumpet ring out—"Lo, I come." Here is a joyful alacrity and intense eagerness. The coming of the Saviour was to him a thing of exceeding willingness. "For the joy that was set before him, he endured the cross, despising the shame."

I think, too, I hear in this declaration of the coming One a note of finality. He takes away the sacrifice from Aaron's altar; but he says, "Lo, I come." There is an end of it. Read it, "Lo, I am come;" for it is in the present tense, and how sweet the sound! Christ is come, and joy with him. Read it as well in the future, if you will, "Lo I come," for without sin unto salvation;" here is our chief hope! "Lo, I come." He himself is the last word of God. "In the beginning was the Word;" and so he was God's first word. But he is the end as well as the beginning: God's last word to man; Christ is God's ultimatum. Look for no new revelation—"Lo, I am come," shines on for ever. Do not ask, "Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another?" He has come; look for no other. Behold, he came to give what God desires, what God requires; what would you more? Let him be all your salvation and all you desire. Let him be "the desire of all nations." He is the fulfilment all the requirements of the human race, as well as the full amount of what God requires.

He Comes "the Second Time

IV. Next, I beg you to note the reference to Preceding Writings.

He says, "Lo, I come: in the volume of the book it is written of me." If I preached from the passage in the Epistle to the Hebrews, I might fairly declare that in the whole volume of Holy Scripture much is written of our Lord and prescribed for him as Messiah. Preaching as I am from the Psalms, I cannot take so long range. I must look back and find what was written in David's day, and within the Pentateuch certainly; and where do I find it written concerning his coming? The Pentateuch drips with prophecies of Christ as a honeycomb overflowing with its honey.

But I confess I do not feel shut out from another interpretation. I conceive that our Lord here refers to another book, the book of the living purposes, the volume of the eternal covenant. That sealed book, upon whose secrets no angel's eye has looked, a book written by the finger of God long before he wrote the book of the law upon tables of stone, that book of God may be spoken of in the Psalm, "And in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them." Our Lord came to carry out all his suretyship engagements: his work is the exact fulfilment of his engagements recorded in the eternal covenant, "ordered in all things and sure." He acts out every mysterious line and syllable, even to the full.

V. I must close with the delight of Him that Cometh.

He said, "Lo, I come." As I have, already told you, there is wonderful delight in that exclamation—"Lo, I come;" but lest we should mistake our Lord, he adds, "I delight to do thy will, O my God: yea, thy law is within my heart." There can be no denial of his joy in his service. He had a prospective delight as to his work. Before he came, he delighted in the thought of his incarnation. As God, he was infinitely blessed; but he knew nothing by experience of the life of man, and into that sphere he desired to enter. To the Godhead there can be no enlargement, for it is infinite; but still there can be an addition; our Lord was to add the nature of man to that of God. He would live as man, suffer as man, and triumph as man, and yet remain God: and to this he looked forward with a strange delight, inexplicable except upon the knowledge of the great love he bore to us.

May I go a step further and say that he had an actual delight in his bodily coming among men? "I delight to do thy will, O my God"—not merely to think of doing it. When our Lord was here, he was the most blessed of men. Do you start? Do you remind me that he was "a man of sorrows?" I grant you that none was more afflicted; but I still stand to it, that within him dwelt

A Joy of the Highest Order.

To him it was joy to be in sorrow, and honor to be put to shame. Do you think that lightens our estimate of his self-denial and disinterestedness? Nay, it adds weight to it. Some people fancy that there is no credit in doing a thing unless you are miserable in doing it. Nay, brethren, that is the very reverse. Obedience which is unwillingly offered and causes no joy in the soul, is not acceptable. We must serve God with our heart, or we do not serve him. Obedience rendered without delight in rendering it is only half obedience. You shall say what you will about the greatness of my Lord's agonies. You shall never go too far in your estimate of his unfathomable griefs; but going with you to the full in it all, I shall take liberty still to say that he had within himself a fountain of joy, which enabled him to endure the cross, and even to despise the shame.

Hear this one other word. It is all done now. And shall I tell you, need I tell you, what must be the delight, the heavenly joy of our Lord, now that the work is finished? He is now the focus, the centre, the source of bliss. What must be his own delight! What a heaven of delight shines in those eyes of his! Jesus wept for these sinners, but now he rejoices over them. How resplendent are the nail-prints to-day, for the redeemed of the Lord's death are believing and repenting! That blessed countenance which is always as a sun, shineth in the fulness of its strength, now that he sees of the travail of his soul.

Use the Book.

Go, and take to the heathen this sacred Book. "In the volume of the book it is written of him." Do not begin to doubt the Book yourself. Why should you send missionaries to teach them about a book in which you do not yourself believe? Tell the nations that "In the volume of the book it is written of him." Believe this Book, and spread it. Help Bible societies, and all such efforts; and aid missionary societies, which carry the Book and proclaim the Saviour. The men of the Book of God are the men of God, such as the world needs. Bid such men go and open the Book of God, and teach the nations its blessed news. Go, dear friends, and assure the heathen that there is happiness in obedience to God. So the Saviour found it. He delighted in God's will, even to the death, and they will also know delight as in their measures they bow before the authority of the Word and the will of the one living and true God, the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob. Give glory unto God, whom our Lord Jesus has come to glorify. Amen.

REV. W. T. LAMBOURNE.

Arrival of the Famous Baptist Pastor and Philanthropic Laborer of the East of London.

A VALUED Christian laborer, whom the Churches will gladly welcome, has just arrived here from England. The visitor is the Rev. W. T. Lambourne, of the East of London, whose famous Tabernacle many of our countrymen have visited while staying in the British metropolis. Mr. Lambourne, whose portrait is here given, is the kind of man our readers will like to hear.

He is a stalwart Baptist, highly esteemed by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon. He is a strong Pre-Millennarian, who vigorously maintains the doctrine of the Lord's personal coming and believes that it is near at hand. And thirdly, he has a warm heart and a willing head and hand in philanthropic labor. During the recent terrible time of distress in London, Mr. Lambourne was one of the most prominent workers among the poor. His own money and thousands of dollars sent to him by philanthropists were used by him in feeding the starving and providing shelter for the homeless. During that period he often spent twenty hours out of the twenty-four in going from street to street in the most squalid districts looking after the sick and the poor, administering to their wants. One day a friend met him hurrying homeward to get his wife's watch that he might sell it to keep a family from being evicted. "Why don't you sell your own watch?" his friend asked. "Oh!" said Mr. Lambourne, "that was sold last week." At the end of the time of stress the pastor was completely worn out by his labors and by the poisonous atmosphere of the dwellings in which so many of his hours had been spent. We trust that his visit here may be beneficial to him and that he may find many opportunities during his stay of speaking for the Master, whom he loves and has served so well. Letters for him, if sent to this office, will be forwarded to him.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A Reform Movement.*

ONTVERD was a New England manufacturing city. The Rev. Mr. Barnes soon found much to occupy his mind and heart and time. The nightmare of poverty and the curse of intemperance were everywhere. An opportunity soon came to him to attack the greatest evil of modern days. He preached what he regarded as his strongest and most eloquent sermon. To his astonishment, the congregation received his fiery attack with indifference. Only one deacon referred to the sermon. Deacon Worthington,—a wise, far-seeing old gentleman.

"You gave us an excellent sermon this morning on temperance; but I would not say much on that subject if I were you. Our people are not used to temperance sermons. I am an older man than you, and my advice, from bitter experience, is for you to let this and all so-called popular questions alone. Thousands of ministers have wrecked their churches on popular questions."

"You astonish me, deacon," replied Mr. Barnes. "I have always felt it was my duty to discuss the live issues of the day, and supposed that my people would be only too glad to hear them."

"You must count the cost before you begin in any social warfare. If you will be a reformer, be sure that the fate of the reformer will follow you."

Rev. Charles Farrar was a neighboring minister of the same denomination.

"My dear brother (said he), I will join in anything that will help us to rid the earth of this fearful curse to modern civilization. Why, my boy, I was in such work before you were in short clothes. But you have no idea what an effect it will have on your future prospects. If you are willing to take the consequences, I will join you."

He met Mr. Jones at his gate, about to start on a round of parish calls. "Bless your soul! You can count on me all the way through. Yes, Barnes; I'm with you from the hallelujah to the Amen."

"Such matters (said the Rev. Dr. Pendleton) the church very wisely leaves to the courts. While I am a devoted friend of true temperance, I should seriously object to engage in any crusade against the liquor traffic."

The Raid.

"Sheriff," said lawyer Deems, "I have bad business for you. Those temperance people have sworn out a lot of complaints against the whiskey men and the hotels. They want all the bars and saloons in the city raided to-morrow—the first thing to-morrow morning."

"Is this genuine business, Squire, or only tip 'em a wink?"

"I am sorry to say it is genuine this time, Sheriff," he replied, gloomily. "We must make a clean sweep of the dives, every one of them, too. Sent Spotum to the Raven. Order the constables to raid the grogeries on the Flat. Do it so as to take 'em all by surprise."

By halfpast seven, the raiding had begun. Sheriff Halt headed the posse that raided the Mansion House. Mr. Sherry received them courteously, and said: "Gentlemen, you are at liberty to search my premises. Begin where you please."

"Officers, follow me," said the sheriff. They entered the bar-room and found nothing but a row of empty bottles, decanters and glasses. They then went on into the cellar and examined the empty casks and barrels. "Well, gentlemen, let us try the barn," said the sheriff. "We want this thing done thoroughly." To the barn they proceeded and found nothing.

"Officers," said the sheriff, in a loud voice, "We shall have to report nothing found. Somebody has given Sherry the tip." He wrote on the warrant: "After diligent search, nothing found—Ezekiel Halt."

But twenty saloons were found containing sufficient quantities of liquor to cause the arrest of their proprietors. The offenders were summoned to the police court.

"What will you do, Mr. Duffy?" asked the judge. "Plead guilty?"

"Guilty, yer honor—what am I guilty of? Is it a crime in a free country to give a friend a glass of beer? What did that miserable hayseed gossoon of a constable say, who kem on me unbeknownst?"

"He found you selling liquor over the bar."

"What's me fine, yer Honor?"

"As this is your first offence, Pat, if you will plead guilty, or plead nolo contendere, I'll let you off without any fine," said the judge. "But Pat, if you're caught again, it will go hard with you."

"If I get caught agin, yer Honor, it will be whin I'm aslape. Bad luck to that counthry-min. If ever I see the pumpkin-headed chap out-o'-doors, I'll——"

"There, Pat, be careful, or I'll have you committed for contempt of court."

The others were disposed of in the same manner.

"Nothing remains but to keep the fight up for all time," said Mr. Barnes thoughtfully. "How little we have done! We have preached, lectured, agitated and labored. We have arrested a few liquor-dealers and they have escaped the just penalty of their crime against the law."

FOX WORSHIP IN JAPAN.

OUR illustration of a Japanese Fox shrine is taken from a picture recently secured by a traveller in that country and represents the interior of a temple. Before the shrine of Inari (the Japanese title of the God of Rice Crops,) kneels a priest to implore the deity who in vulpian form is believed to offer special protection to the growing rice.

The fox is a special servant of Inari, the Rice-God, and far from being hunted to death for the pleasure of sportsmen, as in Europe and America, he is everywhere treated with profound respect and even veneration. A native meeting a fox will immediately salute the animal and give him the right of way, whether he be in the field, on the highway or in the garden. Indeed, it is not an uncommon thing, especially in the rural districts, to see in the gardens of hotels or in the grounds that surround farmhouses of the better class, small and prettily designed fox shrines, similar to those in the illustration. These are tastily decorated and supplied with flowers, fruit and food, for reynard supposably, but which are really appropriated by the priests who visit these shrines with un-failing regularity. In the illustration the priest is shown upon his knees in the centre while the children look on interestedly watching him at his devotions.

Wonderful progress has been made during a quarter of a century in spreading the religion of Jesus Christ in Japan. In hundreds of districts throughout the country, the shrines of the old idols, though still standing, are no longer crowded by superstitious worshippers as of yore. In the great cities where progress has been made in the translation of the Bible and in missionary work, the temples of the ancient heathen gods have been shaken and slowly but surely the superstitions of many centuries are yielding like mists before the sunrise of Gospel truth. Those among our readers who have recently contributed to the support of Mr. J. McLain Brown who is laboring at Tokio will be glad to learn that he writes most hopefully of the future of Japan.

THE LATE DR. HENRY J. VAN DYKE.

(See Portrait and Illustration.)

THE sudden death of Dr. Henry J. Van Dyke, on May 25, has caused widespread regret, not only in Brooklyn, where he was best known, but in many other cities, and throughout the Presbyterian Church. He had but recently accepted the Professorship of Dogmatic and Systematic Theology in Union Theological Seminary, New York, and was looking forward to a period of congenial and honorable service. To his church, which he had faithfully served for thirty-eight years, he had tendered his resignation and it had been reluctantly accepted. A few more weeks of pastoral labor remained to him; he wished to hold a farewell communion service, and to close up the affairs of some occupations connected with his long pastorate, and then he would pass from the pulpit to the professor's chair with that consciousness of duty completed which is so precious to the true worker. This, however, was not permitted him. But he had worked to the last and when the unexpected summons came, he said with the acquiescence of childlike simplicity, "I am ready to go."

Neither he nor those around him apprehended this sudden close of his useful life. He preached on Sunday, May 24, as usual. Near the close of his evening discourse he was troubled with pain in the region of the heart, but it soon passed and did not interrupt the service. Another attack occurred early the next morning, but was brief like the first. He consulted his physician who recognized his danger and insisted on entire and immediate rest. Dr. Van Dyke, however, felt so well, that he decided on keeping an engagement to attend the Ministers' meeting that morning in New York. On his return he spent the evening cheerfully at home with some friends, apparently in his usual good health and spirits. About ten o'clock he was again seized with the pain in the heart. His physician was immediately summoned, but the sufferer was beyond the power of medical skill and before an hour had passed he breathed his last.

On May 21, of last year, a sketch of Dr. Van Dyke's life appeared in this journal; it is therefore unnecessary to do more here than briefly mention its leading events. He was born at Abingdon, Penn. March 2, 1822. He studied at the Latin School of that town and afterwards at the University of Pennsylvania. Graduating in 1842, he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, where he took the two-year course, at the end of which he was ordained. His first charge was at Bridgeton, N. J., from which after seven years labor he removed to Germantown, Penn. In June 1853, he accepted an invitation from Brooklyn to what is now known as the Second Presbyterian Church. He was there ever afterwards, though many efforts were made to attract him to other spheres of labor. One call came from the Theological Seminary of Columbia, S. C. which elected him Professor of Dogmatic Theology. A second came from a church at Nashville, Tenn. This he accepted, but Providential circumstances led him to re-consider his decision. A third call came from the Seminary at Allegheny, Pa., and a fourth to the Seminary at Oakland, Cal. These were evidences of respect which must have been gratifying to him, but which he felt it his duty to decline. One other honor must also have pleased him. It was that of being elected Moderator of the General Assembly, which in 1876 met in Brooklyn. Dr. Van Dyke was married in 1849. Of his family, consisting of three sons and one daughter, his wife and two sons survive him. Of them—Dr. Henry J. Van Dyke—is pastor of the Brick Church, New York, and the other Paul D. Van Dyke is Professor of Church History at Princeton.

The recent election of Dr. Van Dyke to the Professorship at Union Theological Seminary was to have been submitted to the General Assembly at Detroit last week for confirmation. That it would have been cheerfully accorded there can be no doubt. His personal character, his literary attainments and his orthodoxy were alike unquestioned. But the Assembly has no such pleasant duty to perform.

m. Regret, sympathy, condolence, lie within its ver. Yet, perhaps, one other act it might take. Would be a happy event, and one which Dr. Van would have lighted, if out of came a softening, ceful, influence the spirits of the thren now gathered in deliberation. At he deeply dered the present troversy, and ecially the acrimonious spirit that is characterized is well known. One of his latest rances he plead- for "liberty rather than orthodoxy," that liberty ich, as he said, roduces pro- s" and depre- ed the condem- ion or persecu- n of any man, or ly of men, whose rch after truth led them to clusions differ- from those held their brethren. et us have peace," said. Is it less his prayer now that he has ched the plane above the turmoil and strife this world? Better than all the honor to his mory and tributes of personal esteem that rendered in the assembly, would be a quick- ing of the spirit of brotherly love among the thren, and a cessation of the strife which he deeply deplored.

A LETTER FROM BISHOP TAYLOR.

THE many friends of Bishop William Taylor among our readers will be pleased to have the latest news of him. It came in a letter to his son, Rev. Ross Taylor, who has kind- sent it to us for publication. Writing from nana in the Congo State, on April 14, the shop says: "Last night I slept aboard our amer, the Anne Taylor. No such cabins on y other river steamer on the Congo. Mrs. ter was very ill when she came aboard, two onths ago, but is now much better. She will quire a year at home to restore her fully. ### THE CAPTAIN'S BARGAIN.

BY JULIA McNAIR WRIGHT.

[Published by special arrangement with The National Temper- ance Society.]

The Summer Sun Shines.

HE hereditary saw-mill of Captain Allen was one of the few survivors of the hundred brave mills which were once driven by the various waters of Schuylkill County. In early days the rugged sur- face of that county was covered with magnificent forests of chestnut, oak, beech, maple, birch, poplar, and pine. The Cap- tain's mill stood where his grandfather had built it, but its glory had departed. All the better kinds of timber had perished. When new houses were built, brick and manufactured lumber from Maine and the Carolinas supplied the contractors. The acres which belonged to the mill were few and unproductive.

One misfortune after another had pursued the Allen generations. Their little property was mortgaged. The Captain, until he had reached middle-age, had been the sole support of an invalid sister. During the years of his tendance upon her, 'Liza, having been obliged to give up her early school-teaching, had been nurse and provider for a paralyzed father. At last, when her father was gone, and the years of their youth had gone also, the Captain and Eliza married. Within six months, the house, in which three generations of Allens had been sheltered, was burn- ed to the ground, and the newly married pair saved little besides the stove, crockery, and cooking utensils of the outside kitchen. This might have overwhelmed a less energetic couple, but, gathering them- selves together after the first amazement the Captain pro- ceeded to fit up two rooms below the mill for a domicile, and make tables, bedsteads, and other furniture therefor, while Eliza sewed and nursed for her neighbors, until she had earned enough for another plenishing of household linen, blankets, and curtains. Her busy hands were never still; she was always contriving something for her little home.

Besides the mill, the Captain owned a barge, the Fair- Weather. It was a wide, clumsy craft, built for safety and capacity for lading. The Captain supplemented the small income of the mill by a yearly voyage to Philadelphia, down the Schuylkill and its system of canals.

This voyage generally occupied six weeks. It was undertaken at the beginning of June. The barge had a great square sail, which could be used when the wind chanced to serve, but its progress was generally made along the river by a setting-pole. Through the canals horses were hired for towing, though Captain Allen remembered well when he and his brother, who had long since "gone West," used themselves to tow their father's boat through the canals by fastening the towing-line to the middle of a stick, the ends of which they braced across their breasts, as they stoutly dragged their boat. This voyage was the great event of the year to the Allens. It was a long picnic. At the city the Captain bought the one ready-made suit, and Eliza the one gown-piece, which they allowed themselves for each year. Eliza also bought a little bonnet-trimming, some shoes, factory cloth and calico. Nor was she restricted in the dear delight of shopping by the poverty of her own purse. Her neighbors sent by her for various articles, which she had the pleasure of purchasing at Philadelphia stores. But the real object of the trip, was not merely buying, but selling. The Captain sold on commission, or bought and resold, honey, butter, cheese, home-cured bacon, ham and pork, corn-husk mats, hand-knit socks and mittens, and many other articles, for which he had had for years regular purchasers in the city.

This voyage now began to be talked of. Robert understood that they were going some- where in the boat, and he was to go too.

"Where are we going?" he asked.

"Down to the city, where you came from," said Jerry.

"You won't tate me back?" cried Robert, turning wide eyes of terror on the Captain.

"No, indeed, my man, we'll keep you forever," said the Captain. It did cross his mind that if the boy were seen and claimed by his parents, he, the Captain, would be freed from his oath of abstinence. But, at the same time, the Captain felt sure that liquor drunk at the expense of losing Robert would be liquor that cost far too dear. He was prepared to do valiant battle with all creation for the ownership of the child. And, indeed, even the unmaternal tramp who deserted him would not have been at all likely to recognize in the jolly, rosy, plump, spotlessly-clean child with the shining curls, the thin, pale, frightened, dirty little one she had abandoned on the roadside.

That Robert had been brought to Schuylkill county from some great city they were sure from the child's notions and remarks. When first he had seen the impetuous waters of the Lal's Creek, he had said that they must come from "an awful big hyd'ant, and why did they let 'em run away?" When he saw Jerry milking the cow, he had thrown that one-eyed youth nearly into convulsions by saying that he "didn't know milk come from a live hyd'ant." At first he was afraid to walk on the grass, lest the cops, which is gamin vernacular for policemen, should "get him." As for flowers, the first day that he found Pink picking liberal dandelions and buttercups, he kept checking her, and taking the flowers from her, and hiding them. At last, as the little maid kept on, and Eliza was coming, he seized all the flowers and held them himself. At this Pink wept.

"Give Pink her flowers," said Eliza. "They's mine, I picked 'em!" insisted Robert.

"Why do you say that?" said Eliza, finally, "it is very, very naughty. I saw Pink pick them. You did not pick one."

"I picked 'em," asseverated Robert, "if Pink picked 'em the cops will get her—and she's too little for the cops to get. I'm big."

Thus Eliza perceived that the infant Bayard was ready to sacrifice himself to the police in the stead of Pink. In fact, Pink had a true knight in Robert. "Half for Pink" became a byword in the family. Whatever Robert got, Pink had the half, and if he divided, the half for Pink was manifestly the larger half. Every apple or orange given him by customers at the mill, every cake dealt out by Mrs. Deacon Britt, was "half for Pink." Finally, a man who was having some corn ground, for the mill had a run of stones for grinding corn, gave Robert a bright new cent. He ran to Eliza, held it up, and looked at it with eagerness.

"Tan you break it?—half for Pink!" "Oh, no; you can't break a penny," said Eliza (who, in her school-keeping days, had broken a sixpence with Captain Zekiel).

Robert gave half a sigh and half a second, to thought, then, "All for Pink," he said, cheerfully, and handed over his first fortune with a smile.

No wonder that Captain Zekiel thought this little gentleman worth all the drinks in the world.

Once assured that nothing should part him from his new parents, Robert beheld with interest the process of cleaning, repairing, and lading the barge Fair-Weather.

"Am you going, Jerry?" he asked "the Hands" one evening. "Don't you want to go on the boat?"

"No, I ain't," said Jerry, "and I don't want to go. I don't hanker after no cities. I had enough of 'em when I was little. Cities is all smells and yells."

"You might go to the hospital again," said Robert.

"Not unless I lost one of my arms, and I hope I won't be so unfort'nate" said Jerry. "The hospital is the nicest part of the city, but this is nicer than the hospital, by a long shot. Besides, you see, Robert, somebody must stay home. There's the cow to look after, and the chickens to feed, and the pig to be tended and the garden to be weeded and hoed, or we won't have any potatoes, or beans, or corn for winter. Then somebody, like as not, will want some corn ground or some boards run out, and I've got to be here to 'tend to business.'"

"Won't you be lonesome, Jerry?" asked Robert.

"Not much. I'll have a tip-top time. There's all the wood-ashes from the winter leached, and the winter soap-grease ready, and I'm going to make the year's soap. The ma'am she 'lows there ain't a woman in this district can make as good soap, both hard and soft, as Jerry can. Then the cow is giving lots of milk, and there'll be none of you here to use milk or butter, and I'll churn every week twice, and Saturday's I'll borrow Deacon Britt's row-boat, and I'll go down to Lacy and sell my butter, and all the eggs the hens lay, and any garden-sass that's growed, and when the ma'am gets back I'll have a nice little bag of dollars for her. The ma'am she 'lows there was never such a feller to make money as Jerry. I don't want better vacation than going down to Lacy Saturdays to sell my things. The ma'am she 'lows that Jerry could make a livin' on a bare rock, and so I could."

"What would you do on the bare rock, Jerry?" asked Robert, with the earnestness of a disciple.

"I'd," said the master of economics, taken aback by the practicality of the question, "well, I' pound up the rock, and sell it 'stead of cuttle-bone for cage-birds!"

"What makes it so much nicer here, Jerry, than in the city? What makes the city all smells and yells?" asked the pupil.

"It's my pinion," said the one-legged preceptor, "that what ruins the city is the whiskey. The yells comes from the whiskey out and out, fighting, falling, squabbling. The smells, they come from the dirt, the dirt you find along with the smells where it is very poor, and the poor-ness comes from drinking the whiskey. What makes here so much better than the city, is—water. You see the water there? It turns our mill. It waters the trees and grass and flowers. It makes all cool and clean and pleasant; and if we didn't have water here we couldn't have birds or squirrels 'round us."

Robert, like Jerry, preferred the country to the city. He took readily to his rural surroundings, soon learned to drive the cow home from her feeding on the hillside, learned to spy out the birds'-nests in grass and bush, and watched them in such intense quiet as not to alarm the brooding birds. He would stand fascinated to watch the squirrels, red and gray, whirling round the tree-trunks; and then, what wordless joy he found in the downy broods of chickens! To take food and water to the speckled mothers of those fluffy, cheeping balls, was pure joy. So dear were the delights of the home at the mill, that Robert's mind was equally divided between the home and the prospective trip.

While Jerry had always called his protectors "The ma'am" and "The Cap'n," Robert called them "father and mother." Jerry, well-esteemed and well-cared for, was always "The Hands." Robert slipped at once into the place of a treasured son. Nor was it without envy, that the lately criticising neighbors saw the Captain and Liza "come to meeting" with the new boy in their household band. "Going to meeting" was, in the Lal's Mountain district, a family affair. On the blue benches of the school-house there was, between the father and mother, no vacuum abhorred of God, occasioned by the leaving of the children to play at home during church-time. The honest people came, and brought their children. The infants sat on their mothers' knees. Sometimes they slept, sometimes they ate cake, sometimes they "spoke in meeting" a few words of infantile babble, but no minister had ever been heard of there who asked a mother to "remove that child," or to "keep that child still." The indefeasible right of the children in the house of their God was recognized.

So, on those calm, fragrant, sunny, summer Sabbaths the Allen family walked the mile to the old red school-house, Captain Zekiel carrying Bop, and Robert leading Pink, and Jerry vigorously stumping in the rear of the line of march.

"That is a lovely boy," said Mrs. (Continued on next Page.)

THE CAPTAIN'S BARGAIN.

con Britt, bestowing unlimited cake on the well-behaved infant. "You'd give him to me, Mrs. en. You have your own, you could spare him."

"He is my own, now," said 'Liza. "I couldn't spare him by any manner means."

"O. Thanks to Robert, she looked forward with unalloyed pleasure to trip down the Schuylkill. Here, where her stay at Philadelphia had been troubled by the numerous invitations the genial Captain received to take—and the great difficulty of keeping him from wasting that hard-earned money which was to pay the "s interest on the mortgage. But now, as the Captain was a man of his word, Mrs. 'Liza could take her trip with a cheerful heart.

And so, on a June day, the Fair-Weather started. There was a tiny cabin fitted up with three berths for the family, a little charcoal stove for cooking, washing, and ironing. Provisions were aboard. The deck was all piled up safely under the deck, or covered with tarred tarlin on the deck. There was no king of trunks, or buying of garments, or making a travelling-gear for this journey. Eliza put a few changes of raiment into a little blue bag, and the Captain carried it aboard his shoulder; the children went their ship bare-footed, in the tented chip-hats, whereof the careful father had lined the brims with green cloth. "The Hands" stood on the deck and waved his arm, his crutch, his wooden leg in farewell. Miss 'Liza wasted no breath on telling the invaluable Jerry what to do—she knew. Like Joseph, all that his master had was under his hand.

When Mrs. Eliza sat down on a kitchen chair beside the tiller, to lend a hand in steering, if need be; the Captain planted his setting-pole in the bed of the stream, and, bowing his huge frame against it, walked great strides along the deck; and as he propelled, and aided by the current, the Fair-Weather swept away in the mill, while Robert and Pink, their knees, leaned their heads over the low bulwarks, and laughed at their own reflections in the dancing waters. The year before, Pink had done little but scream and keep the baby screaming, all the way to Philadelphia and back—and the Captain also had visited the big bottle of temperance more than usual. But now, blessed with Robert's curly head! the terms of the "Treaty of Lal's Mountain" had been, "No bottle—no tantrums!" and dame Eliza was at peace.

"There are plenty to want Robert now," she had casually remarked one day, knowing well that she was prepared in her heart to fight any one like a lioness for the possession of him.

Down the creek, which, making a bend about the foot of Lal's Mountain, just after leaving the mill, widened and deepened, and rolled more sluggishly, until it joined the Schuylkill, they floated into the often-sung-for. Above them shone flecked with red and there with soft clouds, like the famous golden fleece, those blue ne skies of the Keystone State which rival the skies of Italy. They were lifted by those "flowery banks" which were bright to the eyes of the poet Moore. The long grasses, the willows and the birch leaned to touch the clear waters; the banks swept in goodly curves, now high, now low; here, little shapely cedars, like Christmas-trees, stood erect above the gray lichen-decked stones; there, brambles white with bloom, and wild-roses flushed with fragrant flowers, wreathed the banks. Little islets rose upon their right and drifted slowly behind them, as the Fair-Weather went steadily on. Here a little sail-boat, or a clumsy barge passed them or met them; here a little punt rocked on the water, while a man or a boy fished. Robert and Pink fished too, with bent pins tied to threads. They caught nothing, unless the happy thought occurred to the Captain to secretly pull up the lines and fasten to them a spool, or a bit of chip or other trash, it was all "fish" to the children. At evening the Fair-Weather was tied up at the bank. The Captain had friends all along the shores; he had gone up and down the Schuylkill once or twice a year for over thirty years. The friends came aboard to visit Captain 'Zekiel and 'Liza,—gray old men with tales of "when I was young"; brisk housewives, with narrations of new recipes, and new patterns of quilts; young men and maidens, out for an evening of courting; little children sometimes brought to play with the Captain's children.

Thanks to the Captain's former methods of good fellowship, there were big bottles, brought too, sometimes as well as babies. Great was the wonder when, with a little constrained laugh, Captain 'Zekiel said: "No, thankee, no; I'm sworn off that now."

Well! well! They looked at Mrs. 'Liza, but she said never a word. 'Liza was one of those women who can be blind and deaf whenever it suits them.

"Sworn off! Well, 'Zekiel, has the temperance wave swept you in, too? 'Pears to me it's going to sweep us all in sometime before long," said one patriarch.

"It won't sweep in all of you older men who have been taking your night-caps for fifty or sixty years," said a dame who was "visiting" with 'Liza; "you'll keep to your toddy. But that toddy generation will drop off one by one, and we'll have a generation that have sucked temperance ideas with their mothers' milk. We'll have a generation of children that hear and see, read and sing temperance, and then you'll see what the country'll rise to, when they go to the polls, straight and strong, clean skins, keen brains, clear ideas of what ought to be and what ought not to be."

"Hear her. She's one of the lights of the temperance cause, is my niece, Sary Ann," laughed the patriarch.

"And I'm glad, Captain 'Zekiel," said Sary Ann, "that you've took the right turn in the prime of your days."

"Well, you see," said Captain 'Zekiel, "me and 'Liza, we 'dopted a boy; a little chap that seemed to need adoptin'. But we're poor, and we can't afford to lay out in all lines. It costs money to buy another child shoes, and so, and so—why—there's the boy, you see, and me and 'Liza, we have made a Bargain."

(To be Continued.)

"THANK GOD, THERE IS ROOM."

Mr. James Thompson, a missionary, relates the following: "Some years ago there was a shipwreck in the Persian Gulf, and just as the ship was about to sink, some of the crew rushed to a small boat and crowded into it. It was a very small boat, but thirteen persons managed to crowd themselves in, bringing its gunwale down to within a few inches of the water. Other three men, who had been unable to reach the boat when the vessel went down, were fortunate enough to get hold of a floating spar. But the waves were high, and one of the men on the spar felt that he could not maintain his hold much longer, and gathering all his strength for one final effort, he left his support and swam towards the boat. He reached it, and asked to be taken in, but their reply was 'No, we cannot. Already there are too many here, and at any moment we may be swamped. The man in the water would not be denied, and swimming near caught hold of the boat and tried to pull himself on board. At once he was roughly pushed back with the curt words, 'No room, no room.' Then, they advised him to swim back to his float, but he only made another effort to get on board, and caught the gunwale so firmly that it was only by main force they could drag him off and throw him back into the sea. Then the poor fellow's strength was exhausted; he could struggle no longer. The angry waves leaped over him, and he sank. There was no room for him in the boat; but, thank God, there is hope for every poor sinner who takes hold of Christ for salvation."

"CUMBERED ABOUT MUCH SERVING."

LUKE 10: 40-42.

CHRIST never asks of us such heavy labor
As leaves no time for resting at His feet;
The waiting attitude of expectation
He oftentimes counts a service most complete.

He sometimes wants our ear—our rapt attention,
That He some sweetest secret may impart
'Tis always in the time of deepest stillness
That heart finds deepest fellowship with heart.

We sometimes wonder why our Lord doth place us
Within a sphere so narrow, so obscure,
That nothing we call work can find an entrance;
There's only room to suffer—to endure!

Well, God loves patience! Souls that dwell in stillness,

Doing the little things, or resting quite,
May just as perfectly fulfill their mission,
Be just as useful in the Father's sight,

As they who grapple with some giant evil,
Clearing a path that every eye may see:
Our Saviour cares for cheerful acquiescence,
Rather than for a busy ministry.

And yet He does love service, where 'tis given
By grateful love that clothes itself in deed;
But work that's done beneath the scourge of duty,

Be sure, to such He gives but little heed.

Then seek to please Him, whatso'er He bids thee,

Whether to do, to suffer, or lie still;
'Twill matter little by what path He led us,
If in it all we sought to do His will.

J. E. JEWETT, Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for ten cents or 100 for twenty cents. Postage stamps taken.

Didn't you ever notice how your system seems to crave special assistance in the spring? Just the help required is given by Hood's Sarsaparilla. It gives nerve, mental and bodily strength.

INSPIRED BY A BIRD.

There was a saint who lived 250 years ago, persecuted and shut in prison because of her faith—Madame Guyon. She was in a miserable outward condition, and had to stay in bed to keep herself warm. She had a little bird with her in a cage; she brought it inside the bed curtains to keep it from perishing with cold.
One day she was lying in a desponding state of mind, when her eye caught sight of this little bird, and the thought came into her mind,
"Why do I keep this bird in confinement when she would rather be free?
Why?—to sing to me; and perhaps the Lord is keeping me here in this prison that I may sing to him!" At once her soul was filled with joy and praise, and in that prison she wrote some of the most beautiful poems that have been a joy and a strength to the children of God ever since.
The power of praising God is a blessed boon: we can all have it. Get out on to the promises of the Lord and you will have victory.

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria.
When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.
When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.
When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

THE BURDEN-BEARER.

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON PREACHED IN THE NEW BROOKLYN TABERNACLE LAST SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 7, 1891.

A Subject Appropriate for Every Man—A Boyhood Reminiscence—Practical Religion the Need of All—An Evangelist's Prayer for Food—What to do with Burdens—I. Business Burdens—Unexpected Perplexities—Business Men Toiling for Others—A Drowning Man's Gift to his Mother—An Accountant's Prayer Answered—II. The Burden of Persecution and Abuse—A New Type of Universalist—III. The Burden of Physical Ailments—A Cure in Answer to Prayer—IV. The Burden of Bereavement.

"Cast thy burden on the Lord and he shall sustain thee." Psalm 55: 22.

DAVID was here taking his own medicine. If anybody had on him heavy weights, David had them, and yet out of his own experience he advises you and me as to the best way of getting rid of burdens. This is a world of burden-bearing. Coming into the house of prayer there may be no sign of sadness or sorrow, but where is the man who has not a conflict? Where is the soul that has not a struggle? And there is not a day of all the year when my text is not gloriously appropriate, and there is never an audience assembled on the planet where the text does not fit the occasion: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee." In the far East wells of water are so infrequent that when a man owns a well he has a property of very great value, and sometimes battles have been fought for the possession of one well of water; but there is one well that every man owns, a deep well, a perennial well, a well of tears. If a man has not a burden on this shoulder, he has a burden on the other shoulder. The day I left home to look after myself and for myself, in the wagon my father sat driving, and he said that day something which has kept with me all my life: "De Witt, it is always safe to trust God. I have many a time come to a crisis of difficulty. You may know that, having been sick for fifteen years, it was no easy thing for me to support a family; but always God came to the rescue. I remember the time," he said, "when I didn't know what to do, and I saw a man on horseback riding up the farm lane, and he announced to me that I had been nominated for the most lucrative office in the gift of the people of the county; and to that office I was elected, and God in that way met all my wants, and I tell you it is always safe to trust him." Oh, my friends, what we want is a practical religion! The religion people have is so high up you cannot reach it. I had a friend who entered the life of an Evangelist. He gave up a lucrative business in Chicago, and he and his wife finally came to severe want. He told me that in the morning at prayers he said: "O Lord, thou knowest we have not a mouthful of food in the house! Help me, help us!" And he started out on the street, and a gentleman met him and said: "I have been thinking of you for a good while. You know I am a flour merchant; if you won't be offended, I should like to send you a barrel of flour." My friend cast his burden on the Lord, and the Lord sustained him. In the Straits of Magellan, I have been told, there is a place where whichever way a ship captain puts his ship he finds the wind against him, and there are men who all their lives have been running in the teeth of the wind, and which way to turn they do not know. Some of them may be here this morning, and I address them face to face, not perfunctorily, but as one brother talks to another brother: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee."

First: There are a great many men who have business burdens. When we see a man harried and perplexed and annoyed in business life, we are apt to say: "He ought not to have attempted to carry so much." Ah! that man may not be to blame at all. When a man plants a business he does not know what will be its outgrowths, what will be its roots, what will be its branches. There is many a man with keen foresight and large business faculty who has been flung into the dust by unforeseen circumstances springing upon him from ambush. When to buy, when to sell, when to trust, and to what amount of credit, what will be the effect of this new invention of machinery, what will be the effect of that loss of crop, and a thousand other questions perplex business men, until the hair is silvered and deep wrinkles are plowed in the cheek; and the stocks go up by the mountains and go down by the valleys, and they are at their wits' ends, and stagger like drunken men.

There never has been a time when there have been such rivalries in business as now. It is hardware against hardware, books against books, chandlery against chandlery, imported article against imported article. A thousand stores in combat with another thousand stores. Never such advantage of light, never such variety of assortment, never so much splendor of show window, never so much adroitness of salesmen, never so much acuteness of advertising, and amid all these severities of rivalry in business, how many men break down! Oh, the burden on the shoulder! Oh, the burden on the heart! You hear that it is avarice which drives these men of business through the street, and that is the commonly accepted idea. I do not believe a word of it. The vast multitude of these business men are toiling on for others. To educate their children, to put the wing of protection over their households, to have something left so when they pass out of this life their wives and children will not have to go to the poor-house—that is the way I translate this energy in the street and store—the vast majority of that energy. Grip, Gouge & Co., do not do all the business. Some of us remember when the Central America was coming home from California, it was wrecked. President Arthur's father-in-law was the heroic captain of that ship, and went down with most of the passengers. Some of them got off into life-boats, but there was a young man returning from California who had a bag of gold in his hand; and as the last boat shoved off from the ship that was to go down, that man shouted to a comrade in the boat, "Here, John, catch this gold; there are three thousand dollars; take it home to my old mother, it will make her comfortable in her last days." Grip, Gouge & Co. do not do all the business of the world. Ah! my friend, do you say that God does not care anything about your worldly business? I tell you God knows more about it than you do. He knows all your perplexities; he knows what mortgagee is about to foreclose; he knows what note you cannot pay; he knows what unsalable goods you have on your shelves; he knows all your trials, from the day you took hold of the first yard-stick, down to the sale of the last yard of ribbon, and the God who helped David to be king, and who helped Daniel to be prime-minister, and who helped Havelock to be a soldier will help you to discharge all your duties. He is going to see you through. When loss comes, and you find your property going, just take this Book and put it down by your ledger, and read of the eternal possessions that will come to you through our Lord Jesus Christ. And when your business partner betrays you, and your friends turn against you, just take the insulting letter, put it down on the table, put your Bible beside the insulting letter, and then read of the friendship of him who "sticketh closer than a brother."

A young accountant in New York City got his accounts entangled. He knew he was honest, and yet he could not make his accounts come out right, and he toiled at them day and night until he was nearly frenzied. It seemed by those books that something had been misappropriated, and he knew before God he was honest. The last day came. He knew if he could not that day make his accounts come out right, he would go into disgrace and go into banishment from the business establishment. He went over there very early, before there was anybody in the place, and he knelt down at the desk and said: "Oh, Lord, thou knowest I have tried to be honest, but I cannot make these things come out right! Help me to-day—help me this morning!" The young man arose, and hardly knowing why he did so, opened a book that lay on the desk, and there was a leaf containing a line of figures which explained everything. In other words, he cast his burden upon the Lord, and the Lord sustained him. Young man, do you hear that? Oh, yes, God has a sympathy with anybody that is in any kind of toil! He knows how heavy is the load of bricks that the workman carries up the ladder of the wall; he hears the pickaxe of the miner down in the coal shaft; he knows how strong the tempest strikes the sailor at mast-head; he sees the factory girl among the spindles, and knows how her arms ache; he sees the sewing woman in the fourth story, and knows how few pence she gets for making a garment; and louder than all the din and roar of the city comes the voice of a sympathetic God: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee."

Second: There are a great many who have a weight of persecution and abuse upon them. Sometimes society gets a grudge against a man. All his motives are misinterpreted and his good deeds are depreciated. With more virtue than some of the honored and applauded, he runs only against rilleries and sharp criticism. When a man begins to go down, he has not only the force of natural gravitation, but a hundred hands to help him in the precipitation. Men are persecuted for their virtues and their successes. Germanicus said he had just as many bitter antagonists as he had adornments. The character sometimes is so lustrous that the weak eyes of envy and jealousy cannot bear to look at it. It was their integrity that put Joseph in the pit, and Daniel in the den, and Shadrach in the fire, and sent John the Evangelist to desolate Patmos, and Calvin to the castle of persecution, and John Huss to the stake, and Korah after Moses, and Saul after David, and Herod after Christ. Be sure if you have anything to do for church or state, and you attempt it with all your soul, the lightning will strike you.

The world always has had a cross between two thieves for the one who comes to save it. High and holy enterprise has always been followed by abuse. The most sublime tragedy of self-sacrifice has come to burlesque. The graceful gait of virtue is always followed by grimace and travesty. The sweetest strain of poetry ever written has come to ridiculous parody, and as long as there are virtue and righteousness in the world, there will be something for iniquity to grin at. All along the line of the ages, and in all lands, the cry has been:

"Not this man, but Barabbas. Now, Barabbas was a robber." And what makes the persecutions of life worse, is that they come from people whom you have helped, from those to whom you have loaned money or have started in business, or whom you rescued in some great crisis. I think it has been the history of all our lives—the most acrimonious assault has come from those whom we have benefited, whom we have helped, and that makes it all the harder to bear. A man is in danger of becoming cynical.

"CATCH THIS GOLD."

A clergyman of the Universalist Church went into a neighborhood for the establishment of a church of his denomination, and he was anxious to find some one of that denomination, and he was pointed to a certain house, and went there. He said to the man of the house: "I understand you are a Universalist; I want you to help me in the enterprise." "Well," said the man, "I am a Universalist, but I have a peculiar kind of Universalism." "What is that?" asked the minister. "Well," replied the other, "I have been out in the world, and I have been cheated and slandered and outraged and abused until I believe in universal damnation!" The great danger is that men will become cynical and given to believe, as David was tempted to say, that all men are liars. Oh, my friends, do not let that be the effect upon your souls! If you cannot endure a little persecution, how do you think our fathers endured great persecution? Motley, in his Dutch Republic, tells us of Egmont, the martyr, who, condemned to be beheaded, unfastened his collar on the way to the scaffold; and when they asked him why he did that, he said: "So they will not be detained in their work; I want to be ready." Oh, how little we have to endure compared with those who have gone before us!

Now, if you have come across ill-treatment, let me tell you you are in excellent company—Christ and Luther and Galileo and Columbus and John Jay and Josiah Quincy and thousands of men and women, the best spirits of earth and heaven. Budge not one inch, though all hell wreak upon you its vengeance, and you be made a target for devils to shoot at. Do you not think Christ knows all about persecution? Was he not hissed at? Was he not struck on the cheek? Was he not pursued all the days of his life? Did they not expectorate upon him? Or, to put it in Bible language, "They spit upon him." And cannot he understand what persecution is? "Cast thy burden upon the Lord and he shall sustain thee."

Third: There are others who carry great burdens of physical ailments. When sudden sickness has come, and fierce cholera and malignant fevers take the castles of life by storm, we appeal to God; but in these chronic ailments which wear out the strength day after day, and week after week, and year after year, how little resorting to God for solace! Then people depend upon their tonics and their plasters and their cordials rather than upon heavenly stimulants. Oh, how few people there are completely well! Some of you, by dint of perseverance and care, have kept living to this time; but how you have had to war against physical ailments! Antediluvians, without medical college and infirmary and apothecary shop, multiplied their years by hundreds; but he who has gone through the gauntlet of disease in our time, and has come to seventy years of age, is a hero worthy of a palm.

The world seems to be a great hospital, and you run against rheumatisms and consumptions and scrofulas and neuralgias and scores of old diseases baptized by new nomenclature. Oh, how heavy a burden sickness is! It takes the color out of the sky and the sparkle out of the wave and the sweetness out of the fruit and the lustre out of the night. When the limbs ache, when the respiration is painful, when the mouth is hot, when the ear roars with unhealthy obstructions, how hard it is to be patient and cheerful and assiduous! "Cast thy burden upon the Lord." Does your head ache? His wore the thorn. Do your feet hurt? His were crushed of the spikes. Is your side painful? His was struck by the spear. Do you feel like giving way under the burden? His weakness gave way under a cross. While you are in every possible way to try to restore your physical vigor, you are to remember that more soothing than any anodyne, and more vitalizing than any stimulant, and more strengthening than any tonic is the prescription of the text: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee." We hear a great deal of talk now about faith cure, and some people say it cannot be done and it is a failure. I do not know but that the chief advance of the church is to be in that direction. Marvellous things come to me day by day which make me think that if the age of miracles is past, it is because the faith of miracles is past.

A prominent merchant of New York said to a member of my family: "My mother wants her case mentioned to Mr. Talmage." This was the case. He said: "My mother had a dreadful abscess, from which she had suffered untold agonies, and all surgery had been exhausted upon her, and worse and worse she grew until we called in a few Christian friends and proceeded to pray about it. We commended her case to God and the abscess began immediately to be cured. She is entirely well now, and without knife and without any surgery." So that case has come to me, and there are a score of other cases coming to our ears from all parts of the earth. Oh, ye who are sick, go to Christ! Oh, ye who are worn out with agonies of body, "cast thy burden upon the Lord and he shall sustain thee!"

A fourth burden some have to carry is the burden of bereavement. Ah! these are the troubles that wear us out. If we lose our property, by additional industry, perhaps, we may bring back the estranged fortune; if we lose our good name, perhaps by reformation of morals we may achieve again reputation for integrity; but who will bring back the dear departed? Alas! me for these empty cradles and these trunks of childish toys that will never be used again. Alas! me for the empty chair and the silence in the halls that will never echo again to those familiar footsteps. Alas! for the cry of widowhood and orphanage. What bitter Marahsin the wilderness, what cities of the dead, what long black shadow from the wing of death, what eyes sunken with grief, what hands tremulous with bereavement, what instruments of music shut now because there are no fingers to play on them! Is there no relief for such souls? Ay, let the soul ride into the harbor of my text.

A MOTHER'S TREASURES.

The soul that on Jesus hath leaned for repose,
I will not, I will not desert to its foes;
That soul, though all hell shall endeavor to shake,
I'll never, no never, no never forsake.

Now, the grave is brighter than the ancient tomb where the lights were perpetually kept burning. The scarred feet of him who was "the resurrection and the life" are on the broken grave hillock, while the voices of angels ring down the sky at the coronation of another soul come home to glory.

Then there are many who carry the burden of sin. Ah, we all carry it until in the appointed way that burden is lifted. We need no Bible to prove that the whole race is ruined. What a spectacle it would be if we could tear off the mask of human defilement, or beat a drum that would bring up the whole army of the world's transgressions—the deception, the fraud and the rapine and the murder and the crime of all the centuries! Ay, if I could sound the trumpet of resurrection in the soul of the best men in this audience, and all the dead sins of the past should come up, we could not endure the sight. Sin, grim and dire, has put its clutch upon the immortal soul, and that clutch will never relax unless it be under the heel of him who came to destroy the works of the devil.

Oh, to have a mountain of sin on the soul! Is there no way to have the burden moved? O, yes. "Cast thy burden upon the Lord." The sinless One came to take the consequences of our sin! And I know he is in earnest. How do I know it? By the streaming temples and the streaming hands as he says, "Come unto me all ye who are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Why will prodigals live cr. swines' husks when the robe and the ring and the father's welcome are ready? Why go wandering over the great Sahara Desert of your sin when you are invited to the gardens of God, the trees of life, and the fountains of living water? Why be houseless and homeless forever when you may become the sons and daughters of the Lord God Almighty?

TWO BACKSLIDERS RESTORED.

ONE of those singular instances of unexpected blessing which are sometimes described as accidental or again as remarkable coincidences was witnessed at Johnson Street Methodist Episcopal Church, Brooklyn, on May 29. A few days before, a gentleman and his wife registered at a hotel on Fulton Street. They were apparently English people, but the address on the hotel register showed they were from Denver, Colo. They had but a short time to stay as they had engaged passage on a steamer sailing for Liverpool on May 30. The hotel-keeper took an interest in his guests and told them of the services in Johnson Street Church which Mr. Cannon, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Evangelist was holding. He urged them to attend the service on Friday night which was the last night they were to spend in America. They took his advice and were among the throng in the church when Mr. Cannon rose to speak. Before the close of the meeting both were deeply affected. Mr. Cannon noticed them and at the conclusion of his address entered into conversation with them. They were evidently under deep conviction of sin. Before going to Denver they had attended the means of grace and had been members of a Christian Church; but in Denver they had given up their religious profession and had drifted into the world. They had even given up attending church, abandoned private prayer, and had become altogether worldly. Under the Holy Spirit's influence they saw themselves to be backsliders and in the words of the prophet said: "Come let us return unto the Lord." Mr. Cannon had the delightful task of assuring them that if they sincerely repented and turned earnestly to the Lord, he would welcome them as the Prodigal Son was welcomed. Both went up to the altar and there confessed their sin and pleaded for forgiveness. When they rose, it was with new joy in their hearts—the joy that comes from a consciousness of restoration to God's favor. The next day they sailed for England thanking God that in his Providence they had been led back to him.

A TEMPLE OF RESCUE.

NEW YORK TO HAVE THE LARGEST MISSION BUILDING IN THE WORLD.

Presented to St. Bartholomew's Church by Cornelius Vanderbilt and his Mother—Rector Greer's Good Work—Superintendent Hadley's Army of the Rescued—Wonderful Conversions—A Great Philanthropic Agency.

WITHIN the next four months, there will be completed and dedicated in New York City the finest mission building in the world. It is located on East Forty-second street, near Third avenue, and is to be denominated the Parish House of St. Bartholomew's Church. The land was purchased by Cornelius Vanderbilt, and, with the excavation, cost $75,000. The building (an illustration of which appears on the first page), is being erected by his mother, Mrs. W. H. Vanderbilt, at a cost of $225,000. Added to this will be a concert organ to cost about $9,900, also presented by Cornelius Vanderbilt.

The style of the building is Romanesque, and it is fire-proof throughout. It covers an area of size 75 x 100 feet, and it is six stories high. The basement will be used for a restaurant, and lavatories and a free laundry for the poor. The first or street floor from the main entrance is the Rescue Mission room, which will seat one thousand persons, and on the same floor will be a chapel seating about two hundred, the offices of the assistant ministers of St. Bartholomew, a Savings Bank for poor boys, and the Superintendent's office. The second floor will have a large Sunday School room, seating sixteen hundred, while the upper floors will be used for Mothers' Meetings, Cooking Schools for Women, and Free Sewing Schools, where material and instruction will be furnished. Gynasiums and club rooms, reading-rooms and other attractions will be added to win from the saloons. The whole will be managed under the auspices of St. Bartholomew's Church, the Rescue Mission being under the superintendency of Colonel Henry H. Hadley, who established and now conducts the St. Bartholomew's Rescue Mission, at No. 158 East Forty-second street.

The Swarm of the East Side

A grand work has already been accomplished by St. Bartholomew's Rescue Mission. Among the wealthy people of New York there are many who take pleasure in doing God's work in secret, and the congregation of St. Bartholomew's Church embraces many rich members who have extended a helping hand to the Mission in the past. The initial expenses of this Mission—some $7,500—were borne by Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt. Under Rev. David H. Greer's pastoral charge, the church has been singularly energetic in Mission work. It has a Fresh Air Fund, a Syrian Mission, a Swedish Mission, a Chinese Guild, and other Christian philanthropies; but most notable in the extent of its religious work and the wonderful effects it has produced on the vicious resorts of the neighborhood, is the Rescue Mission. Colonel Hadley, the Superintendent is a native of Ohio, fifty years of age, and a descendant of the celebrated Jonathan Edwards. He was a gallant soldier during the war, but became an abject slave to strong drink. He studied law and was admitted to practice in 1875. During many years, his life was a constant struggle to break away from the curse that held him in bondage. Several years ago, he helped to establish the "Business Men's Society for the Encouragement of Moderation," believing that, if he could confine his libations to "moderate drinking," he might be safe. Soon he discovered he was trusting to a fallacy. A famous artist, who was his drinking companion, dropped dead suddenly after an unusually heavy debauch. This and the recollection of a mother's prayers and the example of a godly brother, brought Col. Hadley to the resolution of living without drink altogether. He was shortly afterwards converted at the McCauley Mission, and since that time has been released from the temptation. He felt that God had for a higher purpose, and his later life has been devoted to the organization of Rescue Missions in New York, New Jersey, Connecticut and elsewhere. To none has so much blessing been given as to the St. Bartholomew's Rescue Mission, where, with the aid of Rev. Robert C. Booth and Rev. Alford A. Butler, Assistant Ministers of St. Bartholomew's, he has been instrumental in rescuing hundreds from the slavery of sin and debased appetite, and starting them anew in the Christian life.

In the immediate neighborhood of the Mission is a dense population of about 200,000, many of whom never enter a church. Low as well as palatial grogeries and vicious resorts abound in the district, and it is a common sight to witness the desecration of the Sabbath by boisterous drunkards on the public street. To the reformation of this godless class the efforts of the Mission have been mainly directed. On Friday nights, the hall of the Mission is crowded to its utmost capacity, and conversions have been numerous. Old, hoary-headed drunkards, and men who have gone from idleness to sin until their reformation seemed hopeless, stand up, and, with bowed heads, cry out to God for mercy. In a city of it is not surprising that there should be many who know as little about God and salvation as the savages whom Stanley met on the Congo.

Ten Thousand Whiskey Shops,

One extraordinary case is related by Supt. Hadley—that of a man named Otto Schraeder, who came into the Mission during a debauch, and while apparently suffering from delirium tremens during the services, he fell on his knees and joined in prayers. He arose a changed man, with resolution on his face, sober and strong. Schraeder's conversion took place two years ago and he has never backslidden.

The number of worshippers who can date their new start in life from these meetings is much larger than in ordinary congregations. In an average gathering of one hundred, as many as thirty will rise and come forward for prayer. In a single week, during which 948 have attended these meetings, 194 have professed a change of heart and made a start in the better life.

Naturally, the question will be asked what becomes of the thousands who, during the year, are so influenced by this mission work? Col. Hadley, Rev. Dr. Greer, Rev. Mr. Booth and others, have endeavored, as far as possible, to keep track of those who confess Christ at the Rescue Mission and are satisfied that, while many undoubtedly backslide, fully thirty out of every hundred who start sincerely remain true to their new allegiance. The first thing a new convert at St. Bartholomew's Mission does is to and drop all acquaintance with the saloons. If he has left home or wife he returns to them and seeks regular employment. Most important of all in this work of permanent reformation is the regular attendance at the meetings.

"I have never known a man to fall back who attended and testified frequently," says the Superintendent.

Both Col. Hadley and his brother Samuel Hopkins Hadley, now Superintendent of the old Jerry McCauley Water Street Mission, are striking examples of the power of God's grace in turning men from the old, sinful life and choosing them as instruments for the spread of the Gospel. Among the many hundreds of interesting cases constantly arising in St. Bartholomew's Rescue Mission, a few may be mentioned here to illustrate the character of the work. One Saturday evening, a man entered just as the meeting was closing. Stepping up to the Superintendent, he said:

"You've forgotten me, I suppose?"

"Yes," said Colonel Hadley, somewhat puzzled, as he looked at the well-dressed newcomer, who might have been a broker or merchant.

"Well, my name is ———. Just eight months ago, I came here in a terrible condition and asked for prayers. You not only prayed with me, but

Loaned me a Quarter

and gave me some clothing, for I was not fit to be seen. I have not been here since that night, but now I felt it a duty to come here and thank you. God has prospered me, and now, if you can use my cast-off clothing for some poor fellow who is in the same old boat that I was in, I will send them here."

This was gratitude! He did not stop at sending the cast-off clothing, but testified to his heart's fullness by doing much more.

Mr. B——, a circus man, profane and rough, like most men of his calling and utterly godless, entered the Mission one night a year ago. It was a strange experience for him, and he does not yet know why he came in, save that it must have been the Spirit that led him. On leaving, that night, he felt impelled to throw up his situation. He was just going to start out on the road, but he could not take up the old life, with all its rowdiness and blasphemies. He found work in the city and is now a Christian and a constant attendant at the meetings. He is assisting the good work at the West Forty-second street Mission.

One of the most remarkable examples of those released from the bondage of sin is that of William Potter, a drunkard and rowdy, who, hearing that Bishop Potter was to speak at the Mission, came with two wicked companions with the design of breaking up the meeting. His companions were ejected; but he, being lame, was allowed to stay. He was converted, and three days later professed a change of heart. Potter is now the janitor of the Mission building and has undergone a complete transformation since his conversion.

Mr. M——, a confirmed drunkard, found peace and joy and lost all appetite for liquor. Mr. B——, a sinner and Sabbath-breaker, had a disagreeable experience after professing Christ, his comrades laughing at him and mockingly calling him the "Christian Boy"; but he has never gone back. Mr. L—— was ruined by alcohol. He was the son of rich parents, was expelled from college for drunkenness, married, and had a good business; but his wife died broken-hearted, his business vanished and his two children now fill two little graves. Liquor was

His Solace and his Curse!

He had been confined in sixteen inebriate asylums and had travelled over forty thousand miles, endeavoring to rid himself of the vile appetite. Eight months ago, at St. Bartholomew's Mission, he gave his heart to God, and since that moment has not had the desire for drink.

A Swede had a bad reputation at home, and came here to redeem himself, but he sunk lower than ever. He travelled all over the Union and squandered a fortune in drunkenness and sin. He lost home and friends and was reduced to desperation, when the light broke in on him at the Mission services one evening, and he is now working faithfully and contributing liberally for Christ's cause. Baron Von W——, had squandered a fortune of ten million marks in gambling and sin. He was on the verge of suicide when, attracted by the singing at the Mission, he came in and found forgiveness.

The Mission is now in its third year. During the last year 44,080 persons have attended the services, of whom 5,666 have been inquirers, coming forward and asking for prayers. Almost all were drunkards and many had been living lives of crime. Thirty per cent. are now believed to be redeemed men and women.

About 200 have been supplied with permanent work, through the direct efforts of the Mission, and others have been put at temporary employment.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Acid Instead of Anodyne—A Train Stopped by Bees—A Fatal Patient—A Man who Bought His Own Family.

N Error of a Clerk in a drug-store occasioned serious injury to an invalid in New York on June 1. About a year ago a lady who was suffering from acute rheumatism consulted a physician who prescribed a compound chloroform liniment for her. He told her to always keep a bottle of it in the house and use it whenever the pain returned. She did so and found relief from its use. As the bottle was emptied she sent it to be re-filled. She had occasion to do this on June 1. The child whom she sent on the errand took the bottle to the store as usual and brought it back full. The lady applied the liniment as she had been in the habit of doing, but instead of giving her the customary relief it burned her severely. She showed the remainder of the liniment to the physician, whom she sent for to dress the burn, and when he examined it he found that the bottle had been filled with carbolic acid instead of the chloroform liniment. It must have been a cruel disappointment to the sufferer to have sustained an increase of pain when she was expecting relief. There are some sufferers from spiritual maladies who are similarly disappointed. Although the Great Physician prescribes for all such the comforting words of love and tenderness, too often those who should administer them wound the sufferer by harsh reproof and censure. (Gal. 6: 1)

Bees were able to Stop a Train and Cause a suspension of traffic on the Pennsylvania Railroad on June 3. While a freight train was passing a farm a short distance above Huntingdon, Pa., on that day, an immense swarm of bees settled in the cab of the engine. The engineer and fireman continued at their posts for some time, hoping that the swarm would vacate the cab; but as it remained, they shut off the steam and leaped off the engine. Men were sent back to signal approaching trains, and in the course of an hour a long line of freight cars with their locomotives stood waiting. In the meantime the owner of the bees was sent for, and when he was found the bees were got out and traffic was resumed. That such puny and insignificant creatures could bring the business of a great railroad to a standstill is an illustration of the power of little things in the world. There are many deplorable instances of the same power in spiritual matters, but none so sad as that which is often witnessed of some church work, or beneficent philanthropic enterprise being halted by petty jealousies and personal quarrels. (Canticles, 2: 15).

Tragic Coincidences in the Death of Three physicians were reported in the New York Tribune on June 2. It states that the Manhattan Eye and Ear Hospital has among its out-door patients a lady who is known as "the fatal patient." Her first visit was nearly two years ago, when she presented herself for treatment for chronic catarrh. She was assigned to Cabinet D, in which diseases of the throat and nose are treated. The patient was attended to by Dr. Johnson who at that time had charge of the Cabinet. Two days after treating her Dr. Johnson died suddenly. Six months passed before the lady came again and she was then treated by Dr. Pond who had succeeded Dr. Johnson in Cabinet D. Two days afterward Dr. Pond died of heart-failure. This second death caused some comment in the hospital and when Cabinet D. was placed under the care of Dr. David Phillips he was humorously advised to beware of "the fatal patient." On May 27, she appeared again and Dr. Phillips treated her. Early the next morning he was found dead in bed. A Tribune reporter who called at the hospital on June 1, to verify the report said that he supposed the lady would not find any physician willing to attend to her case if she appeared again. The officials replied that the lady had been there that morning and had been promptly operated upon by a physician who knew all the facts about the deaths of his three predecessors in Cabinet D. It would not have been surprising if the reporter's expectation had proved correct. This fourth physician is evidently not superstitious, and if he suspected any subtle connection between her disease and the deaths of the three physicians, he braved it that he might do her good. Those who admire his courage and devotion should be reminded by it of the unspeakable love of the Great Physician who voluntarily laid down his life to save the world. (John 15: 13.)

Music as a Therapeutical Agent is Recommended by the Lancet, the leading medical journal. It declares that certain states of insanity should find some part of their treatment in the hands of the musician. Music, it says, is a tonic, and any one can perceive its power by watching its effect on a healthy man who is tired or worried. It helps the jaded brain to recover its poise by energizing the languid nerve-control of the circulation and strengthening the heart-beat. What music does for the jaded brain, it will do for the brain in forced irritation, bringing rest and diversion to the fretting mind. This is not a new discovery. When King Saul was troubled by an evil spirit, David was set to play the harp before him, and "Saul was refreshed and was well." The same Book that tells us of that recovery tells us also of a means of prevention, which is always better than a remedy. The fretfulness and irritation and worry which induce insanity are avoided by the man who puts his trust in God; for God "will keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on him, because he trusteth in him." (Isa., 26: 3.)

A Man who Bought his own Family Died in Charleston, S. C., on May 25. He was born in slavery, and was married while still a slave. In some way he risked his life to render a valuable service to his owner, who was a very kind-hearted man, and rewarded his slave by giving him his freedom. He found work in a butcher's shop in the nearest town, worked hard, and saved money. After a time the butcher died, and the freedman succeeded him in the business. He lived just as frugally as before and continued to accumulate money. He took no pleasure, employed no help, but worked early and late. Why he was saving money was disclosed in 1862. His former owner was killed in the war and all his property was sold. The freedman went to the sale, for some of the lots were his wife and children. If he could buy them they would be free, but if anyone outbid him they would be slaves. The man's anxiety, as each one was put up was intense, and not less was the anxiety of the particular "lot." At the close of the sale he was the owner of them all, and he had given all his money, amounting to $5,400, for them. The sum had been the result of years of hard work and self-privation, but he was delighted to sacrifice it for his family. They lived to enjoy their freedom together until the husband and father died. If that wife had been unfaithful, or the children undutiful to the man who had toiled for years to redeem them, all who knew the circumstances would have despised them. Yet, when men whom Christ redeemed at the cost of his life are mindful of their obligations to him they are often stigmatized as narrow-minded and fanatical, and as the prophet said, "he that departeth from evil is accounted mad." (Isa., 59: 15).

A Child's Concern for the Cleanliness of her doll has led to the loss of her life. Two weeks ago a house was burned in Brooklyn, N. Y. Not much of the family's property was saved, but among the salvage was a doll belonging to the little three-year old daughter. The smoke had blackened the doll's face and the child was very disconsolate about it. She tried washing it at a pump in the street, but it was a difficult thing for so small a child to do and the doll's face remained smutty. The child cried herself to sleep that night, and the next morning she renewed her efforts. She was missed later in the day and could not be found, though a general search was made in which the police assisted. The father had occasion to go down into his cellar that night and he noticed a high chair standing beside a large tub of water, which was always kept there. A vague terror seized him and he turned the tub over. The water ran out over the cellar floor and with it the dead body of his child. She had been leaning over the edge of the tub to wash her doll's face, and had over-balanced. The poor child had her doll still tightly clutched in her dead hands when she was found. It is a pity that the child should have been so anxious to do the cleansing herself. She should have asked her mother to do it for her. Parents who are distressed about the pollution of their children may take a hint from her case. Their hope for the reclamation and sanctification of their children lies in their Heavenly Father to whom they should commit the case. (Hosea 13: 4.)

A Disconsolate Immigrant Committed Suicide in New York, last week. In his native town in Germany he became engaged to a beautiful girl whom he urged to marry him. She would not do so then, as she and her family were coming to America, but she intimated if he would come, too, and get employment so as to be able to maintain her, she would marry him. He threw up his lucrative position in Germany and followed her. On his arrival he was unable to obtain work, and finally, finding nothing better to do he became janitor of a public school. The girl refused to marry him, as she had other suitors in better positions. Then the man returned to Germany and resumed his former occupation. After a year he received a letter from the girl, who had quarrelled with her new lovers, telling him that if he would come back she would marry him. He promptly crossed the ocean but by that time the girl had made up her quarrel and declined to marry him unless he could find suitable employment. He did his utmost to get work, but failed. Then the girl told him finally that he must give her up, for she was to be married the next week to a bank-clerk. This broke him down completely and in his despair he killed himself. His infatuation must have blinded him to the true character of the girl or he would have been glad at his escape, instead of being driven to despair by her rejection of him. Many who would despise him are guilty of similar folly. In the race for wealth and fame and power they who succeed as well as they who fail discover when it is too late that neither has brought them the happiness they expected, (Eccles 2: 11.)

CAPTIVITY OF JUDAH.

S. S. LESSON FOR JUNE 21, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
II. KINGS, 25: 1-12. GOLDEN TEXT, HOSEA, 6: 1.

Sin Cherished Turns to Chastisement—God's Law of Retribution—The Tyranny of the Pampered Appetite—Eleven Years of Wrongdoing—The King's Oath Broken—A Desperate Irremediable Condition—Judah Pre-eminent in Abomination—The Innocent Involved in the Calamity.

HE sins which we tamper with become our jailers. Our own way, when we seek it, rather than God's way, becomes a prison-house to us; we cannot escape from it when we would. Israel and Judah had played with idolatry, and coquetted with the heathen nations; they had adopted heathen customs and heathen worship; and now, by way of just retribution, they were delivered into the hands of the heathen, and forced to do what before they did by choice. "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." The same rule holds good with nations. In Israel, it might be unpopular to worship the true God, but the children of Israel and of Judah were not compelled to worship idols. The time was at hand when in Babylon to refuse to fall down before the golden image which Nebuchadnezzar had set up meant an awful death in the fiery furnace; a refusal to comply with the law of Darius, prohibiting any prayer to God or man for thirty days (Dan. 6: 6-9), meant the horrible torture of being torn limb from limb in the lion's den.

God's Law of Retribution

is one which men would do well to study. Who has not seen a man tampering with drink, believing in his own power of self-control, priding himself on the strength of his will, until, unconsciously to himself, the tables are turned, and the dangerous foe with which he has trifled has become his most tyrannical master? He would be free, but he cannot, God has delivered him into the hands of his enemy, and he is "holden with the cords of his sins." There are some who amuse themselves with some secret sin which cannot bear the light of day, or who indulge secretly in some narcotic which they proudly imagine to be a slave to their will. But by and by the thing of darkness places a firm, relentless hold upon their will; and before they are aware, that will is paralyzed and they are slaves. The history of Israel's and Judah's captivity is but a type and sample of the history of many an immortal soul. Judah and Jerusalem had filled up the measure of their iniquity. The king Zedekiah, the priests, prophets and people had sinned against their God. For eleven years God had borne with this last of the house of David, but "Zedekiah did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord his God, and before Jeremiah the prophet, speaking from the mouth of the Lord." He also dragged the name of God peculiarly into reproach in breaking his covenant with Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon who "had made him swear by God." The king of Babylon expected that a covenant made in the name of the God of Israel would be inviolable. Had it come to pass that the successor to David's throne, the king of all the kings on the earth who was trusted to reign over the people of the Lord, should break a covenant entered into in his name? "Shall he prosper? Shall he escape that doeth such things? Or shall he break the covenant and be delivered?" (Ezek. 17: 15.) King Zedekiah stiffened his neck, and hardened his heart from turning to the Lord God of Israel. The priests followed the king's example—with the people, and they "polluted the house of the Lord which he had hallowed in Jerusalem." And then God "sent to them by his messengers . . . because he had compassion on his people and on his dwelling-place. But they mocked the messengers of God, and despised his words, and misused his prophets, until the wrath of God arose against his people, till there was

Humbled not Himself

No Remedy."

When God says there is no remedy, things have come to the last extremity with a man, a church, a nation. If God's resources are at an end, the case is hopeless. Thus it was with Judah at this time, there remained nothing "but a fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation." A man has reached a fearful pass when the evil spirit has gone out of him, and, finding rest nowhere else, returns to find the house empty, instead of being occupied with God, and then brings "seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there, and the last state of that man is worse than the first." (Matt. 12: 43-45.) A nation which has been called to give light to the world and to be "the glory of all lands" has reached a fearful pass when the light which is in her has become darkness. Judah's sin was such, at this time, that she justified the wicked cities of Sodom and Samaria by the excess of her own sin! "Thine elder sister is Samaria . . . and thy younger sister . . . is Sodom . . . but thou hast multiplied thine abominations more than they, and hast

Justified thy Sisters

in all thine abominations which thou hast done." (Ezek. 16: 46, 51.) For one year and a half, Jerusalem was besieged by the king of Babylon. During this time, Jeremiah brought message after message from his God, urging the stubborn people to accept the punishment of their iniquity, to capitulate and allow themselves to be carried away captive to Babylon. O how many on whom God has been obliged to let judgment fall, because he has not succeeded in subduing them unto himself any other way, have become the prisoners of the Lord as soon as they have submitted to him! It was as sad for Daniel and his friends as for others of their countrymen when the famine in the city forced the inhabitants to surrender, when "the city was broken up," when their king was tried by a Babylonish court-martial, and his sons were slain before his eyes, and then his own eyes were put out. It cost these young men of God as much as it cost others when the walls of Jerusalem were broken down, and when the house of the Lord, the king's palace, and the houses of the nobles, were burnt with fire—and yet these young men were the

Prisoners of Jehovah.

With them in the land of their captivity was the presence of their God; they were his witnesses there as much as in their own land. Practically, they were not captives under Nebuchadnezzar, but under God. They had charmed lives, for God's consent must be obtained before death could touch them. When, in his tyrannical fury, Nebuchadnezzar commanded the execution of all the wise men, and all the students of Babylon, the young men, who took their captivity from God's hand, escaped, and delivered all the wise men in Babylon with them, because they carried their cause to him. When the king decreed that three of them who refused to worship his image should be executed in the burning fiery furnace, God made them proof against earthly elements by the impenetrable shield of his own presence, visible even to the heathen.

As soon as God's children deal with him about their captivity, they are at once the prisoners of the Lord. Joseph of old could see something more than Potiphar's hand in placing him in imprisonment, he was at large in spirit "because the Lord was with him." O, there is mercy in all the severity of God: his chastening, when we fret against it, becomes intolerable; but the same chastening, accepted from his hand, irrespective of the prisons or circumstances, the physical or financial condition through which it may come, changes at once the nature of the trial. The oppression of man is turned into the lessons of God, the weakness of body is turned into an opportunity for the power of Christ to rest upon us, the thwarting of our plans becomes a chance to surrender them all before the absolute wisdom of our unerring God, and so the whole ground is changed; it is divine, not human; heavenly, not earthly. In the course of our life's journey, all of us know what it is to be prisoners, held by this, chained by that, restrained by the other thing. We none of us do what we think we would under other circumstances. But are we the prisoners of sin or of the Lord? Of circumstances or of the Lord? Of man or of the Lord? Whose hand do we see shutting us in? Who has the key of our prison house? With whom do we deal about the circumstances in which we are placed? Are we looking at things from above, as Jeremiah did, who recognized his God in all, or are we struggling from beneath as Zedekiah did, until he forced God to augment his suffering and shame to the very utmost?

Let us learn never to resist God, and never to ignore God, in the things which he permits. He ordained that his favored land should be desolate until the land had enjoyed her Sabbaths; for as long as she lay desolate she kept Sabbath "to fulfil three score and ten years." (11. Chron. 36: 21.) There may be a need for Sabbath keeping, for lying fallow, in the life of some who read these pages.

A NATION'S MADNESS.

A Story of the S. S. Lesson for June 21. "The Captivity of Judah."

LOSING his Bible with a sigh, a boy of some fourteen years of age, looked up to find his father watching him. "Studying your Sunday-School lesson, my boy?" the father asked.

"Yes, I have been trying to do so, father."

"Can't make much of it apparently?"

"Well, no father. Bible history seems so different from all other history."

"In what way?"

"Well, in the Bible, everything seems to turn on the people's religion. If the king and people 'did evil in the sight of the Lord' punishment was sure to come upon them. Jerusalem was besieged and the people carried away prisoners because the king and people were wicked, and a few Sundays ago, we were taught that Samaria was besieged and the same thing happened for the same cause. In the histories we read at the day-schools it does not seem to make any difference. If a nation went down it was not because it was wicked but because some other nation with a bigger army or a better general attacked it. One can understand that. It seems as if God did not interfere any more."

"Or that we do not trace his interference now as they did in old time. Perhaps that is the reason."

"But he don't seem to interfere. It's all natural in our histories. We know why Rome fell and why Greece sank and why Frederick the Great and Napoleon won their battles and why Germany beat France. It is all simple enough. It would look mighty strange in our history to read that the Lord saw that the people of France were wicked and he sent the King of Prussia and Bismarck and Moltke against them. God had nothing to do with that."

"I am not so sure of it. We have got into the habit of looking at natural causes in history and science and all else and ignoring God. Perhaps if our historians had been writing Bible history we should have heard about the power of the armies and their discipline and nothing about the dealings of God. Even now we can read between the lines if we choose."

"I cannot see how, father."

"Well, there are some striking instances. You were reading the other day, I noticed, about the French Revolution in the Eighteenth century. Did it not occur to you that God's hand could be recognized there?"

"No. The people were ground down and taxed while the king and his nobles lived in luxury and idleness. The people grew tired of it and when they combined, they found the king was scared of them and they realized their power and swept the king and his nobles away."

"Yes, that was a natural law of cause and effect. But just imagine yourself one of that court. You are in your beautiful house with everything pleasant about you. You have never been hard on the poor. You know that they have been cruelly oppressed. But you have never done such things, and you have been sorry for the people when they suffered like that. Now would it not have seemed very unjust to you if, when the Revolution came, the people seized you and sent you off to prison and kept you there until your turn came to go for execution to the guillotine?"

"Yes that would have been very unjust."

"So the king and queen and many of the nobles thought. They were by no means the worst set that France had seen. Their predecessors were greater sinners than they. Take a peep into one of the prisons that September night which will never be forgotten. A group of men nearly tipsy sitting as judges in the prison. A prisoner brought up—sometimes a man, sometimes a delicate lady. Looking around, the prisoner sees not a single face that does not look mad with rage and horribly blood-thirsty. What chance has any one before such a tribunal. The prisoner is charged with being an aristocrat and an oppressor of the people. If he cannot convince the crowd that he is innocent he is condemned and is executed next day. If he defends himself successfully he is set at liberty, and as he steps out of the prison into the street, a hundred arms are raised against him and he is cut in pieces. One of those men, an old white-haired man and a brave soldier who was set at liberty was joined in the corridor of the prison by his daughter, a beautiful girl of eighteen. As they emerged from the gate the people made a rush at them, and the daughter, throwing her arms around her father's neck, besought them to spare her venerable parent. But there was no mercy there. Father and daughter fell under the cruel axes and knives. Day after day the guillotine chopped off the heads of young men and old, matrons and maidens and there was no one to protest or speak in the name of justice and mercy. It was strange was it not that in all the thousands of people in Paris there were not some that feared God sufficiently to stay the slaughter?"

"Yes it was strange."

"Not to those who remember. When the French king and his nobles were in prison and wondered if the voice of reason and justice would not make itself heard in time to save their lives, how they must have wished that there were among the people of Paris some who were pious and would plead for them. And there would have been such people, but for another massacre. A predecessor of that king had sent his soldiers through Paris one August night, long before, with orders to kill every man, woman and child who professed the Protestant religion. The order was obeyed and twenty thousand of the most God-fearing people were killed. The others fled from Paris to save their lives. The worst kind of people remained. The good were killed or driven away. So when the imprisoned king, many years afterward, was looking for mercy he had to thank his predecessor for the condition of society in which there was no one left who feared God. The very element that might have saved his life, which might have allayed the wild passions of the people had been eliminated by an act of cruelty like that which overwhelmed him and his friends. There does not seem anything supernatural about it—only cause and effect. But it was a crime bearing its own fruit. That is how God rules the world as he did in old times. He has not changed. Sin in the nation or in the individual bears its fruit, and the nation or the man who does wrong cannot escape penalty. We call it natural law, but that is only another way of describing the way in which God works."

NEARING CONSUMMATION.

From an Address at a Recent Second Advent Conference in London By Rev. J. Brunton.

Y. object this morning, is to present the reasons which convince me that we are now living near the end of the Gentile dispensation, though not as it is generally called, the end of the world. Because during the succeeding new dispensation of 1,000 years, Christ and his resurrection saints will reign from heaven personally over "all peoples, nations and languages" then living on this earth. (Rev. xx; Dan. 7: 14.)

The first sign is the condition of the European Continent, or that part of the map known as the countries of Cæsar's Roman Empire, and the second sign, the condition of the Jewish nation. These signs have a great bearing on the fulfilment of prophecy, and according to standard prophetic writers, are now in the very condition that must be witnessed before the end of this age or dispensation.

The prophetic image seen in Nebuchadnezzar's vision and explained by Daniel in his second chapter, is an image illustrative of four great governmental powers succeeding each other, and as the centuries have rolled on, history has progressed and passed down from the golden head, which prefigured the Babylonian empire, and through the silver breast or Medo-Persian empire, and the brazen loins or Macedonian empire, down to the clay-iron feet and toes, which denote of the Roman empire and end of Gentile administration. If any one had said during the time of the reign of the Roman Emperors over the whole Roman Empire, which was then one and indivisible, and was emblematised by the legs of iron, that the return of Christ was at hand, the prophetic emblem itself would have shown him to be wrong. The Second Advent could not happen while the unbroken despotic iron power of the Roman Emperors existed. The Second Advent of Christ symbolized as the stone that is to smite the Image on its ten clay-iron toes cannot take place until the clay of democracy becomes mingled with the iron of royalty. It could not occur until the undiluted despotic monarchical power of the Roman Emperors was succeeded by the democratic-monarchic governments of the present century, consequent upon the democratic influence of the French Revolutions of 1793 and 1848.

The iron means an irresponsible absolute monarchical power. We have no such thing among the powers of Europe now save in Russia and Turkey. You remember what

An Eventful Year

1848 was. What was the result of it? A Democratic government sprang up in France. The contagion spread over the European kingdoms, and thenceforth a wide extension of suffrage and delegation of elective power to an increased number of voters, caused the democratic clay to become more and more mingled with the monarchical iron, so that now in France, Spain, Austria, Italy, Greece, there is elective parliamentary government.

We see the people ruled by the people—the government by the people, as symbolized in the prophetic image by the clay-iron feet and toes. Many writers have given us beautiful pictures of the state of things that will come to pass when the will of the people is carried out, and they have described it as something super-excellent. But God does not represent this democratic mode of Government as gold, but as clay—of the earth earthy. God represents Nebuchadnezzar's autocratic power as gold, and the modern democratic rule as clay-iron.

The period of the clay-iron feet began about a hundred years ago, at the epoch of the French Revolution in 1792. We have been in that mixed state called iron and clay for one hundred years. We have been passing, as it were, through the period of the feet, and are now just on the marginal brink of the ten-toes, representing the ten kingdoms that shall ere long be formed by international and revolutionary struggles within the European-African-Asiatic countries of Cæsar's old Roman Empire. Looking at the position in which we stand, all must see that we are close to the end of this age, and probably the oldest of us here, those of fifty or sixty years should they live out their allotted term, will see the Personal Second Advent of our Lord, and those who are younger are sure to be witnesses of this glorious spectacle, the sublime grandeur of which we are not able to describe.

The Jewish Persecution.

As regards the When, in reference to all these coming events—first with regard to the Jews, we have lately seen them grievously persecuted in places where they have been established for centuries. In Russia there are two millions of Jews whose position has been recently rendered absolutely insupportable, and it has come to this, that the Governments of Europe have been addressed by various petitions asking that they will move for their protection and for the protection of the Jews in Palestine that they may be given the Holy Land, which by prescriptive right belongs to their race. All this begins to fulfil the prophecies of Isaiah, Ezekiel, Jeremiah and Zechariah to the effect that at the time of the end, the Jews are to return in considerable numbers to their ancient fatherland, and that is why the Jews are persecuted and agitated everywhere. God is preparing the way; he is bringing them back to their own land from the north, south, east and west, to gather them together in the land of their fathers, which must take place before the Second Advent of Christ. Think of these things, and see in them the approaching time of the end.

What is Coming.

What are we looking for, when we see these Signs of the End? Some people have said or as good as said, that the world is going to be burnt up as a cinder at the End of this Age. We look for quite a contrary effect. It is the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, not to destroy the world, but to reign on the earth as a Millennial King for a thousand years. I cannot give in detail all the events that will take place prior to that event. But it will be preceded by a terrible time of darkness, a time when we shall need prophecy to tell us the meaning of all that happens around us; we shall need it as a light in a dark place. Among other things, that will happen, there will be the Advent of Christ "in the air," to raise from their graves the deceased saints and to translate living Christians, who are ready, to his presence in the heavens. Christ shall descend into the air at the resurrection of the dead saints as is written in 1st Thessalonians, "The Lord shall descend from heaven, and the dead in Christ shall rise first, and then, we which remain shall be caught up to meet the Lord in the air, and be for ever with the Lord."

The Glorious Reign.

There, in the atmospheric heavens, will the saints remain until Christ comes on Mount of Olives. What for? To reign upon the earth, and when he thus comes there will be the completion of his first resurrection of deceased saints. The dark picture of coming judgments will then be succeeded by the bright picture of millennial bliss.

The Second Coming of Christ is the breaking through of the power which shears the old serpent of his strength, and locks and seals him up in the abyss, and tears away all the array of falsehoods which has been drawing the world on to destruction for many ages. I, for one, believe these things will come to pass, and look upon it as the only hope for our degenerate and misgoverned world, when Christ shall appear and reign with his saints upon the earth, judging the nations in equity, and ruling in righteousness for a thousand years.

FROM THE COUNTRY.

THE young man comes from the country with industrious habits. His father worked; his mother worked; his brothers worked. He knows no better, and continues industrious for a while. But he soon finds out that there are a great many around him who get along better than he without any work. They dress better. They drink the best wines. They have a good seat at the theatre. They have money to bet on the election, on horses, on the contest between the Atlantics and Athletics. The young man wonders where these idlers get their money. Four ways of getting money: by inheritance, by earning it, by begging it, by stealing it. Some of these shining ones get it not by inheritance, nor by earning it, nor by begging.

The young man, in a fit of indignation throws up his work, and consorts with these idlers, and has soon learned the same tricks, and dies and is not as much mourned over as the fast horse they foundered and killed by a too hasty watering. When a young man earns a thousand dollars and spends fifteen hundred, he goes overboard. If he earn fifteen hundred and spend two thousand, he goes overboard. The thing is inevitable.

A man resolves to be honest, but here are fifty Shylocks on the same street. They undersell him. They twist about so as to escape the penalty of the law, caring nothing for God, but a little anxious about the Sheriff. The young man says, "This a galling rivalry. Perhaps I had better give up my old-fogy notions about honesty. This transaction may be a little doubtful, but then they all do it." This temptation is augmented by the fact that professors of religion do not always stand up straight. It is an awful thing to be a member of a church, and yet by swindling operations prove you are a hypocrite. Such a man will not dare to knock at last at the gate of heaven, and in apology for his business misdemeanors say, "Oh! you ought to have heard me sing 'Rock of Ages' in the church on earth."

There seems to be an idea abroad that charity can consecrate ungodly gains, and that if you give half of an unrighteous transaction to God he will forgive you for pocketing the rest. The man virtually says, "Oh Lord! here are fifty dollars for the missionary cause if you won't say anything about the rest of it!" Ah! the church of God is not a shop for receiving stolen goods. If you have gotten unrighteous gain, better make return to those from whom you took it, or if from the nature of the case that is impossible, then you had better get your stove red-hot, and then, when the heat is fiercest, throw in the blasted spoil. God does not want it.

CHILDREN OF THE STREET.

THERE is only one thing I have against the Sabbath Schools of this country, and that is, they are too respectable. We gather into our schools the children of the refined, and the cultured, and the educated; but, alas! for the great multitude of the children of the abandoned and lost. A few of them are gathered into our Sabbath Schools; but what about the seventy thousand destitute children of New York, and the score of thousands of destitute children of Brooklyn, around whom are thrown no benign, and heavenly, and Christian influences? It is a tremendous question, what is to become of the destitute children of these cities? We must either act on them, or they will act on us. We will either Christianize them or they will heathenize us. It is a question not more for the Christian than for the philanthropist and the statesman. O! if we could have all these suffering little ones gathered together, what a scene of hunger, and wretchedness, and rags, and sin, and trouble, and darkness! If we could see those little feet on the broad road to death, which through Christian charity ought to be pressing the narrow path of life; if we could hear those voices in blasphemy, which ought to be singing the praises of God; if we could see those little hearts, which at that age ought not to be soiled with one unclean thought, becoming the sewers for every abomination; if we could see those suffering little ones sacrificed on the altar for every iniquitous passion, and baptized with fire from the lava of the pit—we would recoil, crying out: "Avaunt thou dream of hell!" They are not always going to be children. They are coming up to be men and women of this country. That spark of iniquity that might now be put out with one drop of the water of life, will become the conflagration of every green thing that God ever planted in the soul. That which ought to have been a temple of the Holy Ghost will become a scarred and blasted ruin—every light quenched and every altar in the dust. That petty thief, who slips into your store and takes a yard of cloth from your counter, will become the highwayman of the forest, or the burglar at midnight, picking the lock of your money-safe and blowing up your store to hide the villainy. A great army, with staggering step, and bloodshot eye, and drunken hoot, they are coming on—gathering recruits from every grog shop and den of infamy in the land, to take the ballot-box and hurrah at the elections. The hard-knuckled fist of ruffianism will have more power than the gentle hand of intelligence and sobriety. Men, bloated, and with the signature of sin burned in from the top of the forehead to the bottom of the chin, will look honest men out of countenance. Moral corpses, which ought to be buried a hundred feet deep to keep them from poisoning the air, will rot in the face of the sun at noonday. Industry, in her plain frock, will be unappreciated, while thousands of men will wander around in idleness, with their hands on their hips, saying: "The world owes us a living." O! what a tremendous power there is in iniquity when uneducated, and unrestrained it gathers full force, drowning like surges, crushing like rocks. By the gospelization of the rising generation let us save this land for civilization and Christianity.

BRIEF NOTES.

At the recent election at the William Taylor University of Fort Wayne, Ind. Rev. William P. George, D.D., the Hon. William S. McPheeters, LL.D., and Mr. Louis Klopsch were elected trustees of the University.

The Committee engaged in revising the modern Syriac version of the Bible at Oroomiah, Persia, report that the work, though surrounded with difficulties, will shortly be completed and sent to New York to be printed.

A series of tapestries illustrating the life of Christ has been presented to Bishop Potter to be used in the decoration of the projected Cathedral of St. John in New York. These tapestries which are twelve in number, and cost seventy-five thousand dollars, are the gift of Mrs. Wm. F. Coles of New York.

Mr. James H. Cannon, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Evangelist, began a series of revival services last Sunday in Asbury M. E. Church, New York, of which Dr. J. S. Stone is pastor. Mr. Cannon's labors at the Home Camp-Meeting in the Johnson Street M. E. Church, Brooklyn, were wonderfully blessed of God in the conversion of souls.

Rev. W. T. Lambourne, the eminent London Baptist minister whose portrait appeared in this journal last week, preached last Sunday at the Baptist Church, Bayonne, N. J. Churches desiring to hear him during his stay may write to him at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and their letters will be forwarded to him.

Mr. Louis Klopsch, the publisher of this journal has accepted a call to the Superintendency of the Ocean Grove Camp-meeting Sunday School for the summer season of this year. He will also have charge of the children's meeting held every afternoon during the camp-meeting, which services were formerly under the charge of the late Mrs. Inskip.

A Hindu gentleman has recently presented to the idol in a temple at Triplicane, India, a crown set with precious stones, which cost $16,000. The idol with the crown on its head was drawn through the streets and a dinner was provided for 400 Brahmans at the expense of the donor of the crown. It is much to be regretted that a man so rich and so generous was not better instructed.

Mr. Frank DeWitt Talmage, B. A., the gifted son of the Editor of this journal has taken charge of a church in Pennsylvania, during his summer vacation. He will preach twice each Sunday and attend to the pastoral duties of the charge. On the evening of Sunday, May 31st, he occupied his father's pulpit and preached with much acceptance to the large congregation at the Brooklyn Tabernacle.

Christian citizens contemplating a visit to Europe this summer may be interested in knowing that Holiday Bible Readings will be held at Chamounix during the last week in August and similar meetings at Aix-les-Bains during the first two weeks of September. Programmes with particulars as to hotel accommodations, etc., may be obtained by addressing Rev. N. L. Bluett, M. A. Annemasse, Haute, Savoie, France.

A substantial Protestant Episcopal Church has been built and dedicated at Guthrie, Oklahoma Territory. Two years hard work have been required to achieve this result and open the church free of debt. There is a regular attendance of about 200, and the Rev. Mr. Tyler, who is in charge, has now commenced a weekly service at Oklahoma City, thirty miles distant, which has in it the promise of a very successful work.

Rev. B. Fay Mills is laboring at New Rochelle, N. Y. The first meeting of the series was held on May 28. A very deep and widespread interest has been aroused which is affecting all the churches. The Presbyterian, Baptist and Methodist denominations are uniting heartily in the work. So general is the interest taken in the meetings that on Wednesday, June 4th the leading business houses closed their establishments to allow of their employees attending the services, which commenced at eight o'clock in the morning and continued all day.

The next annual Convention of the International Christian Workers' Association will be held in Washington, D. C., in November. Former meetings of this Association, especially that held in Hartford, Conn., last year, were exceedingly helpful to Mission Workers, Sunday School teachers and Christians engaged in all departments of aggressive Gospel work. Early notice is given of the November meeting in order that persons desiring to attend may make arrangements. Full particulars may be obtained from the Secretary, Rev. John C. Collins, New Haven, Conn.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The "Itata" Surrendered—Historian Losing Dead—Brigandage in Turkey—Ex-President Hayes ill—Servia's Young King—Two Memorial Statues Unveiled—Secretary Blaine Better—General Notes.

RUSSIA'S Anti-Hebrew Crusade is still the talk of Europe, and the cause of universal indignation. Thousands of the exiles who have reached Berlin are sheltered in a tunnel near Charlottenburg, where they are cared for by co-religionists. All appeals to the Czar have been useless, and European statesmen are now forced to the conclusion that the brutalities perpetrated by the Grand Duke Sergius, the Czar's brother, and by Gen. Ignatieff, the Chief of Police, are fully sanctioned by the Emperor. He is said to have expressed a determination to continue the movement until he had solved the Jewish question, which he regarded as largely identical with that of Nihilism, since many of that race were engaged in Nihilistic plots. This is denied by the best authorities in Russia, and discredited in Austria, England, France and Germany.

England has Published a Blue Book, Dealing with the Behring Sea dispute, which gives the correspondence regarding the negotiations between the two countries. It shows that President Harrison insists that an exception to the prohibition of seal fishing be made to the extent of 7500 seals, which are necessary for the support of the natives. Beyond this, however, the prohibition is to be strict and indiscriminating. The Behring Sea Bill has been ordered to a second reading in the British Parliament, without opposition. England has practically conceded the American claims. The proposed prohibition is to be continued until 1892, and before it expires, it is expected that the arbitrators will make an award. Russia's consent is necessary to entire prohibition in Behring Sea, and although no intimation has yet been received from that government, it is believed to be favorable to closing it to sealers.

Ex-President Rutherford B. Hayes, who, on his retirement from active politics, returned, like Cincinnatus of old, to his farm, is very ill. Sometime ago he was attacked by a malady which robbed him of his voice and which was followed by great physical depression and indication of a general breaking-up of the system. Mr. Hayes was born in Connecticut in 1822 studied at Harvard, and practiced law in Cincinnati. In 1861, he went to the war as commander of a volunteer regiment from Ohio and was speedily promoted to the rank of Colonel, Brigadier-General and Major-General successively. In 1864 he was elected to Congress. Twice he was chosen Governor of Ohio and in 1876 was elected President, having been nominated by the Republican party. That election will be memorable in consequence of the indecisive result, which led to the appointment of the Electoral Commission. That body decided in favor of Hayes and against Tilden, the Democratic candidate, giving the former a majority of one in the Electoral College. Mr. Hayes has been prominently identified with the prison reform movement in Ohio of late years and is distinguished as a Christian philanthropist. He is one of the administrators of the Slater Educational Fund for the benefit of colored people. His portrait is given above.

The "Charleston's" Long Chase of the Chilean insurgent steamer, Itata, ended in the latter being surrendered on June 4th, in the port of Iquique, with the five thousand rifles that were shipped at San Diego, Cal. The surrender was made formally to Admirals McCann and Brown, of the U. S. Navy, on the arrival of the Itata, and before the Charleston had come to port. It is now claimed that the arms were shipped at a point many miles out at sea, and not at San Diego, and if this can be established it will materially modify the situation and may result in the release of the Itata.

Few European Princes have made their Debut under such disadvantageous circumstances as those that surround the young Servian monarch, Prince Alexander, whose portrait is given in this column. Both parents in exile—his father in disgrace and his royal mother, Queen Natalie, because her presence in the country would provoke dissensions between two powerful political factions—it is little wonder that the sympathetic interest of Europe should go out to this boy-king, hardly fourteen years old, yet whose life is rather that of a petted prisoner than a king. He is closely guarded by the regency, and is being subjected to a rather forced process of development, in their haste to have him fit to assume regal powers. His military tutor, Colonel Miskovic, brings him to every important drill, where he is in command of a company. In his colonel's uniform, he would meet his mother and salute her in formal military fashion, instead of greeting her with the kiss of childhood. Should he live, and should Servia be fortunate enough to escape revolution, he will ascend the throne of the Obrenovitches as Alexander I. in 1894, when he becomes of age.

A Band of Turkish Brigands Attacked the Eastern express near Tcheresskoi on June 1st, derailing the engine and several cars and intimidating the passengers, who surrendered after a sharp fusillade. This astonishing event occurred between Constantinople and Adrianople. A noted robber, named Anastasius led the attack. The bandits found among the passengers several German and English tourists, one being a wealthy banker. Like the mountain outlaws of Greece and Sicily, they decided to demand a ransom for these important captives, and let the other prisoners go, after ransacking their baggage for valuables. The men carried away Herr Israel, the Berlin banker, Herr Maquet, a Bavarian land-owner, Herr Kotysch, a wealthy Prussian, and Freundinger, the engineer of the express. $40,000 are demanded as ransom, which the German Ambassador at Constantinople will advance to the outlaws, although the loss will ultimately fall on the Turkish Government.

The Canadian Reciprocity Commissioners, who lately visited Washington, have made their report to the Dominion Parliament, through Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner. He thinks that there is a fair prospect that arrangements may be made to secure to Canada the benefit of reciprocal trade relations with the Union, as well as with the South American Republics. The visit of the Commission and its negotiations with our Government were described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at the time. The impression given by the report of the Commission was that President Harrison's western tour considerably interfered with the negotiations.

The Women of Mississippi, on June 2d, unveiled at Jackson a superb memorial to the Southern soldiers who fell in the Civil War. Twenty thousand persons were present, including an array of veterans, under Gov. Gordon, of Georgia, Commander of the United Confederate Veterans. In the procession was a float, drawn by ten white horses, carrying fifteen young ladies, representing the Southern Confederacy, and each carrying the banner of her State. Tattered Southern battle-flags were borne side by side with the Stars and Stripes, which floated at the head of each division. The military display was one of the finest in the South since the war. The memorial monument is 60 feet 4 inches high, being surmounted by the heroic statue of a soldier. There are three platform stone bases and two marble slabs with the inscription: "To the Confederate dead of Mississippi," besides a number of other smaller slabs bearing inscriptions in poetry and prose. In one of the niches of the monument a statue of the late Jefferson Davis will shortly be placed. On the same day 25,000 persons participated in the unveiling of a bronze statue to the late Gen. Grant, at Galena, Ill., Hon. Chauncey M. Depew delivering the oration.

A Familiar Name to Americans is that of Dr. Benson John Lossing, the well-known historian, who died of heart disease at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., on June 1st. Dr. Lossing was born in the town of Beekman, N. Y., in 1813, was educated at a public school, and learned the watchmaker's trade. At twenty-two, he began his literary career, first, modestly as editor and publisher of an illustrated magazine. In 1841, his History of the Fine Arts appeared, followed by a number of historical works, including The Lives of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence and The Pictorial Field Book of the Revolution. These books, at one time, were held as standards by American readers, and won Dr. Lossing wide fame as a historian.

After Thirty-three Years of Active Service in connection with Columbia College, Professor Theodore Woolsey Dwight, probably the most eminent of living American jurists, retires on July 1st. Professor Dwight, whose portrait is given in this column, has been the leading spirit in the Columbia Law School during many years, and there are thousands of lawyers, many of them eminent judges, ministers to foreign countries, members of Congress and of State Legislatures, who have benefited by his teaching. A number of prominent citizens, including professors, judges, and diplomats, have united in a testimonial, which is to be presented to the retiring jurist. Professor Dwight's connection with Columbia College began in 1858, and after 1873, the entire work of instruction in every topic of private law developed upon him. Altogether, fully ten thousand pupils have benefited by his instruction. He has had associated with him at different times some of the greatest lawyers in the United States, among his pupils being Senator Hawley of Connecticut, ex-Attorney General Baldwin of Indiana, Henry Holt, Franklin MacVeagh, President Foulke of Swathmore College, Congressman Perry Belmont, President Warfield, of Lafayette College and a host of others.

Half the Country was Swept by Storm During the week and the Northwest especially suffered severely. A tornado did much damage in South Dakota, demolishing buildings of every description through a large section and along a track only one hundred feet wide. Horses, wagons and barns were tossed in the air. At Watertown, Waverley, and Hazel much damage was done and several persons were killed.

THE PROCLAMATION.

A NEW SERMON PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

A Sermon Postponed—I. The Comings of Christ—The Probation in Eden—The Failure in Meeting Temptation—When Religion had Failed—When Hope had Departed—When the World will be at its Worst—II. Is Coming to Sinners—To Set all Else Aside—To be a Substitute—III. His Own Herald—To be The Way—IV. Reasons for Coming—V. A Plea for Receiving Him.

"Then said I, Lo, I come."—Psalm 40: 7.

TO my great sorrow, last Sunday night I was unable to preach. I had prepared a sermon upon this text, with much hope of its usefulness; for I intended it to be a supplement to the morning sermon, which was a doctrinal exposition. The evening sermon was intended to be practical, and to commend the whole subject to the attention of inquiring sinners. I came here feeling quite fit to preach, when an overpowering nervousness oppressed me, and I lost all self-control, and left the pulpit in anguish. I come hither this morning with the same subject. I have been turning it over, and wondering why it was so. Peradventure, this sermon was not to be preached on that occasion, because God would teach the preacher more of his own feebleness, and cast him more fully upon the divine strength. That has certainly been the effect upon my own heart. Perhaps, also, there are some here this morning who were not here last Lord's-day evening, whom God intends to bless by the sermon. You that are fresh to this place, should consider the strange circumstance, which never happened to me before in the forty years of my ministry; and you may be led to inquire whether my bow was then unstrung that the arrow might find its ordained target in your heart.

I. I will commence with this observation: the Lord Christ has times of

His First Comings to Men;

"Then said I, Lo, I come." What are these times? Mayhap some here present have reached this season, and this very day is the time of blessing when the text shall be fulfilled: "Then said I, Lo, I come." Go with me to the first record in the volume of the Book, when it was said that he should come. You will find it in the early chapters of Genesis. Jesus said, "Lo, I come" when man's probation was a failure. Man in the Garden of Eden had every advantage for obedience and life. He had a perfect nature, created without bias towards evil, and he was surrounded with every inducement to continue loyal to his Maker. In a very short time our mother Eve ate of the fruit, and father Adam followed her, and thus human probation ended in total failure. At that point we read in the volume of the Book that the Seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head. Then our Redeemer said, "Lo, I come."

Hearken to me, my friend: you also have had your probation, as you have thought it to be. You quitted your father's roof with every hope, your mother judged you to be of a most amiable character, and your friends expected to see in you one whose life would honor the family. You thought so yourself. Your probation has reversed that hope; you have turned out far other than you should have been; and looking back upon the whole of your life to this moment, you ought to be ashamed. It has been a terrible breaking down for you, and for all who know you; and you are sitting in this place feeling, "Yes, it is so; the tests have proved me to be as a broken reed. I am under condemnation by reason of my transgressions against God." How rejoiced I am to tell you that, at such a time when you are conscious that you are a failure, Jesus says, "Lo, I come!"

That also was a time when man's clever dealings with the devil had turned out a great failure. The serpent came and said, "God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." How craftily he put it! How cunningly he insinuated that God was jealous of what man might become, and was keeping him back from a nobler destiny! He even dared to say, "Ye shall not surely die," thus giving the Lord the lie direct. No man hath yet dealt with the devil without being a loser. The arch-deceiver promises very fairly; but he lies from beginning to end. I know he promised you pleasure unbounded, and liberty unrestrained. Now,

The Pleasure is Burnt Out, and the ashes of that which once blazed and crackled, are terrible to look upon. As for liberty, where is it? You have become the bond-slave of sin. You were to enjoy life, and lo, you are plunged in death! He needs a long spoon who eats out of the same dish as the devil, and your spoon has not been long enough. Sin has overreached and betrayed you; and you stand trembling before God as the result of having listened to the falsehoods of hell, and having rejected the commands of heaven. Supposing such a person to be present—and I feel sure he is—I pray that he may hear my text as from the Lord Jesus himself.

When our Lord did actually arrive, fulfilling the text by being born of a woman, it was when man's religion has proved a failure. There was never a darker thirty years than when Herod slew the innocents, and the chief priest and scribes pursued the Son of God, and at last nailed him to the tree. It was then that Jesus came to us to redeem us by his death. Do I speak to any man here whose religion has broken down? You have observed a host of rites and ceremonies: you were christened in your infancy, you were duly confirmed, you have taken what you call "the blessed sacrament," or it may be you have sat always in the most plain of meeting-houses, and listened to the most orthodox of preachers, and you have been amongst the most religious of religious people; but now, at length, the Spirit of God has shown you that all these performances and attendances are worthless cobwebs which

Avail you Nothing.

If you feel that you need something infinitely better than Churchianity, or Methodism—in fact, that you need Christ himself to be formed in you—then to you, even to you, Jesus says, "Lo, I come." When you part with self you meet with Christ. When no shred of hope remains, then Jesus says, "Lo, I come."

Once more. The Lord Jesus is to come a second time; and when will he come? He will come when man's hope is a failure. He will come when iniquity abounds, and the love of many hath waxed cold. He will come when dreams of a golden age shall be turned into the dread reality of abounding evil. Do not dream that the world will go on improving and improving, and that the improvement will naturally culminate in the millennium. No such thing. It may grow better for a while, better under certain aspects; but, afterwards the power of the better element will ebb out like the sea, even though each wave should look like an advance. That day shall not come except there be a falling away first. Even the wise virgins will sleep, and the men of the world will be, as in the days of Noah, eating and drinking, marrying and being given in marriage. On a sudden, the Lord will come.

As a Thief in the Night.

The deluge of fire will find men unprepared as did the deluge of water. He will come taking vengeance on his adversaries. When things wax worse and worse we see the tokens of his speedy coming. He will shortly appear, for the sky is darkening. When every hope will seem blotted out, and nothing but grim ages of anarchy and ungodliness are to be expected, then our Deliverer will come. When the tale of bricks was doubled in Egypt, Moses came; and when the world attains to its utmost unbelief and iniquity, Jesus will come. So at this moment my hearer may be saying, "Lost! Lost! I am past hope!" This is the time for my text: "Then said I, Lo, I come." He who is able to save to the uttermost appears to the soul when every other hope disappears. In your deep distress I see a token for good. You are now reduced to spiritual death, and now I trust that eternal life will visit you.

Now all this I put before you in simple language, believing what I say, and trusting that if I describe your case, you will know that I mean it for you. I have heard of a preacher who was so fearful lest he should be thought personal, that he said to his congregation, "Lest any of you should think that what I have said was meant for you, I would observe that the sermon I am preaching was prepared for a congregation in Massachusetts." I can plead nothing of the sort. I refer to you, my hearer, in the most pointed manner. I will attend to Massachusetts, if ever the Lord sends me there; but just now I mean you.

II. Secondly, I would remark that

Christ Comes to Sinners

in the glory of his person: "Then said I, Lo, I come." Note that glorious I! Have you not seen people engaged in urgent work who did not understand their business? Apprentices, and other unskilful people, are muddling time away. They are making bad worse, and ruining great risk. Perhaps a great calamity will occur if the work is not done well and quickly. A first-rate worker is sent for. See, the man has come who understands the business. He cries, "Let me come! Stand out of my way! You are on the wrong tack: let me do it myself!" You have not blamed him for egotism, for the thing needed to be done, and he could do it, and the others could not. Everybody recognized the master workman, and gave place to him. The announcement of his coming was the end of the muddle, and the signal of hope. Even so Jesus comes to you sinners, and his presence is your salvation. He says, "Lo, I come." What does he mean?

He means, the setting of all else on one side. There is the priest—he has not helped you much; he may go, for Jesus says, "Lo, I come." There are your own efforts and doings; there are your feelings and thinkings; there are your ceremonies and austerities; there are your prayers and tears; there are your hearings and readings—all these must be laid aside as grounds of confidence, and Jesus alone must be your trust. He can do for you what none of these can. You are to repentance and faith, and you cannot succeed. Let him come, and he will bring every good thing with him. It is glorious to see our Lord throwing down all our bowing walls and tottering fences, and to hear him cry, "Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation." Everything else vanishes before his perfect salvation.

Here is a glorious setting of himself at our side and in our place. Your debt of sin is discharged when you believe in Christ Jesus. He takes our sins upon himself, he bears their penalty, and we go free. Blessed word—"Lo, I come." I come to take your weight of sin, your burden of punishment. I come to be made a curse for you, that you may be made the righteousness of God in me. Sinner, stand out of the way, and let Jesus appear for you, and fill your place! Our Lord sets himself to be permanently our all in all. When he came on earth, he did not leave his work till he had finished it. O my hearer, you are now in the place where the gospel is preached to you—yes, to you, for we are sent to preach the gospel to every creature; and though you should be the worst, and most benighted, and most guilty of all the creatures out of hell, yet you are a creature, and we preach Christ to you. O poor heart, may the Lord Jesus say to you "Lo, I come!" for he comes to stay,—to stay until he has worked salvation in you as he has worked out salvation for you. He will not leave a believer till he has presented him spotless before the throne of God with exceeding joy.

III. Oh, that many may be comforted while I dwell on a third head! Christ in his coming is

His Own Introduction.

Here our Lord is his own herald, "Lo, I come." He does not wait for an eloquent preacher to act as master of the ceremonies to him: he introduces himself. Therefore even I, the simplest talker on earth, may prove sufficient for my Lord's purpose if he will graciously condescend to bless these plain words of mine. It is not I that say that Jesus comes, but in the text our Lord himself declares, "Then said I, Lo, I come." You need not do anything to draw Christ's attention to you; it is Christ who draws your attention to himself.

Our Lord Jesus is the way to himself. Did you ever notice that? He comes himself to us, and so he is the way by which we meet him. He is our rest, and the way to our rest; he says, "I am the way." You want to know how to get to Christ? You have not to get to Christ, for he has come to you. An inquirer once said to a minister, "The next step for me is to get a deeper conviction of sin." The minister said, "No such thing, my friend: the next step is to trust in Jesus, for he says, Come unto me." To come to Jesus, or rather to receive Jesus who has come to us, is the one essential step into eternal salvation. Though our Lord does say, "Come unto me," he has preceded it with this other word, "Lo, I come." Poor cripple, if you cannot come to Jesus, ask him to come to you; and he will. Jesus can make you whole, and he is here.

IV. Our next point is this—Christ reveals

His Reasons for Coming.

Only a few words on this. He comes because his heart is set on you. He loves you, and so he hastens to your rescue. Your salvation is his delight. Though your soul is sunk in a sea of need, and you are in despair because of that need, Jesus loves you. One asked an old man of ninety, "Do you love Jesus?" and the old man answered with a smile, "I do, indeed; but I can tell you something better than that." His friend said, "Something better than loving Jesus! What is that?" The old disciple replied, "He loves me." O soul, I wish you could see this fact, which is indeed better than your love to Jesus, namely, his love to you!

The fact is, you have need, and he has love, and so he comes. There is no hope for you unless he does come, and that is why he comes. If you had a penny of your own, he would not give you his purse; if you had a rag of your own, he would not give you his robe; if you had a breath of your own he would not give you his life. But now you are naked, and poor, and miserable, and lost, and dead, Jesus reveals himself, and you read concerning him, "Then said I, Lo, I come." He gives you his reasons—reasons not in yourself, but all in his grace. There is no good in you; there is no reason in you why the Lord should save you; but because of his free, spontaneous, rich, sovereign, almighty grace, he leaps out of heaven, he descends to the earth, he plunges into the grave to pluck his beloved from destruction.

V. Here is my last word: Christ's coming is the best plea for and receiving him now. O sirs, remember you have not to raise the question whether he will come or not. He is come. You have not to say, How can I come to him? He comes to you. You do want a Mediator between your soul and God; but you do not want any mediator between yourself and Jesus; for he says, "Lo, I come." To you in all your filthiness, in all your condemnation, in all your hopelessness, he comes. Wait not for anybody to introduce you to him, or him to you; he has introduced himself, and here is his card—"Then said I, Lo, I come."

No search is needed to find the Lord, for he comes in manifested grace, and calls upon us to see him. "I have long been searching for Christ," murmurs one. What! seeking for the sun at noonday? Jesus is not lost. It is you that are lost, and he is searching for you. He says, "Lo, I come!" it is you that will not come. Still one declares that he has been seeking the Lord Jesus for many a day. This is sadly strange, for Jesus is near.

Moreover, no waiting is needed, and no preparation is to be made by you. Why do you wait? He does not wait, but cries, "Lo, I come!" "I will get ready for Christ," say you; but it is too late to talk so, when he cries, "Lo, I am come." Receive him! If you are in yourself sadly unready, yet he himself will make everything ready for himself. Only and let him enter in. Shut not out your own mercy. A pastor in Edinburgh, in going round his district, knocked at the door of a poor woman, for whom he had brought some needed help; but he received no answer. When next he met her, he said to her, "I called on Tuesday at your house." She asked, "At what time?" "About eleven o'clock; I knocked, and you did not answer. I was disappointed, for I called to give you help." "Ah, sir!" said she, "I am very sorry. I thought it was the man coming for the rent, and I could not pay it, and therefore I did not dare to go to the door." Many a troubled soul thinks that Jesus is one who comes to ask of us what we cannot give; but indeed he comes to give us all things.

No assistance is wanted by Christ on your part. He does not come with half a salvation, and look to you to complete it. He does not come to bring you a robe half woven, which you are to finish. How could you finish it? Could the best saint in the world add anything to Christ's righteousness? No good man would even dream of adding his home-spun to that raiment which is of wrought gold. Receive him: receive him at once. Dear children of God, and sinners that have begun to feel after him, say with one accord, "Even so, come quickly, Lord Jesus." If he says, "Lo, I come," and the Spirit and the bride say, Come; and he that heareth says, Come, and he that is athirst comes, and whosoever will is bidden to come and take the water of life freely; then let us join the chorus of comes, and come to Christ ourselves. "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him!" Ye who most of all need him, be among the first and gladdest, as you hear him say, "Lo, I come."

A NIHILIST CONVERTED.

A Russian Jew whom his family designed for a Rabbi, and who had to that end been carefully trained by Jewish teachers, imbibed at college an intense hatred of all religion. He became an Atheist and Nihilist. Having been placed under police supervision in consequence of the suspicion of the authorities, and being debarred from continuing his studies at a Russian university on account of his nationality, he removed to Geneva, and became a regular contributor to a Nihilist paper. In that capacity he resolved to attack Christianity, and therefore went out one day to purchase a New Testament, for the purpose of making himself acquainted with the system which he was about to assail. As he passed through the public gardens he saw a book lying on a bench. He looked at it, and found to his surprise that it was a New Testament. His first thought was that this odd coincidence would supply a capital point for a humorous article. As the weather was fine he sat down and proceeded to turn over the pages. The first passage which caught his attention was our Lord's warning against anxiety in the Sermon on the Mount. This struck him as philosophical, and he resolved to make a thorough examination of the teaching of Jesus. Close study of the New Testament, and careful comparison of the Gospel of Matthew with the Hebrew Scriptures, led him after two years of diligent search, to accept Jesus as the Messiah of Israel, and the Saviour of the world.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

The Epistle of James.

THE character of the letter exactly harmonizes with the character of James, the first bishop of Jerusalem, and with the known circumstances of those to whom the letter is addressed, and this in a way that no literary forger of that age could have reached. And there is no sufficient motive for a forgery, for the letter is singularly wanting in doctrinal statements. The supposed opposition to St. Paul will not hold; a writer who wished to oppose St. Paul would have made his opposition much more clear. And a forger who wished to get the authority of James wherewith to counteract Paul's teaching would have made us aware that it was either an Apostle, the son of Zebedee, or the son of Alphaeus, or else the brother of the Lord, who was addressing us, and would not have left it open for us to suppose that the epistle was from the pen of some unknown James, who had no authority at all equal to that of Paul. And let anyone compare this epistle with those of Clement, of Rome, and of Barnabas, and of Ignatius, and mark its enormous superiority. If it were the work of a forger, what a perplexing fact this superiority would be! If it be the work either of an Apostle, or of one who had Apostolic rank everything is explained.

The Identity of the Author.

In the New Testament we find several persons bearing the name of James among the followers of Jesus Christ. It would be possible to make as many as six; but these must certainly be reduced to four, and probably to three. These six are: (1.) James the Apostle, the son of Zebedee and brother of John the Apostle; (2.) James, the apostle, the son of Alphaeus; (3.) James the Little, son of Mary, the wife of Clopas; (4.) James, the brother of the Lord (Galatians, 1:19), a relation which he shares with Joses, Simon and Judas; (5.) James, the overseer of the church at Jerusalem; and (6.) James the brother of the Jude who wrote the epistle. Of these six we may safely identify the last three as being one and the same person; and we may reasonably identify James, the son of Clopas, with James, the son of Alphaeus. But this is by no means certain. We have thus reduced the six to four, or three. In our ignorance of the life and thought and language of the son of Zebedee and the son of Clopas, we cannot say that there is anything in the epistle itself which forbids us to attribute it to either of them; but there is nothing in it which leads us to do so. And there are considerations which combined, are against Apostolic authorship. Therefore, without further hesitation, we may assign the epistle to one of the most striking and impressive figures in the Apostolic age, James the Just, the brother of the Lord, and the first overseer of the mother church at Jerusalem. Whether James was the brother of the Lord, as being the son of Joseph by a former marriage, or as being the son of Joseph and Mary, born after the birth of Jesus, need not be argued. All that specially concerns us for a right understanding of the epistle is to remember that it was written by one who, although for some time not a believer in the Messiahship of Jesus, was, through his near relationship, constantly in his society, witnessing his acts and hearing his words.

St. Jude.

The author of this epistle was comparatively unknown, having written nothing else, and having probably travelled little. The charge: "Remember ye the words which have been spoken before by the Apostles of our Lord Jesus

*From The Expositor's Bible: The General Epistles of St. James and St. Jude, by the Rev. Alfred Plummer, M.A., D.D. This now famous series of volumes is greatly enriched by Dr. Plummer's work, which deals with these epistles in a scholarly, but markedly reverent spirit. Pp. 467; Price $1.50. Published by A. C. Armstrong & Son, 51 East Tenth Street, New York.

Parliament Houses, Ottawa, Ont.

Christ," although it does not necessarily imply that the writer himself is not one of these Apostles would be more suitable to one who did not possess Apostolic rank. And when we ask what James is meant, when he styles himself, "the brother of James," the answer cannot be doubtful; it is James the brother of the Lord. We know that he was married, not merely from general statement made by Paul respecting the brethren of the Lord (1. Cor. 9: 5), but from the interesting story told by Hegesippus that two grandsons of Jude were taken before Domitian as being of the royal family of David, and therefore dangerous to his rule. "For," says Hegesippus, "he was afraid of the appearance of Christ, as Herod was." In answer to his questions they said that they were indeed of the family of David, but were poor and humble persons, who supported themselves by their own labor; in proof of which they showed their horny hands. When further questioned respecting the Christ and his kingdom, they said it was not earthly, but heavenly, and would arise at the end of the world, when he came to judge the living and the dead. Whereupon Domitian contemptuously dismissed them as too simple to be dangerous, and ordered that the persecution of the descendants of David should cease.

THE LATE MR. HENRY NAYLOR.

IT is with sincere sorrow, which will be shared by large numbers of our readers, that we report the death of Mr. Henry Naylor, which occurred on June 4. A man of earnest piety, of large and wise benefactions—a man devoted heart and soul to the cause of Christ and of the poor, whose life and labor and fortune were fully consecrated and freely used in Christian service among the needy and "them that are out of the way"—he was one whom the church and the world can ill spare. Not only at the Berachah Mission in New York, which was built and supported entirely at his own expense, and where many of the most hopeless cases have been decided for Christ, but at the docks, on board the ships, and in the abodes of poverty and vice, he and his devoted wife have gone, regardless of the shocks which persons of their rank and culture would sustain, caring nothing for hardships and rebuffs if only they could tell some sin-sick soul the way of salvation and win some miserable wanderer for Christ. Surely the greeting, "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord," awaited him from the lips of the Master, who has said: "I know thy works and thy labor and thy patience." May that thought comfort and support the sorrowing widow in her affliction!

CANADA'S DEAD PREMIER.

Sir John A. Macdonald and His Remarkable Career—The Foremost of Canadian Statesmen.

(See Illustration.)

FOR many days past, the people of Canada have watched with sad interest the battle for life that was waged by the greatest of Canadian statesmen, Sir John A. Macdonald. For three weeks, the Dominion Premier lay dying of congestion of the lungs, at Earnscliffe, the home of Lady Macdonald, his wife. Over a month ago, the first premonitions of failure began to make themselves visible. After thirty hours of unconsciousness, he expired at 10 P. M. on Saturday, June 6th, surrounded by his immediate family. The remains lay in state at the Parliament Buildings until Wednesday, when the funeral took place at St. Alban's Church. The interment was at Kingston, Ont., where the body also lay in state for some time at the City Hall. The obsequies were the most imposing ever witnessed in the Dominion, and the expressions of sorrow were deep and universal. Lady Macdonald, who watched faithfully by the couch of her dying husband till the last scene, is completely prostrated.

Canadians were greatly stirred up by the illness of the Premier. Messages of inquiry and condolence poured in from every quarter of the Dominion and two secretaries were kept busy answering them in an ante-room at Earnscliffe, adjoining the sick chamber. Telegrams from the Queen of England and from many high official dignitaries abroad were also received.

John Alexander Macdonald, like many other Dominion notabilities, was not a native of the soil of Canada. He was born in Glasgow, Scotland, in 1815, and when ten years of age was taken by his parents to Kingston, Ont., where he was educated at the Royal Grammar School. He never went to college; yet he managed, by hard study and by improving every opportunity, to acquire a pretty thorough education. He studied law, being a fellow student in the same office with Oliver Mowatt, who has been dubbed the "Little Premier" of Canada. Shortly after being called to the bar he entered politics and, three years after his election to Parliament, became a member of the Executive Council of the Dominion. After that time he was closely identified with every leading event in the political history of his adopted country.

Sir John was easily the foremost of Dominion statesmen. He has been called by his admirers, the "Grand Old Man of Canada," and, indeed, he possessed many of the characteristics of Mr. Gladstone. Clean-shaven, with a noble forehead, crowned by thin, spare locks, his style of delivery on the floor of Parliament when he shook his leonine head, was not unlike that of the Sage of Hawarden, in some of his eloquent moods. His seventy-six years seemed to leave little of the impress of age on his energies, and his superb administrative faculties were as keen as ever.

Magnetic, broad-minded, sagacious, he was naturally a leader of men, and his leadership has been everywhere respected, even by his political enemies. "The Chieftain," his familiar appellation, showed how dear he was to the Colonial heart. His conversation abounded in wit and repartee, and overflowed with anecdote. It has been claimed that, as a political tactician, he was without peer in Canada. Among his later administrative problems, have been the Canadian Pacific Railroad loan, the Jesuits' Estates' Act and the issues involved in the recent election, in all of which he contrived to pluck success out of what seemed to be often a very difficult situation. Whether at the Government House, at the Rideau Club, or at his beautiful home at Earnscliffe, he has always been an enormous worker, attending with his own hand to the bulk of his mail.

In 1864, Sir John Macdonald found a scheme worthy of his genius. It was the confederation of the Maritime Provinces, and this led to the still greater conception of the union of all British North America. He had the satisfaction of seeing his plans fulfilled and of forming the first government for the new Confederation, he himself becoming Prime Minister. In 1871 he was one of her Majesty's Commissioners for the settlement of the Alabama Claims. Since 1878 he steadily held the posts of Premier and President of the Privy Council. He was regarded as the father of the protective policy which Canadians have ratified at successive elections. His leadership of the Conservative party has been so successful that only once in twenty-four years have the opposition held any of the more important offices.

An uncompromising loyalist, Sir John, was one of the bitterest opponents of the suggested annexation of Canada by the United States and he sanctioned the prosecution of the men who were most prominent in the annexation movement sometime ago. Indeed, the keynote of his whole creed has been the union of Canada as one Province under one Sovereign. The closing years of his life have been devoted to the effort to bring Newfoundland into the Confederation and to settle amicably all difficulties with the United States. His successor will probably be Sir Charles Tupper, a staunch and able Conservative and long time associate of the Premier.

On page 364 are given an excellent portrait of the Canadian Premier, from a recent photograph and a sketch of the Parliament Houses on Barrack Hill, Ottawa, the scene of his many brilliant political triumphs. The structure is a beautiful and conspicuous one. The different wings were added at various periods, yet the general style has been preserved, making the whole the most picturesque building in the Dominion.

KIOTO, JAPAN.

The City to which the Czarevitch was taken after the Attempt to Assassinate Him.

A Street Scene in Kioto, Japan, near which the Czarevitch was Attacked.

Mr. J. McLain Brown, to whose support many of our readers are generously contributing, is doing much good in this way. A naive testimony to the value of this Christian teaching was recently given by a Japanese banker, who being importuned by a Buddhist priest to join in the movement against Christian teaching, said: "No; I do not believe in Christianity, but I like my clerks to do so. Those whom the Buddhists teach are inefficient; those who get purely secular education in the foreign schools are dishonest; the only clerks who are both efficient and honest are those who are taught by the missionaries."

The illustration here given represents one of the principal streets of Kioto. The strange vehicles shown in the picture are jinrikishas, which are the ordinary travelling conveyances in Japan.

A large number of men get their living by keeping them for hire, and trundling their patrons where they may want to go.

Living With a Philosopher.

DOWN the river and its locks to Philadelphia, and up the stream again, after a week in the city, went the good barge Fair-Weather. To Robert that voyage was one splendid panorama of delight; its scenes shifting in time to a low murmurous music of waters, and singing birds, and leaves stirring in the summer breeze. In that blissful period he lost the memory of his miserable past; he no longer recollected that he had had his head knocked against the wall, or had hidden under the bed, or that he had fled shrieking from rum-maniacs, or that his toes had been frost-bitten, or his fingers blue with cold. All this that hung in the background of his infant mind, a haze of horror, vanished out of sight, the cruise of the Fair-Weather coming like a curtain of beautiful golden mist, to obscure all that was behind it. Robert's life had now a fair horizon: all about him was now green fields and blue sky, and on the verge where earth and heaven met walked his guardian angels, the kindly Captain, the energetic Mrs. 'Liza, and the saucy Pink. Oh, that was indeed a beautiful six weeks.

The Fair-Weather returned to the mill, and Jerry delivered up his trust of the estate, and with pride handed over to Mrs. 'Liza the little bag of dollars he had won by his trading.

A REPORT of the attack of the Japanese policeman on the eldest son of the Czar of Russia, on May 11, appeared in this journal at the time of its occurrence; we now give a picture, taken from a photograph of a street in Kioto, near which city the attempted assassination took place and to which the wounded prince was conveyed after his providential escape for medical treatment.

As our readers are aware, the heir-apparent of the throne of Russia is making an extended tour through Asiatic countries. Travelling through India, where he was royally entertained by the English Government, he passed through China, and thence sailed for Japan. A part of the programme of his visit was, it appears, an excursion to Otsu, a beautiful village near Kioto. It lies on the shores of Lake Biwa, a noble sheet of water, forty-five miles long, surrounded by hills richly wooded, and is a noted resort of pleasure-seekers. The Czarevitch, accompanied by his cousin, Prince George of Greece, and his suite, crossed the lake in a Japanese boat and landed at Otsu. There they encountered an armed Japanese policeman, who made a murderous onslaught on the Czarevitch. He struck him a blow across the head with his sabre, inflicting an ugly wound on the left temple. Before he could strike another blow, Prince George rushed between them, knocked the policeman down with his stick, and kept him down until the guard came and secured him.

The gallantry of the young man has been highly lauded in the Russian newspapers, which say that Russia will never forget the timely service which saved a life so valuable to the nation. There is less exaggeration in this statement than appears at first sight. If the policeman had succeeded in giving another and fatal blow to the Prince, the succession to the Russian throne would probably have caused serious disputes. The Czar's second son is said to be dying of consumption, and his third son is a boy of twelve years of age, who, if he were soon called to succeed his father, would be under the control of a regency composed of men of reactionary tendencies. It was at first suspected that the attack was the work of a disguised Nihilist, who had foreseen and desired just this kind of dynastic embarrassment. It now appears, however, that the would-be assassin was simply a fanatic belonging to a class of Japanese patriots, who hate all foreigners and dread the effect of their influence on the country. He has been tried for the attempted assassination and has been sentenced to imprisonment for life.

Kioto has been called the Boston of Japan. It is the centre of culture. The city has 500,000 inhabitants. In the days of Buddhist supremacy there was no recognized source of learning outside of its monasteries. These monasteries and the temples are the pride and glory of Kioto. At one time in its history it had no less than four thousand of them. Since the advent of the foreigners, young men in other parts of Japan find that they can gain a better secular education in the public schools and universities where there are foreign teachers, and consequently there is a considerable decrease in the number of the students at Kioto. This fact has increased the antipathy of the Kioto people to foreigners. They have tried to arouse the religious prejudices of the people to the new system of education by representing it as a foreign scheme to convert Japan to Christianity. The government yielded to them so far as to stipulate, in engaging a foreign teacher, that his teaching should be purely secular, and that he should not teach Christianity in any shape whatsoever. But the good work could not be so stopped. The Japanese youth wanted to hear about Christianity, and as the teacher was not allowed to teach it in the schools they went to his house to learn.

It was on an October Saturday, that the school-master, who had been out collecting autumn flowers, met Robert, Pink, and Bop, at the edge of the wood. Robert was carrying Bop, and as Bop was both fat and struggling, Robert's face was red from his exertions. Bop, screaming lustily, was clawing promiscuously at his little nurse's hair and eyes.

"Take the child home," said the schoolmaster; "he wants to go to his mother."

"Mover can't be bovered with him," said Robert. "She's dot t'ins." "Twins!"

Robert nodded. "I've got to tend Bop. He'll det used to it, won't he? He tan't ky forever, tan he?"

No. Evidently even Bop, fine as was his capacity for crying, could not, like the stream, run on forever.

The schoolmaster thought he could not spend the rest of the day better than in taking care of the children of the woman who had endowed the world with "a pair of t'ins." He put a peppermint-drop into each open mouth, took Bop on his shoulder, and entered the woods.

"Come see what I've got," cried the happy Robert, leading the way to a tree, where the decay of the short stump of a limb had made a natural vase or bowl, which was filled with water. "See! it was all dirt and leaves, and I cleaned it out, and now it's filled up with clean water and things, come and drink. The chipmunk holds on with his feet, and puts his nose over the rim. The birds stand on the edge, and dip in their bills; the big butterflies come here and drink, too, and Pink and I stand to watch 'em! I love to give sings drinks. I put a chair by the corner of the mill, and put a pail full of water on it, for horses that come, and I lead 'em along, an' they drink a whole pail full! They drank free pails' full, in one day—once."

"But how did you get a pail filled, Robert?"

"Oh, I took it in dippers. Lots of dippers, till it was full. Mover said I'd run my legs off, carrying water—but I didn't; my legs is just as good as they was." And Robert, casting down his eyes, surveyed his vigorous little person with proper pride, and continued:

"I give the mans drinks, too. You know, a man came las' yesterday, and he said, 'Zekiel, haven't you a drop to keep a man alive? I'm 'most dead for a drink.' An' I said, 'Oh, Mister, I'll get you a drink.' And I ran, and I brought a whole dipper full—'cause he was most dead—and he looked at me real funny, and he drank an awful lot, and he said, 'Zekiel, the boy's right; that goes to the right spot.' And they both laughed. I don't know why they laughed, and I don't know why he got 'most dead for a drink, when there was a whole river full—and I don't know why he said the 'right spot,' for there ain't but one spot, is there, and that's inside of you? I will ask Jerry all zem sings."

"You are a regular little man," said the schoolmaster. "When you come to school to me, I will show you books about birds and flowers."

"I'm coming when Pink is big enough to come, too," said Robert. "Next summer, maybe. Father says he will teach me to read at home, first. Then I can help Pink, when she don't know anysing. Jerry is going to make us some letter-blocks. Jerry tells me lots of sings. Jerry knows everysing, most. Jerry is going to make us a cart, big enough to hold Bop, and a keg, or a big bag. And when nuts is ripe we is going, me, and Pink, and Jerry, and Bop, up the mountain for lots of nuts. We has to take care of Bop, me and Jerry, for Bop don't like the t'ins being in his cradle, and he leans in and pulls ze t'ins' noses. The wagon Jerry is going to make, will be big enough for ze t'ins, and next summer I can drag 'em' round, outdoors."

The making of the letter-blocks and the wagon by Jerry, caused the workshop to be a very interesting place to all the children. Jerry sawed wheels out of pieces of plank, and while he was making the body of the cart, or sawing out square blocks, whereon to paste the fruitful twenty-six letters, which are the key of knowledge, Pink and Bop amused themselves for hours, rolling the wheels across the shop floor.

Doubtless the twins, sleeping in the room below, supposed themselves dwelling amid perpetual low thunders, but they soon became used to all manner of noises.

In the shop Robert much preferred conversation with Jerry to play. He regarded Jerry as a Fount of Wisdom. There was no question too abstruse to be laid before Jerry; there was none so abstruse that Jerry would not boldly venture an answer. As may have been gathered from the samples of Jerry's conversation he was a philosopher. There are a great many advantages in living with a philosopher; Robert reaped these advantages.

"Jerry," said Robert, "does it make you feel bad to have one eye? Don't you wish you could grow another eye?"

"I don't mind, I'm used to it," said Jerry, "we can get used to 'most anything in this world. I've heard of folks sleeping on beds made of spikes, or nails, till their skins got as tough as alligators' hides—alligators is a kind of reptile we don't have in this creek. And then there is some good in having a blind side. When I was at school, yonder, and the boys undertook to jibe and jeer me for having a wooden leg, going about noisy and pegging the way I do, somehow it always happened they did it on the blind side of me, and so, I wasn't obliged to take notice and fight 'em—but somehow all them little pranks was on my blind side."

"Well, I haven't any blind side, Jerry," said Robert indignantly, "and if any boys make faces at you, I'll see 'em, I can't help seeing 'em, and I'll hit 'em too. You see, I'll hit 'em with both fists just as hard as I can pound."

"All right, my chicken," said Jerry, "It is always proper to defend other folks, though you ain't obliged always to defend yourself. Now if anybody come 'round jibing at the ma'am anytime, someway it would be sure not to be on my blind side. Things in this world is—cur'ous. And there's another good in having a blind side. I'm often asked by men and lads as hang 'round the mill here, to take a hand at cards. But how can I when I can't tell 'em from each other? They soon found I was no good at cards, and I spoiled all the games along of my blind eye. Yes, Robert, a blind eye is some good. There's lots of times when it's uncommon convenient—a blind side."

"But the leg, Jerry, is it any good to have a wooden leg?"

"Lots of good, when you has one," said Jerry, cheerfully. "Why, Robert, you look here; you can get cold in both feet. I never can have but one cold foot, and that I can sit on, you see, if so be I am taking a long, cold ride or so. Then, too, when folks have two legs there's two chances of breaking 'em. But if I break my left leg it's easy mended. All I have to do is take the axe and the plane, and a piece of wood, and make me another. Then again, one pair of shoes is two pairs. The same with stockings. It don't take near so much to make me trousers as it does other folks. Also, when I come to a big wet or muddy place, what do I do? I just put my peg in the middle of it, reach out my crutch, and over it I go! I never get my feet wet. How can I when I have only one foot?"

"Well, then, Jerry, wouldn't it be nice if all peoples had only one leg?"

"Well, no," said Jerry, "there ought to be a good many two-legged people in the world, for there are things only two-legged people can do. I says all these things in favor of one leg, because I have only one leg and it's always a good plan to be in favor of what you have, if you can't change it. If I fretted no end, it wouldn't grow me a new eye or a new leg, so what's the use of fretting? I'd better spend my ideas in looking up the good of what I've got."

"Jerry, are you going to live here at the mill all your life?" asked Robert.

"I wish I might," said Jerry, heartily.

"But, Jerry, suppose, suppose the mill all burnt up, like father says his house did? Or, suppose it fell down, mover says she believes it will some

Makes the Weak Strong

The way in which Hood's Sarsaparilla builds up people in run down or weakened state of health, conclusively proves the claim that this medicine "makes the weak strong." It does not act like a stimulant, imparting fictitious strength from which there must follow a reaction of greater weakness than before, but in the most natural way Hood's Sarsaparilla overcomes that tired feeling, creates an appetite, purifies the blood, and in short, gives great bodily, nerve, mental and digestive strength.

THE CAPTAIN'S BARGAIN.

ay; or, suppose, suppose everybody ied, Jerry, what would you do?"
"Well, then, I'd do something else.
hefe never is a time, when you an't do something else. If one ing's done, another comes on. It's ke the garden, Robert. In the pring, early, you plant lettuce, but e time comes when the lettuce is itter and goes to seed; but that's st the time when you can haul up e lettuce and plant your turnips or Thanksgivin' in the lettuce-beds.
ow, I says to the ma'am the other ay, 'What's the good of thinkin' ppose we can't pay the interest on e mortgage and the man fore-loses it? Why, ain't it just as good,' says, 'to keep cheerful, thinking ppose we can pay the whole mortage off, and have money enough ver to build a new mill? It's as asy to suppose one as the other,' I ays, 'and its much more agreeable,' ad the ma'am she allowed I was bout right."

"Jerry, what's a mortgage?" asked obert, eagerly.
"A mortgage?" said the philosoher, "a mortgage? Well, a mortage—Robert, what is that thing under the bark of this piece of wood?"
Robert looked.

"It's a worm, Jerry, eating all the ood into holes."
"Well, Robert, a mortgage is a big orm eatin' all a piece of property into holes."

"Dear me," said Robert, looking p at the mill roof. "So there are oles, Jerry; how did there come to e a mortgage on the mill?"

"I'm afraid," said Jerry, "it got ere because the Cap'n's father had hat are called drinking habits, obert, drinking habits."

"And, Jerry, what's drinking abits?"

"Drinking habits," said Jerry, sand-apering a letter-block, "are a big orm eating out a man's good sense, nd his good health, and his good elings, and his good fortune, and ll that's good about him."

"Oh, dear," said Robert. "I hope fa-er don't have any drinking habits."
"No more he don't," said Jerry.

"There's father coming down the oad with the schoolmaster!" cried obert, clambering down from the ork-bench, and flying to meet Cap-in 'Zekiel.

"You are very fond of this brave tle man," said the schoolmaster, as aptain 'Zekiel welcomed the boy, ith a shout.

"So I am," said the Captain. "He's ost me something—a deal more than knew at the time. I'll say it to you, choolmaster, because I often have said of you, that you drew it too sharp on Temperance. When I brought him home, 'Liza she took a shrewd woman's advantage. 'The child or the bottle, 'Zekiel; take your choice.' That was the gist of what she laid down. 'Can I throw away such a child as that,' I says to myself, 'for the sake of an appetite?' Well—

I gave my word—and 'Zekiel Allen's word is a thing he don't take back.
Then the tug came in. I never knew how I loved that bottle, nor what a hold it had on me, till I gave it up.
Then I knew. I tell you, schoolmaster, it was a pull. I never was one of your boys. I left school before your time. I'm glad you are raising the boys now, so they won't get so slaved to the bottle as I was, without knowing it. Well, I think the fight is done. And it's made me more of a man. I said I never drank to hurt.
But now I know that I've got clearer ideas, and a lighter feeling all through me, and look ahead more for my children, and enjoy myself more, and appreciate 'Liza Allen more, and set a better example to Jerry, and am a decenter person for these little shavers to lang'round, since I gave up that bottle. Yes, the boy, though he doesn't know it, made a man of me."

"It was nobly done, liberally, generously done, and it is written, 'The liberal soul shall be made fat,'" said
the schoolmaster.

And no doubt this was true to the Captain. Certainly he was none the less happy, when he and Eliza sat by the stove in the evening, each one with a twin, to see three little white-arrayed figures kneeling in a row by the trundle-bed, to say, "Now I lay me."

(To be Continued.)

THE SPECTACLES ON THE BIBLE.

The hymn "Ring the bells of heaven" brings to mind a joyful Christian who had been plucked as a brand from the burning, and as often as he gave it out in the little mission meeting he was wont to attend, he would tell the story of how the angels came to have joy over his repentance. He had a Christian wife who had prayed many weary years for his conversion. One night she retired to rest leaving her spectacles in her Bible at the spot where she had been reading. He returned late from his usual sitting with his boon companions, something, doubtless the good Spirit of the Lord, prompted him to look at the book, when his eye caught the first verse of Isaiah 28,
"Woe to the crown of pride, to the drunkards of Ephraim." He read several verses, and his mind was so impressed with it that he could not shake it off till he sought and found salvation. He became and continued a rejoicing Christian, till the Lord took him to share in the angel's song.

"WHEN I AWAKE."

"When I awake," it will be morning,

The night forever past,
With all its glooms and fearing,
With all its fever-dreaming;

Light, joyous light at last,
"When I awake"—then no more sleeping.

"When I awake," it will be morning,

The pathway blindly trod
With footsteps weak and failing,
Illumed and clear, revealing

The purpose of my God,
"When I awake"—then no more doubting.

"When I awake," it will be morning,

And no more crushing pain,
With all its tears and sighing,
With all its grief and crying,

No more the falling rain;
"When I awake, then no more grieving.

"When I awake," it will be morning;

Then rest, yes, perfect rest,
And no more care-worn musing,
No mountain cliff sad climbing,

No looking to the West;
"When I awake"—no weary toiling.

"When I awake," it will be morning,

The loved ones gathered home,
With no more words of parting,
No trembling fear-drop starting,

In heaven's celestial dome;
"When I awake"—then blessed greeting.

"When I awake," it will be morning;

A Sabbath-keeping time;
A seraph harp then tuning?
An angel lyre then sweeping?

Ah, more than this be mine
"When I awake," the new song singing.

"When I awake," it will be morning;

"I shall be satisfied;"
No distant, far-off reaching
For something ever fleeting;

With Thee, the crucified,
I shall awake, and know no longing.

"When I awake," it will be morning;

It hath not been revealed,
No mortal eye is seeing,
No mortal ear is hearing

The bliss not e'en conceived;
"When I awake"—what glory beaming!

"When I awake," it will be morning;

Ah, then, why fear to sleep?
See, from the tomb uprising,
The Saviour interceding;

My soul He'll safely keep Till I awake—Oh! glorious waking!

CRUELTY TO AFRICAN WIVES.

The Rev. A. C. Good, a missionary in Africa, writes: "The lot of woman is hard indeed. Here, more than anywhere else in this country, she is bought and sold, married and unmarried, without any regard to her own preferences. Once married into a family, that is, once they have paid for her, she belongs to that family. If her husband dies, she must marry some other man in the family. If she declines the man who offers to marry her, then she has committed a heinous crime called here 'hating her husband,' the punishment for which is usually death. In one of the towns we visited, an old woman came to us and said she was to be killed, and declaring that she was innocent of any offence. We inquired into the matter, and were told that she was not to be killed, she was only to have her nose and ears cut off, and that she deserved it, for she had 'hated her husband.' On further inquiry we found that this was her offence. She had been married into a small family and all its male members had died, except one small boy, her husband being the last who died. As only the boy was left to marry her, she desired to return to her own people or to marry into some other family; but no; the decayed family were not to lose their money in that way. The boy-head of the family now that all the men were dead said, 'you shall marry me; I will be you husband,' i. e., 'you shall serve and obey me,' which is the prominent idea in marriage here. Naturally the widow declined, and so the charge was brought against her that she 'hated her husband.'"

ALMOST A MARTYR.

Rev. Edmund Rigg, of Jaffna, in speaking of the present position of Sivaism in Jaffna, asserted that it was still very vigorous, and gave an instance from his experience with regard to the proposed baptism of a high-caste youth, which had been prevented by the coercion of his neighbors. As another instance of the persecution which those who would follow Christ have to endure, he told a story of one of his native workers named Peter, who narrowly escaped being burned to death by some incendiaries on the eve of a great baptismal service. In spite of the manifest hatred of the Sivites, as shown by the burning of his house, the following night seven men and women were baptised for Christ. He held that such heroism as that could not be surpassed in English annals. He asked what they were to do with these splendid Singhalese Churches, many of which were self-supporting. Were they to go back? God forbid! They would still stick to their guns.

A POINTED ARGUMENT.

A good story is told of the late Mr. George Dodds in an English paper. He went on a deputation once with a Scotch minister to Eyemouth, to a temperance meeting, at which the latter advocated the use of alcohol as a food. They missed their way back, and the minister, tired out, lay down by the road-side to rest. Dodds saw a hedgehog near, wrapped it in a handkerchief, and brought it to his friend for a pillow. The "points" soon made themselves felt. "What in the world is that?" asked the minister. "It's a good creature of God," solemnly declared Dodds, parodying the minister's argument for moderation.

A TEMPERANCE TALE.

A mouse fell into a beer vat, and a cat passing by saw the struggling little creature. The mouse said to the cat:

"Help me out of my difficulty."

"If I do I shall eat you," said the cat.

"Very well," replied the mouse, "I would rather be eaten by a decent cat than drowned in such a horrible mess of stuff as this."

It was a sensible cat, and said: "I shall certainly eat you, and you must promise me on your word of honor that I may do so."

"Very well, I give you the promise."

So the cat fished the mouse out, and, trusting to the promise she dropped it for an instant. The mouse darted away and crept into a hole in the corner, where the cat could not get him.

"But didn't you promise me I might eat you?" said Puss.

"Yes, I did," replied the mouse, "but didn't you know that when I made that promise I was in liquor?"

And how many promises made in liquor have been kept?

ORIGIN OF A BEAUTIFUL HYMN.

"One day," says a writer in The Triumph of Faith, "Mr. Wesley was sitting by an open window, looking out over the bright and beautiful fields. Presently a little bird flitting about in the sunshine attracted his attention. Just then a hawk came down toward the little bird. The poor thing, very much frightened, was darting here and there, trying to find some place of refuge. In the bright sunny air, in the leafy trees in the green field, there was no hiding-place from the grasp of the hawk. But seeing an open window and a man sitting beside it, the bird flew, in its extremity, toward it, and, with a beating heart and quivering wing, found refuge in Mr. Wesley's bosom. He sheltered it from the threatening danger and saved it from a cruel death. Mr. Wesley was at that time suffering from severe trials, and was feeling trouble as much as did the trembling little bird that nestled so safely in his bosom. So he took up his pen and wrote that sweet hymn:

Jesus, lover of my soul
Let me to Thy bosom fly,
While the nearer waters roll,
While the tempest still is high.

That prayer grew into one of the most beautiful hymns in our language, and multitudes of people, when in sorrow and danger, have found comfort while they have said or sung the last line of that hymn.

HOW NYANGANDI SWAM TO CHURCH.

Nyangandi lived in West Africa, near the Ogowe river. She was going away from the missionary's house one Saturday afternoon, where she had been to sell bunches of plantains to the missionary, when his wife said: "Now you must not forget that you have promised to come to-morrow to church."

"Yes," the girl replied. "I will surely come if I am alive."

But the next morning she found somebody had stolen her canoe, and no one would lend her one to go to church in. But she had promised to go, and she felt that she must. She swam all the way! The current was swift, the water deep and the river fully a third of a mile wide, but by swimming diagonally she succeeded in crossing the river.

Remember this little heathen girl in West Africa when you feel tempted to stay away from the house of God for some trivial reason.

MISSIONS IN ALASKA.

Six religious denominations are now at work in the territory. Their stations are generally some distance apart. The Presbyterians have established their post on the "thirty-mile strip," as the southern portion of this island is called. The Friends have a mission on Douglas Island, the Methodists have taken up Oonah Island and Unga; the Baptists, Kodiak and Afognak; the Episcopal Church has a station on the Yukon River at Anvik; the Swedish Missionary Society has two posts—one at Yakutat, and the other north of St. Michaels. Unalaklik; the Moravians have two posts—one on the Nushagak river and one on the Kuskokwim river; Mr. Duncan's New Metla-katla on Annetta Island, and a Church of England Mission at Nuklukaoyet, on the Yukon river. This makes a total of eighteen Protestant Missions established in Alaska. But eighteen stations are not sufficient for a territory two-thirds as large as all the states lying east of the Mississippi river. These people are in our own country—"the heathen at our own door."—and we owe them the Gospel.

Nature's Great Remedy for Bright's Disease of the Kidneys, The Gouty Diathesis, Nervous Dyspepsia, Etc., Etc.

Dr. Wm. A. Hammond, of Washington, D. C., Surgeon-General U.S. Army (retired), Professor of Diseases of the Mind and Nervous System in the University of New York, Etc.

"I have for some time made use of the Buffalo Lithia Water in cases of Affections of the Nervous System complicated with Bright's Disease of the Kidney or with a Gouty Diathesis. The results have been eminently satisfactory. Lithia has for many years been a Favorite Remedy with me in like cases, but the Buffalo Water Certainly Acts Better than any Extemporaneous Solution of The Lithia Salts, and is, moreover, better borne by the Stomach. I also often prescribe it in those cases of Cerebral Hyperæmia, resulting from Over Mental Work—in which the condition called Nervous Dyspepsia exists—and generally with MARKED BENEFIT."

Dr. John W. Williamson, Boydton, Va.

"A member of my family suffered from Chronic Bright's Disease of the Kidney. There was Dropsical effusion, the urine rich in Albumen, an abundant sediment containing Casts and decided manifestations of Uræmic Poisoning, especially serious impairment of Vision—Uræmic Amaurosis. After a signal failure of every remedy suggested by several eminent medical men, and when the condition of the patient was regarded as well-nigh hopeless, trial was made of Buffalo Lithia Water, Spring No. 2. The result was relief from the threatening symptoms so prompt and decided as to be almost incredible to any but an eye-witness. The continued use of the water for several months resulted in a complete recovery. Several Years have now Elapsed and There has Been no Return of the Disease.

"From the action of this Water in this particular case, I have no hesitancy in expressing the opinion that as a remedy in this malady, so difficult of successful treatment it is unsurpassed, if, indeed it has any equal, either among medicines or mineral water. To all suffering from Bright's Disease, in whatever stage, my advice would be to give it trial. It can certainly do no harm, and in very many cases will do great good."

Springs open for guests. Water, in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles, $5, per case, F. O. B., here.

"He that passeth by and meddleth with strife belonging not to him is like one that taketh a dog by the ears." Prov 26: 17.

Solomon here deprecates the habit of rushing in between contestants, of taking part in the antagonisms of others of joining in fights they ought to shun. They do no good to others and get damage for themselves. He compares it to the experiment of taking a dog by the ears. Nothing so irritates the canines as to be clutched by the lugs. Take them by the back of the neck and lift them and it does not seem to hurt or offend, but you take the dog by the ear, and he will take you with his teeth. In all the history of kennels no intelligent or spirited dog will stand that. "Now," says Solomon, "you go into quarrels or controversies that are not yours and you will get lacerated and torn, and bitten." He that passeth by and meddleth with strife belonging not to him is like one that taketh a dog by the ears."

This is a time of resounding ecclesiastical quarrel. Never within your memory or mine has the air been so full of missiles. The Presbyterian Church has on hand a controversy so great that it finds it prudent to postpone its settlement for at least one more year, hoping that something will turn up. Somebody might die or a new General Assembly may have grace to handle the exciting questions. The Episcopal Church has cast out some recalcitrants, and its digestive organs are taxed to the utmost in trying to assimilate others. "Shall women preach?" "Or be sent as delegates to Conference?" are questions that have put many of our Methodist brethren on the "anxious seat." And the waters in some of the great baptistries are troubled waters. Because of the controversies throughout Christendom the air is now like an August afternoon about five o'clock, when it has been steaming hot all day, and clouds are gathering, and there are lions of thunder with grumbling voices and flashing eyes coming forth from their cloudy lairs, and people are waiting for the full burst of the tempest. I am not much of a weather prophet, but the clouds look to me mostly like wind clouds. It may be a big blow, but I hope it will soon be over. In regard to the Battle of the Creeds, I am every day asked what I think about it. I want to make it so plain this morning what I think that no one will ever ask again.

Let those who are jurymen in the case, I mean those who in the different ecclesiastical courts have the questions put directly before them, weigh and decide. Let the rest of us keep out. The most damaging thing on earth is religious controversy. No one ever comes out of it as good a man as he goes in. Some of the ministers, in all denominations, who, before the present acerbity were good and kind and useful, now seem almost swearing mad. These brethren I notice always open their violent meetings with prayer before devouring each other, thus saying grace before meat. They have a moral hydrophobia that makes us think they have taken a dog by the ears. They never read the imprecatory psalms of David with such zest as since the Briggs and Newton and MacQueary and Bridgman and Brooks questions got into full swing. May the rams of the sheepfold soon have their horns sawed off. Before the controversies are settled, a good many ministers will, through what they call liberalism, be landed into practical infidelity, and others through what they call conservatism, will shrink up into bigots tight and hard as the mummies of Egypt which got through their controversies three thousand years ago.

This trouble throughout Christendom, was directly inspired of Satan. He saw that too much good was being done. Recruits were being gathered by hundreds of thousands to the Gospel standard. The victories for God and the truth were too near together. Too many churches were being dedicated. Too many ministers were being ordained. Too many philanthropies were being fostered. Too many souls were being saved. It had been a dull time in the Nether World, and the arrivals were too few. So Satan one day rose upon his throne, and said, "Ye powers of darkness, hear!" And all up and down the caverns the cry was: "Hear! Hear!" Satan said: "There is that American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. It must either be demolished or crippled, or the first thing you know they will have all nations brought to God. Apollon the Younger! You go up to Andover and get the professors discussing whether the heathen can be saved without the Gospel. Divert them from the work of missions and get them in angry convention in a room at Young's Hotel, Boston, and by the time they adjourn, the cause of foreign missions will be gloriously and magnificently injured. Diabolus, the Younger! You go up and get Union Theological Seminary of New York and the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church at Detroit at swords' points and diverted from the work of making earnest ministers of religion, and turn that old Presbyterian Church, which has been keeping us out of customers for hundreds of years into a splendid pandemonium on a small scale. Abaddon the Third! You go up and assault that old Episcopal Church, which has been storming the heavens for centuries with the sublimest prayers that were ever uttered—church of Bishop Leighton, Bishop White and Bishop McIlvaine, and get that denomination discussing men instead of discussing the eternities. Abaddon the Fourth! You go up to that old Methodist Church, which has, through her revivals, sent millions to heaven, which we would otherwise have added to our population, the church of Wesley and Matthew Simpson, against which we have an especial grudge, and get them so absorbed in discussing whether women shall take part in her conference, that they shall not have so much time to discuss how many sons and daughters she will take to glory."

What amazes me most is that all people do not see that the entire movement at this time all over Christendom is Satanic. Many of the infernal attacks are sly and hidden and strategic and so ingenious that they are not easily discovered. But here is a bold and uncovered attempt of the powers of darkness to split up the churches, to get ministers to take each other by the throat, to make religion a laughing-stock of earth and hell, to leave the Bible with no more respect or authenticity than an old almanac of 1822, which told what would be the change of weather six months ahead and in what quarter of the moon it is best to plant turnips. In a word, the effort is to stop the evangelization of the world. It seems to me very much like this: There has been a railroad accident and many are wounded and dying. There are several drug-stores near the scene of casualty. All the doctors and druggists are needed and needed right away. Bandages, stimulants, anæsthetics, medicines of all sorts. What are the doctors and druggists doing? Discussing the contents of some old bottles on the top shelf, bottles of medicine which some doctors and druggists mixed two or three hundred years ago. "Come doctors!" "Come druggists!" cry the people, "and help these wounded and dying that are being brought from beneath the timbers of the crushed rail train. In a little while it will be too late. Come for God's sake! Come right away!" "No," says a doctor, "not until we have settled whether the medicine on that top shelf was rightly mixed. I say there were too many drops of laudanum in it and this man says there were too many drops of camphire, and we must get this question settled before we can attend to the railroad accident." And one doctor takes another doctor by the collar and pushes him back against the counter, and one of the druggists says: "If you will not admit that I am right about that one bottle, I will smash every bottle in your apothecary store," and he proceeds to smash. Meanwhile, on the lower shelf, plainly marked and within easy reach, are all the medicines needed for the helping of the sufferers by the accident, and in that drawer, easily opened, are bandages and splints, for the lack of which fifty people are dying outside the drug-store. Before I apply this thought, every one sees its application. Here is this old world, and it is off track. Sin and sorrow have collided with it. The groan of agony is fourteen hundred million-voiced. God has opened for relief and cure a great Sanitarium, a great House of Mercy, and all its shelves are filled with balsams, with catholicons, with help, glorious help, tremendous help, help so easily administered that you need not get upon any step-ladder to reach it. You can reach it on your knees and then hand it to all the suffering and the sinning and the dying. Comfort for the troubled! Pardon for all the guilty! Peace for all the dying! But while the world is seeking the relief and perishing for lack of it, what of the church? Why, it is full of fighting doctors. On the top shelf are some old bottles which several hundred years ago, Calvin or Arminius or the members of the Synod of Dort, or the formers of the Nicene creed filled with holy mixtures, and until we get a revision of these old bottles and find out whether we must like a teaspoonful or tablespoonful, and whether before or after meals, let the nations suffer and groan, and die. Save the bottles by all means, if you cannot save anything else!

Now, what part shall you and I take in this controversy which fills all Christendom with clamor? My advice: Take no part. At a time of riot all lawyers of cities advise good citizens to stay at home or in their places of business and in this time of religious riot I advise you to go about your regular work for God. Leave the bottles on the higher shelves for others to fight about and take the two bottles on the shelf within easy reach, the two bottles which are all this dying world needs; the one filled with a potion which is for the cleansing of all in, the other filled with a potion which is for the soothing of all suffering. Two Gospel bottles! Christ mixed them out of his own tears and blood. In them is no human admixture. Depend no time on the mysteries! You, a man only five or six feet high, ought not try to wade in ocean a thousand feet deep. My own experience has been vivid. I devoted the most of my time for years in trying to understand God's Eternal Decrees, and I was determined to find out why the Lord let sin come into the world, and I set out to explore the doctrine of the Trinity, and with a yardstick to measure the throne of the Infinite. As with all my predecessors, the attempt was a dead failure. For the last thirty years I have not spent two minutes in studying the controverted points of theology, and if I live thirty years longer I will not spend the thousandth part of a second in such exploration. I know two things, and these I will devote all the years of my life in proclaiming: God will through Jesus Christ pardon sin and he will comfort trouble.

Credo has their uses, but just now the church is creeded to death. The young men entering the ministry, are going to be launched in the thickest fog that ever settled on the coasts. As I am told that in all our services students of Princeton and Union and Drew and other theological seminaries are present and as these words will come to thousands of young men who are soon to enter the ministry, let me say to such and through them to their associates, keep out of the bewildering, belittling, destroying and angry controversies abroad. The questions our doctors of divinity are trying to settle will not be settled until the day after the Day of Judgment. It is such a poor economy of time to spend years and years in trying to fathom the unfathomable, when in five minutes in heaven we will know all we want to know. Wait till we get our throne. Wait until the light of eternity flashes upon our newly ascended spirits. It is useless for ants on different sides of a mole-hill to try to discuss the comparative heights of Mount Blanc and Mount Washington. Let me say to all young men about to enter the ministry that soon the greatest novelty in the world will be the unadulterated religion of Jesus Christ. Preach that and you will have a crowd.

The world is sick to regurgitation with the modern quacks in religion. The world has been swinging off from the old Gospel but it will swing back and by the time you young men go into the pulpits the cry will be coming up from all the millions of mankind "Give us the bread of life; no sweetened bread, no bread with sickly raisins stuck here and there into it, but old-fashioned bread as God our Mother mixed it and baked it!"

You see, God knew as much when he made the Bible as he knows now. He has not learned a single thing in six thousand years. He knew at the start that the human race would go wrong and what would be the best means of its restoration and redemption. And the law which was thundered on Mount Sinai, from whose top I had the two tables of stone in yonder wall transported, is the perfect law. And the gospel which Christ announced while dying on that Mount from which I brought that stone in yonder wall and which Paul preached on that hill from which I brought yonder granite, is the Gospel that is going to save the world. Young man, put on that Gospel armor! No other sword will triumph like that. No other shield will protect like that. No other helmet will glance off the battle-axes like that. Our Theological Seminaries are doing glorious work, but if ever such Theological Seminaries shall cease to prepare young men for this plain Gospel advocacy, and shall become mere philosophical schools for guessing about God, and guessing about the Bible, and guessing about the soul they will cease their usefulness, and young men, as in olden time, when they would study for the Gospel ministry, will put themselves under the care of some intelligent and warm-hearted pastor, and kneel with him in family prayer at the parsonage, and go with him into the room of the sick and the dying, and see what victories the grace of God can gain when the couch of the dying saint is the Marathon.

That is the way the mighty ministers of the Gospel were made in olden times. Oh, for a great wave of revival to roll over our theological seminaries and our pulpits and our churches and our ecclesiastical courts and over all Christendom! That would be the end of controversy. While such a deluge would float the ark of God higher and higher, it would put all the bears and tigers and reptiles of raging ecclesiasticism fifteen cubits under.

Now, what is the simple fact that you in the pew and Sabbath School class and reformatory association and we in the pulpits have to deal with? It is this: that God has somewhere, and it matters not where, but somewhere, provided a great heaven, great for quietness for those who want quiet, great for vast assemblage for those who like multitudes, great for architecture for those who like architecture, great for beautiful landscape for those who like beautiful landscape, great for music for those who like music, great for processions for those who like armies on white horses and great for anything that one especially desires in such a rapturous dominion: and through the doings of One who was born about five miles south of Jerusalem and died about ten minutes walk from its eastern gate, all may enter that great heaven for the earnest and heartfelt asking. Is that all? That is all. What then is your work and mine? Our work is to persuade people to face that way and start thitherward and finally go in. But has not religion something to do with this world as well as the next? Oh, yes; but do you not see that if the people start for heaven on their way there they will do all the good they can? They will at the very start of the journey get so much of the spirit of Christ which is a spirit of kindness and self-sacrifice and generosity and burden-bearing and helpfulness, that every step they take will resound with good deeds. Oh, get your religion off of stilts! Get it down out of the high towers! Get it on a level with the wants and woes of our poor human race! Get it out of the dusty theological books that few people read and put it in their hearts and lives. Good thing is it to profess religion when you join the church but every day somehow we ought to profess religion.

A peculiar patchwork quilt was, during the Civil War, made by a lady and sent to the hospitals at the front. She had a boy in the army, and was naturally interested in the welfare of soldiers. But what a patchwork quilt she sent! On every block of the quilt was a passage of Scripture or a verse of a hymn. The months and years of the war went by. On that quilt many a wounded man had lain and suffered and died. But one morning the hospital nurse saw a patient under that blanket kissing the figure of a leaf in the quilt and the nurse supposed he was only wandering in his mind. But no, he was the son of the mother who had made the quilt and he recognized that figure of a leaf as part of a gown his mother used to wear, and it reminded him of home. "Do you know where this quilt came from?" he asked. The nurse answered, "I can find out, for there was a card pinned fast to it, and I will find that." Sure enough, it confirmed what he thought. Then the nurse pointed to a passage of Scripture in the block of the quilt, the passage which says: "When he was yet a great way off his father saw him and ran and fell on his neck and kissed him." "Yes," said the dying soldier, "I was a great way off, but God has met me and had compassion on me." "Shall I write to your mother and tell her that the lost one is found and the dead is alive again?" He answered, "I wish you would, if it would not be too much trouble." Do you suppose that woman who made that quilt and filled it with Scripture passages had any trouble about who Melchizedek was or how the doctrine of God's sovereignty can be harmonized with man's free agency, or who wrote the Pentateuch, or the inconsistencies of the Nicene creed? No, no; go to work for God and suffering humanity and all your doubts and fears and mysteries and unbeliefs put together will not be heavy enough to stir the chemist's scales, which is accustomed to weighing one-fiftieth part of a grain of chamomile flowers. Why stop a moment to understand the mysteries when there are so many certitudes? Why spend our time exploring the dark garrets and coal-holes of a great palace which has above ground one hundred rooms flooded with sunshine? It takes all my time to absorb what has been revealed, so that I have no time to upturn and root out and drag forth what has not been revealed. The most of the effort to solve mysteries and explore the inexplicable and harmonize things, is an attempt to help the

HE CRIED "CHRISTOS."

Lord out of theological difficulties. Good enough intention, my brother, no doubt; but the Lord is not anxious to have you help him. He will keep his throne without your assistance. Don't be afraid that the Bible will fall apart from inconsistencies. It hung together many centuries before you were born, and your funeral sermon will be preached from a text taken from its undisturbed authenticity.

Do you know that I think that if all ministers in all denominations would stop this nonsense of ecclesiastical strife and take hold the word of God, the only question with each of us being how many souls we can bring to Christ and in how short a time, the Lord would soon appear for the salvation of all nations? When the young Queen of England visited Scotland many years ago, great preparations were made for her reception. The vessel in which she sailed was far out at sea, but every hill in Scotland was illumined with bonfires and torches. The night was set on fire with artificial illumination. The Queen, standing on ship's deck, knew from that that Scotland was full of heartiest welcome, and the thunder of the great guns at Glasgow and Edinburgh castle woke up all the echoes. Do you know that I think that our King would land if we were only ready to receive him? Why not call to him from all our churches, from all our hospitals, from all our homes? Why cannot we who are now living see his descent? Must it all be postponed to later ages? Why cannot the final glory roll in now? Why cannot this dying century feel the incoming tides of the oceans of heavenly mercy? Must our eyes close in death and our ears take on the deafness of the tomb, and these hearts beat their last throb before the day comes in? O, Christ! Why tarriest thou? Wilt thou not, before we go the way of all the earth, let us see thy scarred feet under some noonday cloud coming this way? Before we die let us behold thy hands that were spiked, spread out in benediction for a lost race. And why not let us, with our mortal ears, hear that voice which spoke peace as thou didst go up, speak pardon and emancipation and love and joy to all nations as thou comest down?

But the skies do not part. I hear no rumbling of chariot wheels coming down over the sapphire. There is no swoop of wings. I see no flash of angelic appearances. All is still. I hear nothing but the tramp of my own heart as I pause between these utterances. The King does not land because the world is not ready, and the church is not ready. To clear the way for the Lord's coming let us devote all our energies of body, mind and soul. A Russian general riding over the battlefield, his horse treading amid the dying and dead, a wounded soldier asked him for water, but the officer did not understand his language and knew not what the poor fellow wanted. Then the soldier cried out: "Christos!" and that word meant sympathy and help, and the Russian officer dismounted and put to the lips of the sufferer a cooling draught. Be that the charmed word with which we go forth to do our whole duty. In many languages it has only a little difference of termination. Christos! It stands for sympathy. It stands for help. It stands for heaven. Christos! In that name we were baptised. In that name we took our first sacrament. That will be the battle-shout that will win the whole world for God. Christos! Put it on our banners when we march! Put it on our lips when we die! Put it in the funeral psalm at our obsequies! Put it on the plain slab over our grave! Christos! Blessed be his glorious name forever! Amen!

THE POPE'S LETTER ON LABOR.

POPE LEO XIII., has addressed an Encyclical Letter to the Roman Catholic world dealing with the Labor question. He refers to the changed relations of master and workmen, the great fortunes of private persons, and the poverty of the masses, the self-reliance and combination of the workers and the general moral deterioration as being among the causes of the universal distress. He warns the church against crafty agitators, but declares that some remedy must be quickly found for the misery and wretchedness of the poor. He condemns the concentration of trade in the form of monopolies, reviews the Socialist theory of relief and condemns it unsparingly as against nature and justice. The Socialistic tenets are exhaustively discussed only to be set aside as worthless. The Pope then proceeds to urge the inviolability of private property; the recognition of the church and its influence and the more generous treatment of workmen by the rich. The key-note of the letter is the sacredness of private property and the exaltation and recognition of honorable labor, the according of whose rights, under Christian auspices he believes alone can save society. This pronouncement by the head of the Roman Catholic Church, is an interesting addition to the prevalent discussion of the Labor problem.

OUR HEATHEN AT HOME.

THE REV. J. S. STONE'S MISSIONARY WORK IN THE HEART OF THE METROPOLIS.

From the Ganges to the Hudson—Open-Air Preaching—Feeding the Hungry—Splitting Wood for a Supper and a Bed—Bringing in the denizens of the Slums—Asbury M. E. Church's Noble Work.

ONE of the most serious problems that faces the minister of Christ in New York City is the ingathering of the non-church-going element, among them the vicious and depraved, who form no insignificant portion of the city's population. Despite the hundreds of churches, and many missions that are doing organized and effective work, there is still, in the purlieus of the East and West sides of town, a considerable class who may be justly regarded as being as far from Christianity as the heathen of Africa. They resent any invasion of their slums, hugging their wretchedness and vice, and yielding only to the influence of kindly contact and interest in their personal welfare.

The Asbury Methodist Episcopal Church, one of the noblest edifices in the metropolis, is situated on Washington Square, in the center of an old and very aristocratic quarter of New York. On every side are the mansions of the rich and influential, many of them historic, for the Square has been at different times the residence of the most distinguished families on Manhattan Island. Yet, not far distant from this sacred pile, is one of the most depraved sections of the city—a district that might well make righteous men and women shudder as they contemplate the depths to which humanity may be dragged by sin. In April, 1890, the Rev. J. S. Stone became pastor of the Asbury Methodist Episcopal Church. This young clergyman, who had for seven years been engaged in missionary work in India, found himself in a field where his experience would be invaluable.

Missionary Spirit.

"I resolved to try to reach the heathen at home," he said, referring to the plan of his work. "I am as much a missionary here, on the banks of the Hudson, as when, in Calcutta, on the banks of the Ganges, I sought the conversion of those who thronged the Indian bazaars."

At that time, the congregations that attended service in the beautiful old cathedral building had become greatly depleted, so as to cause most Methodists to say, "Sell out and go up-town." With true missionary spirit, Dr. Stone began at once to work in the neighboring streets, among the tenement and boarding-house population that throng this vicinity. An interest was immediately awakened, and the empty pews began rapidly to fill with a class rarely found inside church walls. Simple preaching, enthusiastic congregational singing and practical adaptation of the Saviour's manner of employing both a gospel of words and deeds, were the methods inaugurated. For the bodily sick, a dispensary was established; for the idle, an employment bureau, and for the hungry and homeless, a woodyard. Thus were reached multitudes who would otherwise have been in accessible and impervious to the Gospel teaching; their hearts were touched.

Open-Air Preaching.

Meanwhile, the largely increased attendance at the church made it evident that God was blessing the work. Never was the Gospel more earnestly set forth than to those throngs of the poor and depraved who assembled from the side streets and from their dingy lanes and forbidding hovels to listen to the kindly preacher who had already won their confidence. Street services were held while the weather permitted, and these were very largely attended. Among the crowds at these gatherings, which had no other canopy than the sky, with the grand old trees of the square for a foreground, were many Catholics and hundreds who never enter a church. The outdoor meetings last from April till the snows fall, and have been the means of bringing into the world many prominent citizens interested in reaching the lower stratum of the masses. Bishop Thoburn, of India, Rev. Dr. McGrew, and others of eminence in the pulpit, have preached on these occasions to the motley crowds that fill Washington Square. Many conversions have resulted from these open-air services.

Every Sunday evening, at 6.30 o'clock, a special service is held in the church for the unemployed—the "Army of Despair," as they have been denominated. As the audiences at these meetings constantly change, fully 10,000 persons have attended during the past year, many of them hearing for the first time the Gospel of Hope. The hundreds who gather there are of the poorest class, friendless, homeless and almost Godless.

Feeding the Hungry.

Bread and coffee are served to the hungry, after which follows a gospel meeting, with an appeal specially adapted to the spiritual needs of so unusual an audience. The good done is beyond measure. Many seekers arise and come forward to the altar and pledge themselves to begin a new life for Christ.

Dr. Stone's scheme of practical philanthropy has some unique features. At 15 Minetta Street in February last, he established a wood and coal yard which, open every day but Sunday, has helped many who had nothing between them and the street. Here men of all trades and nationalities come to earn bread and food by working two or three hours sawing and splitting wood (see illustration.) They continue to do this until remunerative work can be found. In three months four hundred men have taken advantage of this opportunity to work, thus saving themselves from wandering hungry in the streets. At times five a day have applied for work. Each man is required to saw and split into kindlings eight sticks of cord-wood, and this pile lies between him and a good, clean bed and nourishing food. The wood and coal are sold to cover the expense of running the wood-yard. Clerks, opticians, watchmakers, butchers, printers, laborers, and men of all trades, who through misfortune have become homeless, are thus saved from being around the streets, or haunting station houses at night.

In the Dispensary (see illustration) one meets the sick poor, who find here not only skilful medical assistance, but invariably kind and sympathetic treatment. Hundreds of the poor, sad, dejected victims of disease, vice and misfortune throng this truly Christian institution. Many visits are made to the homes of the sick by the doctors and the attending deaconess.

Their wretched patients are found in cold, cheerless, garrets; dark and filthy cellars, with little or no food. They are provided for in every way by the good samaritans from the Dispensary, and are always pointed, when most susceptible to "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world," the great Burden-Bearer.

The Employment Bureau.

The Employment Bureau of Asbury Church has passed the merely experimental stage, and is now a branch of considerable importance. It is open all the year round, and the applicants for work come by hundreds, every month; a very large percentage of them having been idle for weeks. An average of twenty per month are supplied with permanent employment, while a much larger number find temporary work. Many of the applicants have no trade; almost all are in dire necessity. Among them is a proportion of fallen women who are helped as far as possible, and encouraged to lead better lives. As in other branches of the work the spiritual results here have been very encouraging.

On Sunday afternoons at 3-30 o'clock, mass meetings are held for the purpose of attracting on-church goers. Special questions are discussed and addresses delivered by men prominent in Christian work. Col. Elliot F. Shepard, Anthony Comstock, Elbridge F. Gerry, and others have spoken. Hon. Chauncey M. Depew, as promised to give an address at an early date, and ex-President Cleveland is also expected to do the same when an opportunity offers. The object is to get prominent laymen to take an interest in work of this kind, and thus attract intelligent audiences who would otherwise go off and spend Sunday afternoons in the park or museum.

"We keep up communication as far as possible with those for whom we find permanent employment," said Dr. Stone, "and also those who experience conversion. Many have been gathered into the church. Very many encouraging letters have been received from worthy men and women who have found a round of the ladder by which they may mount to a better manhood and womanhood. We aim to reach those who need the Gospel most. And I am gratified to state that the better classes are taking a keen interest in the work."

Such is an outline of the noble work to which the Asbury M. E. Church, its pastor and people are devoting themselves, and which, with the divine blessing, has already brought to Christ many souls from the "dark places" of the great metropolis.

REV. H. M. WARREN.

Pastor of the People's Baptist Church, on the West Side of New York.

ANY circumstances have combined to interest the public in the People's Baptist Church, in New York, and its young pastor, whose portrait is here given. Mr. Warren graduated a few weeks ago from Union Theological Seminary, and at once commenced his work in the church. The church needed just such a man—one full of energy, vigor and aptitude for work. It is located on forty-eighth street near Fifth avenue, in the centre of a densely populated district. Within a few blocks are 200,000 persons, a large proportion of whom never go to church, and 3,000 children who never attend Sunday School. It has no church building, but worships in the basement of another church. Nevertheless its members are full of hope, and as there are some vacant lots near at hand, they are working earnestly to get enough money to erect a church edifice. So much of spiritual good has already been accomplished, and the sphere is so large and so sorely in need of just such work as they are doing, that every one who knows of the effort wishes them God-speed. Mr. Warren, though a young man, has had experience which specially qualifies him for this particular work. He has labored during his student life among the lowest classes in lower New York; he has been very successful in the work among newsboys and city waifs, and has acted as honorary chaplain of the women's home known as the Riverside Rest, where women who have been imprisoned are received when they come from the island and helped to reform. We sincerely hope that in the new sphere on which he has entered, he will be blessed of God. Subscriptions toward his building fund may be sent to the Treasurer, Mr. Daniel Feitner, 692 Ninth avenue. Further information may be obtained from Rev. H. M. Warren, 100 East Seventy-first street.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Evidence from the Tomb—The Baccarat Exposure—A Misdirected Letter—Peril on a Bridge.

VALUABLE Documentary evidence has been found in a grave in Connecticut. The New Haven Register says that application was recently made to the authorities for permission to disinter the body of a woman buried seventeen years ago. The request was granted and resulted in the discovery of a note which will be used in a lawsuit now pending. It appears that a citizen of New Haven consented many years ago to act as trustee for two fatherless children. When they came of age a few years since, a dispute arose about $250. The trustee said it had been paid to their mother, but the orphans alleged it was owing by him. They said that their mother told them that she had consented to his borrowing the amount and had taken his note for it. The note could not be found after her death and the orphans were therefore unable to substantiate their claim. One of her friends, however, recently furnished a clue to its hiding-place. She said that she had seen their mother sew a paper in the body of her dress as if for safe keeping. They therefore examined the dress in which she was buried and there found the long-sought note. They have been embarrassed and inconvenienced by the very method she adopted to protect their interests. It is not the first time that well-meaning but injudicious parents have injured their children. It is, however, never done so disastrously as when they instil into their minds selfish principles to enable them "to get on in the world." (Psalms 78 : 5, 7.)

A Lover's Misdirected Letter has caused him considerable mortification. A Maine journal recently received a letter addressed to the editor of the young-people's column. It did not seem appropriate for publication as it was an offer of marriage couched in very ardent and effusive language. The writer signed it with his first name only, and there was therefore but slight clue to his identity. The editor laid it aside, but by some error in the hurry of publishing-day it was handed to the compositors and published in the journal. The chagrin of the writer was great when he read his letter in print. He had written a letter which he did intend for publication, on the same evening as he wrote his proposal of marriage and had misdirected the envelopes. The mistake was soon rectified and beyond his own mortification no harm was done, as none of the readers of the journal would be likely to apply to themselves the offer contained in the letter, or appropriate the pledges which the writer gave of undying affection. The letter was doubtless read as many persons read the invitations and promises of God's Word, taking no personal interest in them though in the latter case the words are of vital concern to all who read them. (Acts 2 : 39.)

A Royal Gambler has had a Disagreeable experience in an English court of law. A judge and jury have been trying a case in which a Scotch baronet who was an intimate friend of the Prince of Wales, claimed damages from certain persons for injuring his character by circulating a false report that he had been caught cheating at cards. The Prince was a witness at the trial and had to submit to cross-examination. The alleged cheating took place at the house of the defendants, where they were entertaining the Prince of Wales and a party of distinguished guests. It appeared from the evidence that the host objected to gambling, but yielded to oblige the Prince, who is so fond of the game of Baccarat that when he goes visiting he carries the paraphernalia of the game with him. During the progress of the game the hostess and some members of her family watched the baronet, and allege that they saw him cheating. The Prince was informed of the fact and he and two gentlemen, who acted as his advisers, repeated the charge to the accused man. It was agreed on all sides that the accusation should be kept secret, if he would sign a document pledging himself never to touch cards again. He protested his innocence of the charge, but agreed to sign in order to save the Prince from association with the scandal. The pledge of secrecy was broken by some one concerned and, as the facts became public, the suit for slander was brought. It was, however, dismissed, the judge and jury evidently believing that the plaintiff did actually cheat as alleged. Several religious bodies have passed resolutions deploring the Prince's association with gambling and the English newspapers have published articles expressing their regret at the scandal and the fear that the Prince's example will give encouragement to the gambling habits which are already dangerously prevalent among all classes of society. There is only too much ground for this apprehension in a country so prone to follow the example of royalty as England is. It would be a good thing for himself and the English people, if the Prince would make a copy of the document prepared for his friend and sign it himself, for this scandal has brought royalty into disrepute. In these days when there is a tendency in all countries toward republican institutions he would do well to heed the dictum of the wise king that "It is an abomination to kings to commit wickedness; for the throne is established by righteousness." (Prov. 16 : 12.)

A Narrow Escape from Death is Reported by the Cincinnati Enquirer. It says that a lady set out the other day to walk from Avondale to Lebanon on the tracks of the Northern Narrow-Gauge Railroad. She had to cross a narrow trestle-bridge which spans a creek, running twenty feet below. She was half way over when she heard the rumble of an approaching train, and in less than a minute she saw it at the end of the bridge, coming toward her at a rate of thirty miles an hour. Not a moment could be lost. She stepped to the side of the track, and prostrating herself, swung over the side of the trestle, clasping one of the ties firmly in both arms. She clung there while the train dashed by her. She could not draw herself up after the train had passed, but her perilous situation, as she hung over the rocky sides of the creek, was seen by a man working in the fields, who went to her assistance and lifted her up again on to the track. Her presence of mind in taking the only way of escape possible to her and clinging firmly to that, alone saved her life. There are many persons who wander into spiritual danger who are not so wise. Though, by quitting their path and trusting themselves wholly to Christ they might be saved, they neglect to do so and go to eternal death (Heb. 2:3.)

A Girl's Terror in a Fire Prevented Her Rescue by the firemen, in New York, last week. The fire was in a tenement house and originated in the second floor. The flames passed through a small elevator shaft used for a dumb-waiter, to the fourth floor, which was occupied by five persons. When the alarm was given two of them ran down stairs and escaped. Two others, who were elderly people, were carried down by the firemen. The girl, however, who was a niece of the old couple, could not be found. She had been the first to see the flames coming out of the elevator-shaft and had been much terrified. It was supposed that she had made her escape by the stairs, but instead of doing so she had gone into a closet and shut herself in. After the fire was extinguished her dead body was found in the closet. She had evidently been suffocated by the smoke. She might have been saved if she had taken the way of escape open to her, or if she had trusted to the firemen who came to save her; but by hiding herself from them she made her death inevitable. There is reason to fear that at the last it will be found that many have lost their souls in a similar way. They avoid Christian workers who are seeking them to lead them to Christ, and will not go to him themselves for salvation. (Heb. 10 : 25.)

SUSPENSE.

S. S. LESSON FOR JUNE 28, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
LUKE 12: 15-34. GOLDEN TEXT, MATT. 6: 34.*

What Suspense Is—How Jacob was Encouraged—His Unfounded Fears—The Forebodings of Joseph's Brethren—Suspense Dies when Confidence in God Lives—The Contrast to Suspense—The Disciples Waiting Upon God—Unsundered Will—How to be Saved from Suspense.

IVE not in careful suspense." (Luke 12: 29, margin.) This is his word whose power to obey goes forth with every command he gives. Yet the Church, as well as the world, is perpetually harrowed, strained, tortured, by suspense: many lose their reason, and some take their own lives, because they cannot bear suspense. In a time of crisis, one of two things may happen, and every nerve is on the strain to discover which it is. Why? Is it not in order to make provision against a possible contingency, which might produce the gravest consequences? But where is our Father in the matter? Has he suspended his custom of making all things work together for good to them that love him?

What is Suspense?

Is it not anticipating evil, which perhaps may never happen after all? When Jacob left Mesopotamia, at the call of his God, to return to the land of Canaan, God opened his eyes to the invisible world and let him see the angels of God which met him, and he said, "This is God's host." Yet he so little understood his God that, in the very face of these heavenly guardians, Jacob makes his own plans to guard against the anticipated enmity of his brother Esau.

Poor Jacob might have saved himself the trouble of dividing his people, and flocks, and herds into two bands, that so if Esau should smite the one, the other should at least be spared, if only he could have trusted his God. But he kept himself upon the strain, and after all his arrangements were made, with an imaginary sword hanging over his head all the time, he prays to his God to deliver him out of the hand of his brother! But his prayer does not deliver him from suspense, he has not yet let go the matter into God's hands, he still busies himself in arranging a present for Esau which is meant to propitiate him. He still does not practically reckon God's care equal to the occasion, and consequently the anticipation of coming evil still rests upon him. It is only when the mysterious Wrestler succeeds in laming him, and so depriving him of his own strength, that Jacob prevails, and then what a reproof to him for all his needless suspense and anxiety, when the brother he has feared meets him, and falls upon his neck, and kisses him!

Suspense, strain, hurry, worry, all come from unbelief, which argues, "Such and such things have happened to others, may they not happen to me also?" Thus argued after the death of their father Jacob. Judging Joseph by themselves, they worked themselves up into a state of suspense, in anticipation that Joseph's vengeance upon them, which had been held in abeyance during their father's lifetime, would surely be taken now that he was dead. So they not only suspect their brother of treachery towards them which had never so much as entered his mind, but they take an untruthful and unworthy way of meeting the imaginary evil. They invent a message, which they give as coming from their father to Joseph, commanding him to forgive them for their past sin against him. Joseph's first answer is to weep. Had they for seventy years been doubting his forgiveness? Have we never pain the heart of our elder Brother by our unworthy suspensions of him, and senseless anticipation of evil? Joseph led his brethren to higher ground. They looked at the matter as between Joseph and themselves; he saw it as between him and God, far above suspense, imagination and all the workings of the flesh. Their suspense was self-created.

Joseph's Brethren,

Suspense dies out of life in proportion as real confidence in God comes in. If men do rise up against us, and cast us into a burning fiery furnace, then it is better to be in the furnace with the Son of Man, than outside with the idolaters; the presence of Christ is our guarantee that with the temptation, whatever it may be, there shall be a way of escape that we may be able to bear it. (1. Cor. 10: 13.) "O, if I could know how such and such a thing would turn out," says one. But, my brother, if God saw it best, you would know, and if you do not know, it is because his infinite wisdom hides it from you. But, meanwhile, all the threads are in his unerring hands, nothing is left to chance, neither man nor circumstance is almighty.

The Exact Contrast to Suspense

is waiting upon God. When the hundred and twenty disciples waited for the promise of the Father during the ten days which intervened between the ascension of Christ and the pouring out of the Holy Ghost, there was no shadow of suspense in their spirit, because there was no uncertainty. The disciples "were continually in the temple, praising and blessing God. There is no evidence that they found the time long; they were waiting, but not weary; none had dropped out of their ranks through fatigue, "they were all, with one accord in one place." Why was this? Because they were so sure of their Lord: he had never disappointed them, never failed them. Into such hearts and lives the Holy Spirit could come in his fulness.

Again, when the apostles Peter and John were before the ecclesiastical council of Jerusalem, after the healing of the impotent man, and were commanded by them not to teach nor preach in the name of Jesus (Acts 4: 18), these two God-filled men were in no state of agitation or suspense as to whether their ministry was going to be stopped or not. They bore their testimony before the council; "Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye, for we cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard." And then, on their return to their own company, they uttered no syllable of apprehension, but only prayed for boldness to preach on, and for the testimony of God to the ministry by stretching forth his hand to heal.

Peter professed, in his ignorance of his own heart, "Lord, I am ready to go with thee both into prison, and to death," but when things turned out so contrary to his expectation, he denied a suffering Messiah, and yet, at that very time, was filled with most agonizing suspense about the fate of his Master. Stephen did what Peter professed he could, but did not; Stephen followed Jesus to death. Yet in his last moments, crushed, bruised, bleeding, dying, there was no shadow of uncertainty, no suspense, his opened eyes saw inside heaven, and rested on his Lord in glory, his opened heart prayed in his Lord's spirit for his persecutors, he accepted his martyr-death from his Lord and willed nothing else. Where suspense is there is some measure of the heart is not still, the flesh still works, there is not an entire or unmissed satisfaction in God. Perhaps with some the difficulty may be that God's will may not be clearly revealed in certain circumstances. But can we rejoice in his will whatever it may turn out to be, and then quietly wait for him to develop it? This saves us from suspense. Suspense never proceeds from the Spirit of God. It comes from the workings of the flesh, the unquiet, restless human nature which God seeks to still. In its self-importance it is ever ready to provide, to anticipate, to defend itself, to conjure up images of what may arise; and it needs the weapons of our warfare which are not carnal to cast down these imaginations. (II. Cor. 10: 5.)

Unsundered Will,

A MINISTER ON TRIAL.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for June 28. Matt. 6: 34.
"Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

R. AND MRS. CRAIG were preparing for their annual vacation which they proposed to spend this year among the mountains. Mr. Craig was the minister of a small country church and hitherto had been obliged by lack of funds to make his vacation very short. But things were changed now. He had married the only daughter of a rich squire who had left her all his wealth.

Presently Mr. Craig was called away from his packing to see a brother clergyman whose charge was in the next village seven miles away. He came back in a few minutes. "Annie," he said, "Can we let Mr. Dilworth have fifty dollars? He is in trouble. His butcher and grocer, and coal dealer are pressing him and his wife and all those little children are at home with nothing to eat. Shall we help them?"

"Why of course we will. I will get it right away. Mr. Cross paid his rent yesterday so I know there is enough. Go down and talk to Mr. Dilworth and I will bring it to you. A few minutes later Mrs. Craig tripped lightly down stairs and beckoning her husband out of the room, put an envelope into his hand.

Mr. Dilworth did not find those seven miles near so long as he did in coming; for with that money in his pocket he could turn his thoughts from the heavy burden of debt which worried him and think out his sermon for next Sunday. He went straight to the kitchen, where his wife was, and giving her the money he said, "The Lord has had compassion on us, Mary. There is enough to satisfy the men whose debtors we are."

Mrs. Dilworth uttered a cry of joy on seeing how large a sum the envelope contained and asked her husband how he got it. But he did not like to tell her that he had borrowed it from a brother minister; so he answered in his usual absent-minded way: "Thank the Lord for it, Mary. To those who trust in him he is good and supplies their need in strange ways."

The grocer told his wife that night that the Dilworths must be in luck, for Mrs. Dilworth had been at the store and paid him that long standing bill of five and thirty dollars. "She paid Jones the butcher thirty dollars, too," he said, "and a bill of fifteen dollars for coal."

"How did they get it?" the wife asked.

"I don't know, nor care," he answered.

Other people soon began to care, however. The poverty of the Dilworths was well known in the parish. Two weeks previous to the having this money, a pocket-book had been lost by a half-tipsy farmer, under suspicious circumstances, and when the Dilworths paid their bill in this sudden and unaccountable way, people began to ask each other in whispers whether it was possible that Mr. Dilworth had found the pocket-book and, being so pressed for money, he was, had appropriated the contents.

No one would ever have suspected Mr. Dilworth of dishonesty. He was an earnest preacher, an assiduous worker and one of the best and kindest of friends. Still, a suspicion, once started, quickly spreads, even about the best men. And the circumstances did look suspicious to people who did not know the facts. Suspicion became certainty the next day. Jones the butcher, to whom Mrs. Dilworth had paid thirty dollars, took his money to the bank. Among it was a cheque for twenty dollars. The teller at once seized the cheque and asked Jones where he got it. It was part of the money in that lost pocket-book. Jones at once said that he had received it from Mrs. Dilworth, who gave him the cheque and a ten dollar bill in payment of their account of thirty dollars. The teller and the butcher looked at each other in surprise. Both knew the clergyman and were shocked at this fatal evidence.

"Well," said the teller, "I could not have believed it of him. You are sure, I suppose?"

"Oh, yes; it astonished me so to have the debt paid at all that I am not likely to forget how it was paid."

The law had to take its course. When Mr. Dilworth was questioned about it, he made matters worse. With the sensitiveness of a man ashamed of borrowing, he refused to say where he got the money. When, however, he learned of what he was suspected, he said, in a confused way, that he had borrowed fifty dollars of Mr. Craig. His statement was doubted, and then it was pointed out to him that his wife had paid eighty dollars that day. Where did he get the other thirty? Well, the treasurer of the church advanced ten and as to the other twenty he knew nothing about that. Things looked black.

Many people who knew the minister well utterly refused to believe in his guilt and one of them became bail for him. He tried to straighten matters out, but could obtain no more information from Mr. Dilworth. He could not explain how he came to be in possession of the cheque unless it was among the money Mr. Craig lent him, and if it was, he could not tell how eighty dollars were paid with sixty. The good man wrote to Mr. Craig, but he was away in the mountains and the letter missed him.

Meanwhile Mr. Dilworth resumed his duties. The people wondered how he could preach and conduct his Bible class and attend to his other work with such a charge hanging over him. To one who asked him about it he said that his duty was plain, while it was impossible to do anything about the trouble. It was one of those things that must be left wholly to God's intervention. He could not explain it.

The trial was to take place on Monday, and on Sunday Mr. Dilworth appeared in his pulpit as usual. He was not discomposed, but evidently the peculiar circumstances were in his mind, when his sermon was prepared. His text was, "Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." The congregation listened wonderingly as the minister preached. He was urging them to composure in trial and trouble and assuring them of God's care for those who trust in him.

"Well," said Jones, "as he came out of church, 'the dominie may say what he likes, but it'll take a miracle to deliver him to-morrow.'"

Others were of the same opinion, for conviction of the minister's guilt had grown since the charge was made public. Some one repeated Jones's remark to the minister, and he answered: "Miracles are not beyond God's power, but if it is his will that I should suffer innocently, he will give me strength to bear it."

No miracle was necessary, however. About half an hour before the case was called, Mr. Craig drove up to the court and had an interview with the chief of police and the judge. "All this trouble would have been avoided," he said, "had I not missed my letters. I have lost no time in returning since I heard of it. It was my wife's doing. Dilworth asked me for a loan of fifty dollars, as he told you, but my wife was moved by the story of his necessities, and she thought she would add a little more to the sum. So she put in the envelope with the other money, that cheque for twenty dollars which she had received the day before from her tenant, Cross, as part of his rent. Now, if you want to trace that cheque, Cross is the man to examine."

Mr. Craig repeated his story in court, and the minister was released amid the cheers of his people. "Was I not right in trusting in God and being calm?" Mr. Dilworth asked Jones as the latter came up to shake hands with him.

"You were, sir, but there ain't many with your faith. I'd ha' gone crazy in your place."

EARTH'S RE-GENESIS.

Indications in the Past and Present of the Future Purification of the World.

BY REV. GEORGE C. NEEDHAM.

In order more fully to appreciate what has already appeared in these pages on the subject of the regeneration of the earth it is necessary to inquire what reasons there can be for so radical a purification as a complete and universal renewal. An exhaustive examination of these reasons is impossible here, but a few incontrovertible facts may be cited.

There was a time when man was pure and innocent. Sin had not interrupted his communion with God. But after the Fall the creation became subject to vanity. The fruitful earth became perturbed by the strange intrusion of sin; thorns and briars sprang from the soil; and labor and pain, toil and tears became the common heritage of mankind. And death followed. Even after God by a deluge of water had washed the earth clean, in the only righteous family that escaped, sin appeared in direful manifestations. They were displayed from age to age in the Sodomites, the Egyptians, the Canaanites and in the very seed of Abraham.

But What of the Present Age?

I do not here inquire into the state of the Church, but what is the moral condition of the world, apart from and independent of the professed people of God; of those who are without spiritual relation to Christ, who antagonize his laws, and are hostile to his claims.

Is the evil of to-day less intense than formerly? Is there less crime? Is life more sacred, and is there greater antipathy to blood-shed? What are the characteristic sins of our day? Have we not avarice with its greedy grasp; with its iron heel grinding the face of the poor; with its conscienceless monopolies and heartless corporations? Have we not lust with its corrupted passions, its foul revelings, its indescribable uncleannesses, its devilish inventiveness, and indulgence? Have we not lawlessness with its murderous horde of assassins pouring out the blood of the innocent? Is not our commerce debased and degraded? Are not parents lax in discipline, and children disobedient to parents? Is not Sabbath desecration on the increase? Is there not a multiplication of Sunday newspapers, and Sunday excursions, and Sunday pleasures, and Sunday trade? Are there less suicides and villainies of every sort? We have become inured to diabolical deeds and regard them as vulgar and marks of low breeding. But what of the refined rascals, the educated swindlers, the polite gamblers, the licentiously bad and indecently bold rakes and rascals of aristocratic parentage? And what of the drink curse, with its attendant evils of immorality, idiocy, pauperism and disease? Where shall the trembling heart turn for relief from its depression?

As we look abroad the picture does not brighten. Our modern civilization finds a highway for its rum along the banks of the Congo, thus preparing the Dark Continent for darker deeds than paganism has ever invented. England has forced opium upon China thereby imbruting these children of the Orient beyond their own inherent tendencies. Even the Islands of the sea have not escaped the embrace of this iron virgin of modern civilization which unpitifully crushes out their moral life.

Two-thirds of the human race are still enshrouded in heathen darkness. Mohammed's followers number one hundred millions. Slavery deepens Africa's darkness. Surely the world morally is in bad case. At home, the wrongs of governments, the impotency of legislation, and the trickery of politicians are mills which grind the race to powder, and abroad we hear of crying oppressions, multiplied miseries, dumb anguish and hopeless despair.

But what of earth's physical condition. We know that sin has corrupted the race, do we also know that it has infected the planet? Do we not see that, like an old house, this crumbling earth is falling into ruins. The marks of decay are upon it; the dry-rot is eating into its soundest parts. Its foundations are trembling; its walls are tottering, its great timbers loosening and its giant frame is collapsing with repeated and protracted upheavals. It waxeth old and is nigh unto perishing.

Earth became subject to vanity through the sin of man: she is still held in the bondage of corruption. An exact thinker and accurate theologian has said: "The curse on account of man's sin has struck through the whole framework and vitals of nature, entailing the untold sufferings and groans of the whole animal creation, its mutual ferocity and slaughter, the stunted and thwarted development of the vegetable kingdom, calling on every side for human help and culture: the pestilence of the air, the convulsions of the sea and land. . . . What signals of distress has not the planet displayed? Through all its veins the effect of human transgression has gone, by no fault of its own, but by a divine ordination, binding the guilty, tenant and his mansion to the same doom."

Madame de Gasparin says: "The note that echoes over our earth at this present hour, in the village, town, or quiet country, is a wailing note akin to tears—an immense sigh. Our times are not times of refreshing but times of exhaustion."

Vast regions of our globe are unfit for human habitation. The torrid zone covers many secrets hidden from the eye of man, while the frozen North forbids an entrance to her innermost shrine. North and South, East and West furnish abundant proof of nature's deep-seated disease. The beasts of the forest, the birds of the air, and the fishes of the sea have not escaped the terrible consequences of man's sin.

The Animal Creation.

It is well that even now we seek to protect our birds and animals from the rapacious cruelty of our fellow man. "The glazed eye of the dumb brute as he falls exhausted on your street is a speechless prayer for pity. The dead dog, faithful and true is a silent appeal for compassion." The Henry Bergh Society is doing a noble work in throwing its protecting shield over our domestic animals. So also is the merciful Audubon Society in its watch-care over our innocent birds. At times I fear we are all hypocrites. A lady shrieks out her protest as she watches a two-legged brute of a man beat a four-legged brute of a horse, yet thoughtlessly wears a hat or bonnet, the plumage of birds slain to gratify the whims of fashion. Does not nature groan for deliverance from man's selfish cruelties? Shall there be ultimately release from moral and physical debasement?

Yea, verily, blessed be our God. The vision is made plain by prophetic interpretation. Nebuchadnezzar's image symbolizes the course of events to their culmination. From the head of gold to the toe of iron-clay it is a "down grade." Morally and physically man and the ages deteriorate. All governments are proved futile, impotent, insufficient. Imperial monarchy breeds rebellion and anarchy. Universal suffrage, with its blasphemous vox populi, vox dei, and its deification of man, produces confusion and communism. The prophets foresaw the clashing of human governments and their utter annihilation. They also foresaw the physical collapse of our planet. Did it make them pessimistic? No, thank God. And wherefore "The God of heaven shall set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever." Daniel 2: 44. The prophetic eye sees beyond present evils and coming woes to that promised hour when the kingdoms of this world shall have become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and forever. Rev. 11: 15. "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their father." Matt. 13: 43.

SCOWLING.

DON'T scowl, it spoils faces. Before you know it your forehead will resemble a small railroad map. There is a grand trunk line now from your cowlick to the bridge of your nose, intersected by parallel lines running east and west, with curves arching your eyebrows; and O, how much older you look for it! Scowling is a habit that steals upon us unawares. We frown when the light is too strong and when it is too weak. We tie our brows into a knot when we are thinking, and knit them even more tightly when we cannot think. There is no denying there are plenty of things to scowl about. The baby in the cradle frowns when something fails to suit. "Constitutional scowl," we say. The little toddler who likes sugar on his bread and butter tells his trouble in the same way when you leave the sugar off. "Cross," we say about children, and "worried to death," about the grown folks, and as for ourselves, we can't help it. But we must. Its reflex influence makes others unhappy; for face answereth unto face in life as well as in water. It belies our religion. We should possess our souls in such peace that it will reflect itself in placid countenances. If your forehead is ridged with wrinkles before forty, what will it be at seventy? There is one consoling thought about these marks of time and trouble—the death angel almost always erases them. Even the extremely aged, in death, often wear a smooth and peaceful brow, thus leaving our last memories of them calm and tranquil. But our business is with life. Scowling is a kind of silent scolding. It shows that our souls need sweetening. For pity's sake, let us take a sad iron, or a glad iron, or smoothing tool of some sort and straighten these creases out of our faces before they become indelibly engraved upon our visage.

UNSATISFYING.

IT is a foolish thing to adhere too much to this world, from the fact that it is so unsatisfactory. Ransack the whole earth, and show me one man who has been made happy by temporal success. You cannot find one—out of the millions and hundreds of millions, not one. First, a man wants to make a living. Having made a living, he wants to make a competency. Having made a living and a competency, he wants to make a superfluity; and having made a living and a competency and a superfluity, he wants—more. The husks of this wilderness can never satisfy the hunger of the soul. A lion is carnivorous, and wants meat; an ox is graminivorous, and wants grass; but man is omnivorous, and wants everything. The buckets of this world's pleasure are not large enough to bring up water to slake the thirst of the soul.

THE LAST TRAIN.

NEVER take the last train when you can help it. Much of the trouble in life is caused by the fact that people, in their engagements, wait till the last minute. The seven-o'clock train will take them to the right place if everything goes straight, but in this world things are very apt to go crooked. So you had better take the train that starts an hour earlier. In everything we undertake, let us leave a little margin. We tried, jokingly, to persuade Captain Berry, when off Cape Hatteras, to go down and get his breakfast, while we took his place and watched the course of the steamer. He intimated to us that we were running too near the bar to allow a greenhorn to manage matters just there. There is always danger in sailing near a coast, whether in ship or in plans and morals. Do not calculate too closely on possibilities. Better have room and time to spare. Do not take the last train. Not heeding this counsel makes bad work for this world and the next. There are many lines of communication between earth and heaven. Men say they can start any time. After a while, in great excitement, they rush into the depot of mercy, and find that the final opportunity has left, and, behold! it is the last train!

HOT WEATHER RELIGION.

IT takes more grace to be an earnest and useful Christian in summer than in any other season. The very destitute, through lack of fuel and thick clothing, may find the winter the trying season; but those comfortably circumstanced find summer the Thermopylæ that tests their Christian courage and endurance. The spring is suggestive of God and heaven, and a resurrection day. That eye must be blind that does not see God's footstep in the new grass, and hear his voice in the call of the swallow at the eaves. In the white blossoms of the orchards we find suggestion of those whose robes have been made white in the blood of the Lamb. A June morning is a door opening into heaven. So autumn mothers a great many moral and religious suggestions. The season of corn husking, the gorgeous woods that are becoming the catafalque of the dead year remind the dullest of his own fading and departure. But summer fatigues and weakens, and no man keeps his soul in as desirable a frame unless by positive resolution and especial implorations. Pulpit and pew often get stupid together, and ardent devotion is adjourned until September. But who can afford to lose two months out of each year when the years are so short and so few. He who stops religious growth in July and August, will require the next six months to get over it. Nay, he never recovers. At the season, when the fields are most full of leafage and life, let us not be lethargic and stupid.

BRIEF NOTES.

The Church Missionary Society sent out last year seventy-nine missionaries. Its income for the year was over a million and a quarter dollars.

The Synod of the Reformed Episcopal Church of Canada, has elected as Bishop over all the Dominion of Canada, the Rev. T. W. Campbell of Toronto.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond has been holding very successful services at Williamsbridge, N. Y. Four services were held each day and an open-air service on Sunday.

The endowment fund of the Long Island Cathedral has received an addition of half a million dollars, the gift of Judge Hilton. This brings its total to two and a half millions.

It is announced that a Washington lady has devoted property worth half a million dollars to the Protestant Episcopal Church to be used in building a Cathedral in the national capital. A gift of land suitable for a site for the edifice has also been presented.

Rev. W. T. Lambourne preached on Sunday, June 7th, at Bergen Point, N. J. In the afternoon he addressed the King's Own Mission at Bayonne. Last Sunday he preached at the latter place morning and evening. A deeply interesting work has been begun there and many souls have been saved, among whom are several Roman Catholics. The work is in charge of Rev. S. J. Betts.

The Lone Wolf Mission, established by Rev. W. F. ReQua in Indian Territory, to which many of our readers have contributed, is now under the control of the New York Baptist Mission Board. The Boston Women's Mission have sent out an excellent lady teacher to assist in the work. Mr. ReQua, who is now laboring at Batavia, Ill., has received several cordial letters from the Indians among whom he lived and taught, expressing the hope that he will yet return and make his home with them.

Rev. C. H. Yatman is now laboring at Portland, Me. His meetings, just closed at Pueblo, Colo., were wonderfully blessed. A correspondent in that city writes: "For over four weeks union meetings were held which thoroughly stirred the whole city. Active wide-awake business men, and men prominent all over the city were among the converts; large numbers were won in the Sunday Schools. All Pueblo was astir and people on the streets talked of little else than Mr. Yatman and his meetings. Before he left us he succeeded in raising over ten thousand dollars to erect a new Y. M. C. A. Building."

The special Evangelistic services now being conducted by Mr. James H. Cannon, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD evangelist, in Asbury Methodist Episcopal Church, New York, of which Rev. Dr. J. S. Stone is pastor are being much blessed. During the past week more than fifty persons have been led to seek Christ. One of these was a mechanic who said that it was twenty-five years since he had been inside a church. Several pastors have been assisting Mr. Cannon in the services; among them Bishop Turner of the African M. E. Church, Rev. Dr. J. M. King, Dr. Strowbridge and Dr. Ezra Tinker. The services are being continued this week with open air preaching every night.

Dr. Talmage's Decoration-Day sermon published in this journal on June 3rd, was read at the meeting of the George E. Pickett Camp, C. V., Richmond, Va., on June 4. "After hearing it," writes Charles T. Loehr, "it was unanimously resolved: That the thanks of the Camp (composed of survivors of the men in the active field service of the South) be extended to Dr. Talmage for his courageous and impartial sentiments, expressed for the men of the North and the South who tried to do their duty as they understood it, the dead and the living, whose blood has cemented this country—our united country for time to come."

An Inter-denominational Bible Conference will be held at Ocean Grove, N. J., August 8-12, conducted by Dr. L. W. Munhall. This will be the fourth of these deeply interesting and profitable gatherings, and the prospectus which has been issued indicates that it will be fully equal to its predecessors. Among the distinguished pastors and teachers who have promised to attend and take part are: Dr. Nathaniel West of St. Paul, Dr. James H. Brookes of St. Louis, Dr. Daniel Steel of Boston, Dr. William J. Erdman of Asheville, N. C., Dr. William C. Webb of Philadelphia, and Rev. George C. Needham. Full particulars may be obtained by addressing the association Office, Ocean Grove, N. J.

The Managers of the American Bible Society, at their regular meeting on June 4, appropriated funds amounting in the aggregate to $55,575.52, including a grant to the Board of the Reformed Church, for its Arcot Mission; to the American Board, for Bible work in Spain; to the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, for Bible work in Germany and Switzerland; to the Russian Bible Society for colporteur work in Siberia; to the Evangelical Society of Geneva; to the Committee of Evangelization of the Waldensian Church; and to the Society's La Plata, Venezuela, Persia, China, and Russian Agencies. The issues from the Bible House during the month of May were 72,348 volumes; issues since April 1st, 167,540 volumes.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Hayti's Revolution—Chinese Outrages on Missions—An Italian Earthquake—Sir John Macdonald's Successor—The New Superintendent of Immigration—Another Arctic Expedition—President Kruger's Visit to Natal.

EVOLUTION has Broken out in Hayti, as was foreshadowed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. During the last month, hundreds of arrests were made of men suspected of sympathy with the Legitimate Government, the news of a plot to assassinate President Hyppolite, having become known. The plotters selected a festival day, when all the Haytians would be in church, to attack the jail at Port-au-Prince, and liberate the prisoners. This plot was duly carried out and the captives and their rescuers next attacked the arsenal. President Hyppolite, who was in church, when informed of the state of affairs, at once put himself at the head of a body of troops and marched to the arsenal, where a sharp fight took place, the rebels being between the fire of the troops inside the arsenal and the President's guard outside. The President's men dispersed the rebels, leaving twenty of them dead and many wounded. Then followed a short reign of terror. President Hyppolite issued a proclamation of martial law, which was followed by an order to his officers to "arrest and shoot every suspicious person" found in the streets. His troops then commenced a butchery, shooting people at random, and not even excepting foreigners. No one was safe and many murders were committed for the satisfaction of personal revenges. M. Rigaud, a wealthy merchant and a subject of France, who was suspected of being in the plot and of corresponding with Legitime, was visited by Hyppolite and a guard, and shot on his own door-step. His nephew, a member of his firm, called on the President to demand an explanation and was also brutally shot dead. Meanwhile business was at a standstill, the Custom House was closed and the streets, except for the presence of the bloodthirsty troops, were deserted. At the latest advices, matters had quieted down, but there was intense indignation against Hyppolite and more trouble is expected.

Canadians are already Discussing the Probable successor of the late Premier, Sir John A. Macdonald. There are several candidates, among them Hon. Mr. Abbott and Sir Jno. Thompson, (see portrait) the latter being the almost universal selection of the Conservative Members in the Dominion Parliament. The Cabinet is to be re-organized and will probably include Sir John Thompson, representing Nova Scotia, Foster, from New Brunswick, Langevin from Quebec, and Dalton, McCarthy or Meredith from Ontario. Sir John Thompson was long associated with the late Premier and is fully identified with the latter's policy in government affairs. He, more than any other man in the Dominion, except possibly Sir Charles Tupper, may be said to represent the Macdonald idea.

Trouble is Brewing Between China and the French and American Governments, in consequence of recent outrages on the Missions at Wusuch. New converts were frightfully maltreated, women and children escaping only by fleeing naked from their homes. The Mandarins, instead of trying to suppress the disorder, encouraged the anti-foreign feeling. The French and American Consuls called on the Imperial Cabinet and requested them to give protection to the foreign residents and intimated that failure would be followed by hostile action on the part of their Governments. The French commander in charge of the squadron in Chinese waters threatened to bombard Nankin, unless China indemnified the sufferers by the riots, which were not confined to Wusuch, but seem to have been experienced at other mission points. The Chinese Government diplomatically answered that they would send gunboats to the scene of disturbance, but no action has yet been taken towards punishing the perpetrators of the mission outrages.

It was the Dream of Sir Bartle Frere the Uncompromising enemy of slavery, that the different provinces of South Africa should be united. That the friendliest feelings exist between these provinces has just been fully shown by the recent official visit of President Kruger of the Dutch South African Republic—formerly the Transvaal—to Natal, where the one-time foe of the English was received with almost royal honors. With President Kruger there came a number of leading officials of the Dutch state, including Piet Joubert, the famous General who defeated the English at Majuba Hill in 1881. The portrait of President Kruger given in this column is from a recent photograph. He is a man past the prime of life but still hale and vigorous, of great firmness and fine administrative qualities which make him deservedly popular among his people.

The Sudden Advent of Torrid Weather has been accompanied by severe electrical storms and floods, in Texas, New Mexico and the Indian Territory. The Red River has reached the highest point in twenty years, and has inundated thousands of acres of corn, cotton and small grain, destroying crops and sweeping away houses, cattle and bridges. A number of persons have perished. Forest fires have raged in Maine, New Hampshire, and some parts of Massachusetts. In Northern Maine, several lumber camps have been demolished and a number of villages threatened with destruction in Aroostook county. In one section alone one hundred miles of country were devastated. Equally destructive forest fires swept Lake St. John county and the Saguenay district in Canada, wiping out a number of settlements, saw-mills, many miles of railway, and vast quantities of cord-wood.

Another Sensation has been given to the steady-going Germans by Emperor William, who, in a recent address to a body of spring recruits for the army, took occasion to warn them against the Social Democrats. "Always remember," he said, "the oath you have taken binds you to me. I say to you, having taken the oath of a soldier, follow me implicitly; shoot even father or brother without hesitation when ordered." Such language astonished even the loyal recruits and soon was the talk of every regular troop in the army. It was not intended for the public ear, but all official efforts to keep it a secret failed; and the fact that the young Kaiser is resolved to outdo even Bismarck himself as a "blood-and-iron" autocrat is widely commented upon.

A Street-Car Strike at Grand Rapids, Mich., a few days ago, led to a serious riot. The Common Laborers' Union, whose members are now on strike, held a meeting, at which violent speeches were made. The suggestion that the meeting proceed to the Cable Car station and demolish it was about to be acted upon, when a body of police intercepted the strikers. The latter had a quantity of dynamite with which they intended to blow up the station. A fight took place with the police, the strikers using stones and clubs and the police their pistols. Three of the strikers were fatally shot and several wounded. Twenty arrests were made, and Mayor Uhl, apprehending further trouble, swore in a large force of special police. A second attempt at disturbance was suppressed, fortunately without fatalities.

Northern Italy was Shaken by an Earthquake on June 7, which did serious damage in the towns of Badia Calavena and Trognanzo. At first a subterranean rumbling was felt, followed by short shocks and culminating in a terrifying wave, during which the earth undulated like a sea. The frightened inhabitants fled to the fields; many houses fell, and others were so badly injured that they had to be pulled down. A great stream of lava issued from a new crater in Mt. Vesuvius, immediately after the seismic shocks. In the towns named, at least three-quarters of the houses standing are unfit for occupation, and troops are now busy pulling them down and clearing the streets of debris. Three persons were killed at Marcerigo and in Badia Calavena 17 were injured by falling houses.

Following on the Heels of the Peary Arctic Expedition, another under command of Lieutenant Ryder, set sail during the week for the Greenland coast. It is the purpose of the last-named expedition to explore the south-eastern coast between 66 and 70 degrees north latitude. Ryder's party is small, being only half a dozen men. Should Ryder be successful, the world will shortly know all there is to know about the coast of Greenland, including the unexplored eastern and western extremities. While these expeditions are on the way, Lieutenant Schwatka with three white and nine red men, is making for the head-waters of the great Yukon river, north of Alaska, which is thought to be navigable to Behring Sea. It will probably be many months before any one of the three expeditions returns to civilization.

The Readjustment of the Salaries of First-class postmasters under the new law, taking effect July 1, 1891, has now been completed by the Chief of the Salary and Allowance Bureau, Albert H. Scott. There are, in all, 128 first-class post-offices, the aggregate salaries being $450,600, an increase of $41,500 over last year. The average salary is $3,200. The gross receipts at first-class offices show an increase of $2,846,247 during the past twelve months.

The Newly-Created National Office of Superintendent of Immigration has been filled by the appointment by President Harrison, of Rev. Wm. D. Owen, of Indiana, (see portrait). Mr. Owen has been a close student of the subject of immigration for many years, and was mainly instrumental in securing the passage of the immigration law, enacted at the last session of Congress. The selection was strongly urged by a majority of the labor organizations throughout the country, with whom Mr. Owen is very popular. The new Superintendent is a minister of the Christian Church, and was born at Bloomington, Indiana, in 1846. He was a member of the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses, being elected as a Republican. Under his thorough and conscientious administration, the new office will doubtless become one of the most important and efficient in national affairs. In a few weeks he will take up his quarters adjoining the Treasury Department, in Washington.

THE PILOT OF LIFE.

A NEW SERMON, PREACHED BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

David's Simple Resource—A Wonderful Doctrine—I. The Nearness of God—Life Guided Neither by Chance nor Fate—II. An Answer to Temptation—III. A Support Against the Fear of Men—IV. A Cure for Worry—V. A Quietness to Dread—VI. A Reason for Service—VII. An Argument for Future Blessedness.

My times are in thy hand.—Psalm 31: 15.

DAVID was sad: his life was spent with grief, and his years with sighing. His sorrow had wasted his strength, and even his bones were consumed within him. Cruel enemies pursued him with malicious craft, even seeking his life. At such a time he used the best resource of grief; for he says in verse 14, "But I trusted in thee, O Lord." He had no other refuge but that which he found in faith in the Lord his God.

Having thus taken to the best resource by trusting in Jehovah, and having made the grandest claim possible by saying, "Thou art my God," the Psalmist now stays himself upon a grand old doctrine, one of the most wonderful that was ever revealed to men. He sings, "My times are in thy hand." This to him was a most cheering fact: he had no fear as to his circumstances, since all things were in the divine hand.

I. A clear conviction that our times are in the hand of God will create within us a sense of The Nearness of God.

If the hand of God is laid upon all our surroundings, God himself is near us. Our Puritanic fathers walked with God the more readily because they believed in God as arranging everything in their daily business and domestic life; and they saw him in the history of the nation and in all the events which transpired. The tendency of this age is to get further and further from God. Men will scarcely tolerate a Creator now, but everything must be evolved. To get God one stage further back is the ambition of modern philosophy; whereas, if we were wise, we should labour to clear out all obstacles, and leave a clear channel for drawing near to God, and for God to draw near to us. When we see that in his hand are all our ways, we feel that God is real and near.

"My times are in thy hand." Then there is nothing left to chance. Events happen not to men by a fortune which has no order or purpose in it. "The lot is cast into the lap; but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord." Chance is which the teaching of the Word has cast down, even as the ark threw down Dagon, and brake him in pieces. Blessed is that man who has done with chance, who never speaks of luck, but believes that, from the least even to the greatest, all things are ordained of the Lord. Believe ye this; for, if the least be omitted from the supreme government, so may the next be, and the next, till nothing is left in the divine hand. There is no place for chance, since God filleth all things.

"My times are in thy hand" is an assurance which also puts an end to the grim idea of an iron fate compelling all things. Have you the notion that fate grinds on like an enormous wheel, ruthlessly crushing everything that lies in its way, not pausing for pity, nor turning aside for mercy? Remember that, if you liken Providence to a wheel, it must be a wheel which is full of eyes. Its every revolution is in wisdom and goodness. God's eye leaves nothing in Providence blind; but fills all things with sight. God works all things according to his purpose; but then He himself works them. There is all the difference between the lone machinery of fixed fate and the presence of a gracious, loving Spirit ruling all things. Things do happen as he plans them; but he himself is there to make them happen, and to moderate, guide, and secure results.

What a bliss this is! Our times, in all their needs and aspects, are in God's hand, and, therefore, God is always caring for us. How near it brings God to us, and us to God! Child of God, go not thou to-morrow into the field, lamenting that God is not there! He will bless thy going out. Come not home to thy chamber, crying, "Oh, that I knew where I might find him!" He will bless thy coming in. Go not to thy bed, dreaming that thou art left an orphan; neither wake up in the morning with a sense of loneliness upon thee; thou art not alone, for the Father is with thee.

II. This truth is a complete

Answer to Many a Temptation.

You know how craftily Satan will urge a temptation. He says: "Now you have a large family, and your chief duty is to provide for them. Your position brings with it many wants. Here is a plan of making money; others follow it. It may not be quite straight, but you must not be particular in such a world as this, for nobody else is. You are already in difficulties, and you cannot extricate yourself if you are too precise. A poor man cannot afford to keep a conscience; it is an expensive luxury in these days. Give your conscience a holiday, and you can soon get out of your trouble." Let your reply be, "O, prince of darkness, it is no business of mine to extricate myself! My times are in God's hand." We are not called upon to eke out God's wisdom with a bit of our own wickedness. God forbid! Do the right, even if the heavens should fall. The Lord who has taken your business into his hand will bear you through.

Brethren, is it not a delightful thing for us to know that, though we are on a stormy voyage, the Lord himself is at the helm? The course we do not know; nor even our present latitude and longitude; but the Pilot knows all about us, and about the sea also. It will be our wisdom not to interfere with our Captain's orders. They put up a notice on the steamboats, "Do not speak to

The Man at the Wheel."

We are very apt, in our unbelief, to dispute with him to whom the steering of our vessel is entrusted. We shall not confuse him, thank God; but we often confound and confuse ourselves by our idle complainings against the living Lord. No, when you are tempted to presume, or to act in a despairing haste, or to hide your principles, or to do something which is not defensible, in order that you may arrange your times more comfortably, answer with a decided "No," and say, "My times are in God's hand, and there I will leave them."

When the devil comes with his subtle questions and insinuations, refer him to your Lord, in whose hand your times are placed. When you have a lawsuit, the opposite side will like to come and talk with you, to see if they can get something out of you. It will be your wisdom to reply, "If you have anything to say, say it to my solicitor." If the devil comes to you, and you get into an argument with him, he will beat you; for he is a very ancient lawyer, and he has been in the business for so many ages that you cannot match him. Send him to your Advocate. Refer him to the Wonderful, the Counsellor. Ever shelter beneath this fact, "My times are in his hand. I have left the whole business to another, and I cannot dishonor him by intermeddling."

III. This conviction is a sufficient support Against the Fear of Men.

We may say to ourselves, when our enemies bear very hard upon us, "I am not in their hands. My times are in thy hand." Here are gentlemen judging and condemning us with great rapidity. They say, "He has made a great mistake: he is an old bigot; he has snuffed himself out." This is easier said than done. The candle shines still. They say of you, "He is foolish and headstrong, and on religious matters he is as obstinate as a mule; and he will come to grief." You have not come to grief yet in the way they predict, and they had better not prophesy till they know. Fear not the judgments of men. Appeal to a higher court. Take the case to the King's Bench. Go to God himself with the matter, and he will bring forth your judgment as the light, and your righteousness as the noonday.

A Mistake.

Alas, many professors place their times in the hands of the world! If they prosper and grow rich, they see an opportunity of social advantage, and they quit their humbler friends to join a more respectable sect. How many are lost to fidelity because their prosperous times are not in God's hand, but in their own! Some, on the other hand, when they are in adversity, get away from the Lord. The excuse is, "I cannot go to the house of God any more; for my clothes are not so respectable as they used to be." Is your poverty to take you out of your Lord's hands? Never let it be so; but say, "My times are in thy hand." Cleave to the Lord in losses as well as in gains, and so let all your times be with him.

This feeling, that our interests are safe in the highest keeping, breeds an independent spirit. It prevents cringing before the great, and flattering the strong. At the same time, it removes all tendency to envy; so that you do not wish for the prosperity of the wicked, nor fret yourself because of evil-doers. When one knows that his times are in God's hand, he would not change places with a king; nay, nor an angel.

IV. A belief in the statement of our text is

A Cure for Worry.

O Lord, if my times are in thy hand, I have cast my care on thee, and I trust and am not afraid! Why is it, my sister—for this habit of worrying abounds among the sisterhood—why do you vex yourself about a matter which is in the hand of God? If he has undertaken for you, what cause have you for anxiety? And you, my brother—for there are plenty of men who are nervous and fretful—why do you want to interfere with the Lord's business? If the case is in his hand, what need can there be for you to be prying and crying? You were worrying this morning, and fretting last night, and you are distressed now, and will be worse to-morrow morning. It is a very unprofitable business. Do you answer, "What, then, are we to do in troublous times?" Why, go to him unto whom you have committed yourself and your times.

If we believe that all our times are in God's hand, we shall be expecting great things from our heavenly Father. When we get into a difficulty we shall say, "I am now going to see the wonders of God, and to learn again how surely he delivers them that trust in him." It has been to me so unspeakable a delight to see how the Lord has supplied my needs for the Orphanage, the College, and other works, that I have half wished to be in straits, that I might see how the Lord would appear for me. He did so, not very long ago. Funds ran very low, and then I cried to him, and he heard me out of his holy hill. How glad was I to hear the footfall of the ever-present Lord, answering to his child's prayer, and letting him know that his times were still in his Father's hand! Is not that a cure for worry, a cure for anxiety?

V. Fifthly, a firm conviction of this truth is

A Quietness to Dread.

"My times are in thy hand." Do you wish to know what is going to happen to you in a short time? Would you look between the folded leaves of the future? Many people would pay largely to have the future made known to them. If they were wise, they would rather desire to have it concealed. Do not want to know; such knowledge would answer no useful purpose. The future is intended to be a sealed book. The present is all we need have before us. Do thy day's work in its day, and leave to-morrow with thy God. If there were ways of reading the future, it would be wise to decline to use them. The knowledge would create responsibility, arouse fear, and diminish present enjoyment; why seek after it?

The very word "times" supposes change for you; but as there are no changes with God, all is well. Things will happen which you cannot foresee; but your Lord has foreseen all, and provided for all. Nothing can occur without his divine allowance, and he will not permit that which would be for your real or permanent injury. "I should like to know," says one, "whether I shall die soon." Have no desire in that direction; your time will come when it should. The best way to live above all fear of death is to die every morning before you leave your bedroom. The apostle Paul said, "I die daily." When you have got into the holy habit of daily dying, it will come easy to you to die for the last time. Do not tremble about what may never happen. Even we may never die; for it is written, "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump." Some of us may be alive and remain at the coming of the Lord. Who knows? Behold, he comes quickly. At any rate, do not let us worry about death, for it is in his hands.

VI. Again, a full conviction that our times are in his hand will be

A Reason for Service.

If God has undertaken my business for me, then I may most fitly undertake such business for him as he may appoint. Queen Elizabeth wished one of the leading merchants of London to go to Holland to watch her interests there. The honest man told her Majesty that he would obey her commands; but he begged her to remember that it would involve the ruin of his own trade for him to be absent. To this the Queen replied, "If you will see to my business, I will see to your business." With such a royal promise he might willingly let his own business go; for a queen should have it in her power to do more for a subject than he can do for himself. The Lord, in effect, says to the believer, "I will take your affairs in hand, and see them through for you." Will you not at once feel that now it is your joy, your delight, to live to glorify your gracious Lord?

I am sure, dear friends, if we get this truth fully saturating our souls, that our times are in God's hand, it will make life a grander thing than it has ever seemed to be. Do you believe that God's hand is working with you and for you? Then art thou lifted above the dumb-driven cattle that surround thee; for the God of heaven thinketh upon thee, and puts his hand to thine affairs. This connection with the divine puts heart into a man, and raises him to high endeavor, and great belief. We feel we are immortal till our work is done; we feel that God is with us, and we are bound to be victorious through the blood of Jesus.

VII. Lastly, if our times are in God's hand, here is a grand argument for #### Future Blessedness.

He that takes care of our times, will take care of our eternity. He that has brought us so far, and wrought so graciously for us, will see us safely over the rest of the road. I marvel at some of you older folks, when you begin to doubt. You will say, "Look at yourself." Well, so I do; and I am heartily ashamed that ever a grain of mistrust should get into the eye of my faith. I would weep it out and keep it out for the future. Still, some of you are older than I am, for you are seventy or eighty years of age. How much longer do you expect to travel in this wilderness? Have you another ten years, think you? God has been gracious to you for seventy years, and will you fret about the last ten, which, indeed, may never come? That will never do. God has delivered some of you out of such great trials, that your present ones are mere flea-bites. Sir Francis Drake, after he had sailed around the world, came up the Thames, and when he had passed Gravesend there came a storm which threatened the ship. The brave commander said, "What! Go round the world safely, and then get drowned in a ditch? Never!" So we ought to say. God has upheld us in great tribulations, and we are not going to be cast down about trials which are common to men. My Lord, if my times were in my own hand, they would prove a failure; but since they are in thy hand, thou wilt not fail, nor shall I.

A Golden Sentence.

"My times are in thy hand." Take the golden sentence home with you. Keep this truth in your mind. Yes, dear old lady, you that have come out of the almshouse this morning to hear this sermon, say to yourself, "My times are in thy hand." Yes, you, dear friend, who cannot find a situation, and have been walking the shoes off your feet in the vain endeavor to seek one: you also may say, "My times are in thy hand." Yes, my dear sister, pining away with consumption, this may be your song: "My times are in thy hand." Yes, young man, you that have just started in business, and have met with a crushing loss, it will be for your benefit after all; therefore say, "My times are in thy hand." This little sentence, to my mind, swells into a hymn: it buds and blossoms into a psalm. Few are the words, but mighty is the sense, and full of rest.

Now, remember, it is not everybody that can find honey in this hive. O sinners, you are in the hands of an angry God; and this is terrible! The God against whom you continually sin, and whom you provoke by refusing his grace, has absolute power over you. It is certain that you are in his hands, and that you cannot escape from him. That hand which the believer devoutly kisses, is the hand which you may well dread. Oh, that you would flee to Jesus Christ, and find shelter from wrath beneath the crimson canopy of his precious blood! Amen.

A STRUGGLE FOR A CHILD.

AN exciting scene in a court occurred in Brooklyn, N. Y., last week. A suit was on trial for the possession of a child. The child is a pretty twelve year old girl and the claimant was her own mother.

The claim was resisted by the child's foster mother, the widow of a wealthy merchant. She produced evidence to prove that more than ten years ago, the child, then an infant, was abandoned. She and her husband saw her, took compassion on the little waif, adopted her and educated her. Subsequently, the mother hearing that her child had been adopted by a wealthy family, demanded possession of her. She agreed, however, to accept $1,500 and relinquish her claim. A formal deed was duly executed and signed. The merchant, who is now dead, bequeathed the child $270,000. When this fact came to the mother's ears, she realized that the family was more wealthy than she had supposed, and that she might have obtained more than $1,500 for giving her up. She accordingly brought suit to recover her. The Judge of the Supreme Court dismissed the suit, on the ground that the mother had forfeited her right by abandonment and by subsequently signing the deed. On hearing the decision, she and a man she had with her attempted to seize the child and draw her away by force, but were prevented doing so by an officer of the Court. The child was much distressed, and in evident fear of being carried off, but her foster mother assured her that she would protect her from violence, if she, on her own part, would be on her guard against the machinations of her mother. The same assurance of protection is given to every Christian by his Lord. While he remains faithful no power can snatch him out of Christ's hand. (John, 10: 28).

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Beginning Bible Study.*

AID a young man to a musician, "Tell me how to play the sonatas of Beethoven in their true spirit."

Said the musician: "You ask too much of me; yet I will do what I can. What do you play now?"

"Nothing."

"My friend, how shall I tell you how to play Beethoven when it is not your habit to play anything at all? To know how to play Beethoven, you must first know how to play."

So with the Bible. To know how to study it we must first of all know how to study. Now wrong notions of how to study are without number, and probably every one has been brought to the study of the Bible; but one of the very worst, not consciously dishonest, is the assumption that the Bible is not to be studied as we study other books and other things, but by a separate method all its own. From the correct rendering of Beethoven or Handel, we do not look for the same musical results or mental effects as from Wagner or Rubinstein; yet we do not hesitate to bring to the musical rendering of all these masters the same system of notation, the same rules of harmony, the same methods of execution. But for the Bible, thousands of teachers and scholars claim an immunity from fundamental methods of correct study, without which we cannot get a firmly founded genuine conviction of the meaning and merits of anything. "Bring not your desecrating lines and plummets, rules of building, or tenets of architectural criticism here," they cry; "this is the King's palace." But, in fact, all the more because it is the King's palace, ought it to be tried and proved by all these things; and in truth it is only when we have so done that we can raise the confession from our inmost soul. "This is the house of God; this is the gate of heaven."

"Doctor," once said a convalescent, "I'm no judge of books—don't often read one; but I'm reading one now that seems to be a very fine book. I haven't noticed who wrote it, and I don't know how your pronounce its title; but it's something like I-van-hoe."

"My friend," said the physician, "I'd give large gold to be in your place long enough to be reading that book for the first time and not knowing who wrote it!"

Oh, for the rare gift to come to the study of the Word of God as if strangers to men's claims for it, until its truth, sinking into mind and heart, establish its authority and convince us of its inspiration! The true way to begin the study of all books is the true way for the Bible. Not in a spirit of carping unbelief, or of contempt or suspicion of our teachers; yet in faithfulness to God, truth and humanity.

An Illustration in Point.

I bid a new pupil open the Scriptures and read: "In the beginning God created" he stops. "What is the trouble?"

"I do not believe there is a God."

What ought I to reply? That he must begin with that belief or we cannot begin at all? His blood would be on my head. No, I should say:

"Never mind that now; a great many men fancy that they entirely and incessantly believe there is no God; and a great many who entirely and incessantly believe God is, have not even found out that such a belief is a thing of degrees. Those who entirely and incessantly believe or disbelieve in God are rare. The men whose minds are never shaken with doubts did not write Psalms. Thoroughly and incessantly to believe that 'God is and is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him' is a great achievement, and this book offers to show that to do so is a possible and blessed thing. Let us open it reverently—"

He interrupts: "Why should I reverence a book whose very first word I am not ready to accept?"

What shall I answer? Shall I try to show him how unreasonable he is? No, I will say, "Never mind reverence for the book just yet. You have abundant reverence for truth have you not?"

"Abundant," he replies.

I doubt it; but I only say, "Well, we will read on a little way and see if, right here on this first leaf, involved in a narrative of some sort—no matter what sort right now—we do not find one of the richest treasures of moral truth ever written or printed on one book leaf by the hand of man. We will see whether the kind of God here described or implied is one whose existence and nature it is worth while to consider any further." And so we begin again.

Conviction first, creed afterward. From his own experience a friend tells me this; He met on the highway, traveling on horseback as he was, and in the same direction, a stranger, but one known to him as an irascible and violent sceptic. Said he by and by: "Well, as the Bible says —"

It was a red rag to the other. "I don't believe the Bible! No, not some things in it, either. Not a line! Not a word! Name anything in that book that I believe. I defy you!"

"Why, my friend, you believe, 'a soft answer turneth away wrath.'"

"Yes, I do."

"Well, hereafter read the Bible for what you already believe in it."

THE SENAPUTTY OF MANIPUR.

(See Portrait.)

CABLE dispatch from India announces the capture of the Senaputty of Manipur, who was the leader in the recent massacre, which was described, with illustrations, in this journal on April 29th and May 6th. The Senaputty, whose portrait, taken from a photograph, is here given, fled on the arrival of the British forces, and was practically safe in the wild country which surrounds Manipur on all sides. Some fatal attraction, however, led him to return to his own village, where he was discovered and arrested. He is to be placed on trial for his complicity in the massacre. It will be a mere formality, as there is abundant evidence of his guilt. In addition to the fact, proved by survivors, that he was the leader of the conference when the British officer was seized, there is the evidence of the native executioner to the effect that the Senaputty ordered him to behead the prisoners. There is therefore little doubt that his trial will end in his execution.

The Senaputty is the half brother of the deposed monarch, and conspired against him in the hope of eventually succeeding to the throne. After the revolution he was regent of the country and next heir to the crown. When the English Commissioner went to Manipur to restore the rightful king, it was with the Senaputty that the negotiation took place. He was present at the Conference and ordered the seizure of the officers. The executioner says that they were carried to the palace and placed in line, with their hands tied behind their backs, and with chains around their ankles. Their heads was then struck off one by one with a Burmese knife. Several other prisoners have fallen into the British hands, among them an active leader in the outbreak, who was recognized as a Sepoy deserter. He has been shot by order of a court-martial. The dispatch announcing the capture states that peace and order have been restored throughout Manipur.

DR. PENTECOST IN INDIA.

RECENT advices from India report a genuine revival at Mussorie, as the result of the blessing of God on the labors of Dr. George F. Pentecost. Mussorie is a beautiful hill station in the Himalayas, a favorite resort of people from the plains in the north-west during the hot weather. An English lady, a member of the Protestant Episcopal communion, had arranged for a meeting in anticipation of Dr. Pentecost's visit. He had informed the people that he would stay only a few days, but the meetings were so well attended and the interest so marked from the first that the services were continued, and when the mail left were already nearing the end of the second week with the promise of still better things to come. "Some of the conversions," says the writer of the letter, "have been very marked indeed, and the work of grace is recognized by all as being genuine and deep. Dr. Pentecost's method of calling on those who have received the Saviour to come forward out of the congregation and make an open confession of their faith and consecration of themselves to God, was thought too radical for the habits of the people of India, who have been very conservatively trained in religious matters. It was therefore all the more surprising at his first call to see more than twenty persons, some of them among the most prominent people in Mussorie boldly taking their stand for Christ. Besides those coming to confess Christ for the first time not a few Christians, who have been more or less half-hearted and formal in their allegiance to the Master have publicly renewed their faith and consecration to God. About a hundred persons have thus far taken and signed the solemn covenant-card which Dr. Pentecost uses in his services.

"The services at Calcutta were continued day and night for five months. At the close Dr. Pentecost went to Darjeeling for two weeks rest, but the door was opened there, the Amusement Hall was hired and meetings held every night with much blessing. Thence he went to Benares where he held five services. From Benares he went to Lucknow, staying one day at Cawnpore. He has also held meetings in Agra and Delhi. English speaking people crowd to hear him wherever he goes, and he frequently addresses native congregations through an interpreter.

BOATING IN THE WHITE MOUNTAINS.

(See Illustration.)

THE scene in the illustration is a familiar one to the White Mountain tourist at this season, and a pleasant one, too.

Whether viewed from the reedy shores of Squam Lake, or from those of Winnepiseogee, Ossipee, or Silver Lake, the scenery is grand and awe-inspiring. Height upon height, wooded range upon range greet the eye, while woods abounding with game and waters with fish tempt the sportsman and, if ladies form part of the company, the boating is the finest in America. The surface of the clear, blue lakes is dotted in summer with sail-boats and canoes, filled with tourists, health seekers and fishermen, and on those placid waters is realized in perfection the ideal holiday.

Indian guides are rarer now than in former years, although the typical Indian canoe remains. At one time Lakes Winnepiseogee, Ossipee and Pigwacket were the highways over which Indian war-parties went on their predatory incursions to Canada. Many a sharp fight has taken place between the English soldiers and red men, when the former marched from the settlements on the verge of the White mountain range to subdue their dusky foes. Hardly a prominent rock or mountain spur but has a name that recalls the early dwellers of those hills, and legends of the Great Spirit are told under the deep shadows of Chocurua, Paugus, Passaconaway and Wonnalancet—mountains named after the great sagamores of tribes that have long since passed away. One legend is to the effect that Lake Chocurua is sacred to the Great Spirit, and that if a human voice is heard on its waters, the offender's canoe would instantly sink to the bottom.

The guides are strong, nimble and sure-footed, equally serviceable on land or water, and it would be dangerous to venture far without their safe companionship. In their light, birch canoes they can wield their spoon-shaped paddles all day long without fatigue. They are fine swimmers and fearless divers, and know every inlet of the lakes, and the quaint traditions associated with the great mountains of the range.

THE TOMBS OF THE KINGS.

(See Illustration.)

OUTSIDE the city of Jerusalem, about half a mile on the road from the Damascus Gate to Nablous is the famous cave or vault known as "The Tombs of the Kings." A picture of the entrance to it, taken from a photograph, which was brought from the Holy Land by Dr. Talmage appears on this page. Turning eastward from the ordinary highway a sloping path conducts the visitor to a cavity in the solid rock above and around which are carvings of figures, wreaths and foliage extending some thirty feet. Provided with lights the visitor enters a descending tunnel which terminates in a flight of broad, high steps. These give access to an ante-chamber from which, by a passage between walls four and a half feet thick there is a way to a great hall. On the west side of the hall is the portico of the tombs. It is elaborately carved and was formerly adorned with four graceful pillars, only two of which now remain and they are prostrate. Beyond this are four mortuary chambers each having recesses for the reception of dead bodies. They are cut out of the rock and extend seventy-five feet in one direction and fifty in the other. A remarkable and deeply interesting feature of the place is that the entrance to the tombs was originally closed by a great circular stone like a solid wheel which, when rolled forward in grooves exactly covered the aperture. The Christian visitor looking at this large stone, and perceiving the purpose for which it was intended, understands the feeling of the women who, going very early to the sepulchre, asked each other, "Who shall roll us away the stone?" (Mark 16: 3.)

Biblical students and archæologists are divided in opinion about the date of this wonderful mausoleum. Some believe that we have here those "sepulchres of the kings," mentioned in the Bible (II. Chron. 21: 20.) Others believe that Herod the Great constructed it as a last resting-place for himself and his family. The opinion, however, most generally entertained is that it was constructed by the order of Queen Helena whom Josephus mentions as monarch of Adiabene, formerly a province of Assyria. Having embraced Judaism, she made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem in A. D. 48, and when she died, after her return to her own land, her body was taken to Jerusalem for interment. The extent of the mausoleum is accounted for by the fact that she desired that her descendants be also buried there. Only two coffins were found in the mausoleum one of which is now in the Museum of the Louvre in Paris.

THE CAPTAIN'S BARGAIN.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

BY JULIA MCNAIR WRIGHT.

(Published by special arrangement with The National Temperance Society.)

The Superintendent.

WELL-KNOWN figure in the township of Lal's Mountain was "Superintendent Murray." He had come from New York to take charge of the interest of several stock companies, and was vaguely called "the Superintendent." The Superintendent was looked up to as a rich man. There were wonderful tales of the rapidity with which he made money, the good fortune which attended all his investments, the amount of money which he laid up every week, which was more than most of the people thereabouts laid up in a year. Indeed, lucky was he in this neighborhood who did not fall behind in his finances each year. While looked up to for his supposed riches, "the Superintendent" was feared and whispered about, as a man who lived in a settled gloom, held himself apart from people, scarcely spoke, except in the briefest terms on necessary business, and took no interest in anything, not even in his own fortunes.

The Superintendent was not yet a middle-aged man; but he looked old; his hair was white, his shoulders were bent, his face was wrinkled and thin. He bore the marks of a man who had been shipwrecked in some of the sharpest storms of life. He was supposed to be a very learned man; he had books and long shelves of minerals, and country people said that magic witch-hazel wands were as nothing compared to the magic of learning, whereby "the Superintendent" could read the surface of the soil and assay the rocks, and could tell what metals or minerals might lie beneath the mosses and the grasses, the hepaticas and the anemones. The schoolmaster was the only person who had anything approaching to an intimacy with "the Superintendent." The ground of their acquaintance was that the schoolmaster had studied the county for twenty years, and knew every growth, and every soil, and every rock that could be found in it. He was passing wise as to coal fields, measures, veins, deposits and basins; as to ridges, troughs, dips, faults, beds, strata, splits, flaws, axes, synclinals, monoclinals, verticals, flexures and anticlinals—in fact, ordinary people would need to have a Webster's unabridged in hand, and a few Worcester's and Johnsons for reference, if they wished to fully understand what "the Superintendent" and the schoolmaster said, as they sat on a fallen tree, or a couple of commodious boulders.

Both of these men loved nature; the schoolmaster loved nature for the pleasing satisfaction of a curiosity, for filling up the gaps that occurred in his life, and for lifting him up above the region of daily small cares and vexatious. The Superintendent loved nature as his last left resource, and that which saved him from insanity. He could not endure the face of his fellow-men, and the soothing of nature kept him from madness or suicide. In the winter, the Superintendent went to Lacy, or to the solitude of one of the great cities, where next to a desert a man can be most alone. In the summer he made his headquarters in a little four-room chalet he had built in the highest and woodiest part of the mountain. There he was served by a deaf mute, of about twenty, who seemed useful, contented, and fond of his master. "Would you like to be deaf and dumb?" Robert had asked, when he had seen this youth, and been made to understand his condition.

"Well, I'll allow," said Jerry, "I'm uncommon fond of wagging my tongue, but maybe if I'd been born dumb, and so wasn't used to talking, I could do very well without. You see, Robert, there's lots of advantages in being deaf and dumb. There's two of the commandments you can't break—the swearing commandment and the lying one. And that's a help, seeing humans find it such a powerful strain on 'em to keep the commandments. Moreover, you can't get yourself into trouble by speaking ill of folks; you can't make folks mad by sassing them; you can't listen to people's secrets and tell 'em. Yes, Robert, I'll allow there's a deal of good in being deaf and dumb; only when you are not born that way, you're bound to be thankful according."

The occasion of these remarks was a July afternoon, the second summer of Robert's living at the mill. The place, oddly enough, was the sitting-room of Mr. Murray's chalet, where Jerry, Robert, and Pink were in full possession, the tall deaf-mute standing in the doorway, and regarding them with interest. How this happened was in this wise. Berries were abundant on the mountain, and Mrs. 'Liza had arranged that Jerry and the two children should go for three days in succession to pick the berries. Each night they came down with three well-filled pails, and Mrs. 'Liza dried some of the fruit for pies, and made the rest into jam for winter. But on the afternoon of the third day the astute Jerry beheld a fierce storm sweeping along the gorges of the hills—thunder roared, and lightning played in the distance, and the storm drew nearer. It was necessary to get the children and the nearly filled pails into shelter. They hurried along, and as the storm broke in fury, they reached the oval clearing where stood Mr. Murray's eyrie, and in hurried Jerry, dragging his breathless charges.

The Superintendent was not at home. The mute made them welcome by signs, and his silence had at once to be explained by Jerry to the anxious Robert. Just at this moment, the powerful beat of a horse's hoofs mingled with the roar of wind and thunder, and the swirl of rain, and the Superintendent came tearing up the mountain road, on his big roan. He flung himself upon the little veranda, and the well-trained brute raced 'round to the open door of his stable. Mr. Murray, to his surprise, found three big tin pails full of berries standing under his long table of geological specimens, a one-legged, one-eyed boy sitting on the window-seat, and in the middle of the floor, Robert and Pink, standing hand in hand. For the first time since it was built, the cottage had guests! The mute explained the situation to his master by signs. Robert watched the performance eagerly. But with his native refinement he felt that permission to remain should be asked by the intruders themselves. He walked up to Mr. Murray, looked him straight in the eyes, and said: "I hope you like us to be here. We would pretty near drown out in the rain, you know."

"Whose children are these?" asked Mr. Murray.

"Cap'n Allen's," said Jerry. "I'm the Cap'n's Hands."

"Yes; I've seen you before, at the mill. Well, that is a fine boy!"

Mr. Murray sat down and beckoned the children to him. He took a hand of each. Robert's hands were reddened with berry juice, and thoroughly scratched. Pink's were red, so was her mouth—but her scratches were few. "I think," said Mr. Murray, "that you have picked most of your sister's berries for her."

"Oh, well, Pink's little. And then Pink did put some in the pail," said Robert.

"And more in her mouth. But nearly all yours went into the pail."

"We want to take such a lot down to mother. We eat so much jam. Next winter we shall eat loads of jam, for the t'ins is getting big enough to have it."

Robert was losing some of his crooked speech, but to him "the t'ins" long remained "the t'ins."

"How many are there of you?" asked Mr. Murray.

Robert counted on his fingers, "Father, mother, Jerry, Pink, me, Bop, one t'in, 'nother t'in, six."

Mr. Murray sighed.

"Haven't you any little boys and gells?" asked Robert gently.

Mr. Murray shook his head, and looked gloomily at the storm.

"When we went down in the barge this summer," said Robert, "I saw lots of pretty little boys and gells in the street—and they had rags, and nobody took any care of them, and they was so poor—why don't you go and buy some of them?"

Mr. Murray shook his head.

"Haven't you any money?" asked Robert, timidly. "When father don't get things, it is because he has'n't any money. I'm going to sell some berries next week, to Mrs. Britt, and all the eggs of my little hen, and I'm going to pay father's mortgage with it. A mortgage, is—a—a big worm that eats holes in the wood of our house—and—and it has to be paid to stop—only—Jerry has seen a woodpecker—" he hesitated, reading unqualified amazement in his host's sad gray eyes. He looked anxiously toward Jerry.

"It is all right, I understood," said Mr. Murray passing his hand slowly over Robert's brown curls, which were 'Liza's pride. The good woman would have sat up nights to make time to dress Robert's beautiful hair, rather than shear her little Samson.

"This is a beautiful house," said Robert; "our house has only two rooms in it. Jerry has a little room off the shop. We are pretty snug, father says, but when he gets rich he will build a house. Bop and me we has a trundle-bed in the kitchen, and Pink and the t'ins has a trundle-bed in the other room; and father made the trundle-beds, and he says he don't mind, he'd as lief make six. I don't know where he'd stand six, do you, Jerry?" But Jerry had quietly rolled out of the window, and gone to the extremity of the veranda—Robert's appeals were too personal.

"This house has pretty things," said Robert; "may we look at your things? Then I can tell mother."

"Certainly," said Mr. Murray, and leaning back in his chair, he spread his kerchief over his face, as if asleep. Robert passed slowly about the room, and then through the open door into the next room. He held Pink by the hand, and looked with smiling interest at the various little conveniences, and ornaments, and instruments which were new to him. He not only did not touch anything, but he did not even stand very near any object.

All at once Mr. Murray sprang up, and made a dash into the room where they were. "The gun is loaded! I was afraid you might handle it!" he exclaimed, in answer to Robert's look of question.

"It's your gun. We wouldn't touch your things, you know," said Robert.

"You are a well-brought-up child," said Mr. Murray, and going into another room, he came back with a tray of bread and butter, cold tongue, jelly, milk, the various products of his mute's housekeeping, and sat down with the children for a luncheon. Robert ate his rather uneasily, and his big brown eyes rolled toward Jerry's corner of the veranda. Mr. Murray filled a plate and took it to Jerry, and then Robert's content seemed complete.

When the storm was over, Mr. Murray had his horse brought round and mounted it, taking Robert on one knee and Pink on the other, to carry them down the mountain. When they were nearly down, they met Captain Allen coming up.

"I was away," he said, "and as soon as I got back I hurried after them; the missis is in a great state." He held up his arms and Mr. Murray gave him Pink; then, much more reluctantly, he handed over Robert. "I envy you that little man," he said. "How old is he?"

"About six. Aren't you, Robert?"

Robert nodded. He was any age they chose to make him.

A week or so later, Mr. Murray and the schoolmaster were sitting on a log not far from the mill. The Superintendent was waiting for Captain Allen; he had come to order a few boards, and had fallen in with the schoolmaster.

"If you do not wish to wait," said the master, "speak to Mrs. Allen. She is the real head of the business; she does all the measuring and calculating, and tells 'Zekiel what bargains to make. The Captain is the poorest possible hand at figures."

"I don't mind waiting," said the Superintendent. "It is worth while to see that boy play. With what a will he goes at it, and takes the other children all into his games, even to those two babies sitting in the little cart. He is a splendid child. I envy Captain Allen."

"And, no doubt, in some respects, he envies you. He is burdened with debts, and one misfortune after another prevents his making any headway. No doubt he thinks you a very fortunate man. All do about here."

THE CAPTAIN'S BARGAIN.

"I should think they would know better if they look at me," said the superintendent, touching his white hair and lined face. "Are these the footprints of joy?"

"People struggling with poverty are apt to measure happiness by wealth," said the master. "I don't think Allen does."

"He need not. He has a wife and children, and a home."

"And you have none?" ventured the schoolmaster.

Mr. Murray shook his head.

"You are young yet," said the master; "all these possibilities are open to you. I do not know but the man who can maintain a family, owes it to the good of his age and of his country to raise such a family."

"I had," said Mr. Murray, "a wife and child. I lost them. I cannot reconstruct a home on the grave of the past. When I stood by my wife's coffin, I knew that all for me had ended. Since then I do not live,—I exist."

The schoolmaster was not of those who offer idle words to sorrow. He knew how to be silent.

"That child—that boy—recalls to me what my child might have been. And so, I have spoken. It is not my way to speak. He was at my house the other day, and since then I have thought, day and night, how full my life might have been of energy and hope and joy, if I had such a son. Since I lost mine, fate, as if in irony, has given me money instead of wife and child. I gather carelessly, without interest in it. I invest heedlessly, as one who does not care to prosper, and while the eager and the needy lose, I gain. I gain money which I neither need, nor use, nor desire, nor rejoice in. There is a verse in the Scripture: 'There is one alone, and there is not a second; yea, he hath neither child nor brother; yet there is no end of all his labor; neither is his eye satisfied with riches; neither saith he, for whom do I labor, and bereave my soul of good?' This also is vanity, yea, it is also a sore travail."

"You might, at least, have the satisfaction of doing good with it," said the schoolmaster.

"I might, but I suppose I am of a selfish nature. I only care to lavish on what is my own, on what I love." "You can, perhaps, cultivate a wider love," said the master. "Such has grown in me. I am willing now to spend my thought and care for these people. They and all their interests are dear to me. My pupils are my children."

Mr. Murray shook his head.

"You speak that never had a child. Still, you labor to more profit than I do. You deal with hearts and brains; I deal with stones. Schoolmaster! Whatever you do, teach your pupils temperance! Day by day teach it, preach it, commend it, weave it with every lesson, build it into the very fabric of their brains. If you leave that untaught, you spend your labor for that which satisfieth not!"

Mr. Murray rose and stood before the surprised schoolmaster.

"I have heard that Allen drank once. When that child comes into your school, teach him temperance day by day. Render it impossible that the demon of intemperance may ever curse and blight a child of so much promise! Here am I—I had good birth, good breeding, education, fortune, friends, family, home, hope, happiness—I stand here before you, scorched and blasted, ruined, hopeless, miserable. All because when they taught me so many other things they failed to teach me temperance. I have learned it too late, when all is lost. What good is it now to hate and loathe and reprobate the devil that drove me to destruction? Save your boys, schoolmaster; and, above all, save this boy of Allen's!"

He turned, and began to hurry away.

"Come back; you have not seen Captain Allen!" cried the schoolmaster.

But the Superintendent paid no heed to him. He plunged into the woods, and as he went he thrust into his breast-pocket a handful of wild asters that Robert had picked for him.

THE SWEDISH MILLER'S SON.

A BIBLE colporteur in Sweden relates this incident: "In a village where there are several water-mills, I heard some facts related by persons who had themselves experienced the grace of God. A miller's man had, three years before, when I travelled that road, bought a Bible of me. Shortly before, he had been miraculously saved from falling into the stream and being crushed by the wheel of the mill. This accident had awakened him to anxiety concerning his soul. He commenced reading his new Bible, with earnest prayer to the Saviour for the guidance and consolation of His Spirit. This was vouchsafed to him; and after some time the miller's man, whom we call John, was a cheerful confessor of the name of Jesus, both by word and deed."

"But persecution came; his master and mistress, and his former comrades, together with those who frequented the mill, appeared moved by an evil spirit, and united, as they said, to put a stop to John's Bible-reading. The miller's son, Anders, a young man of twenty years, wild and impious, was John's assistant, or, more properly, his superior in the mill. They had formerly been the best friends in the world; but Anders tried now, with all his power, by threats, violence, calumny, artifices and enticements, to carry his former companion back again to his previous sinful habits, but in vain."

"One day, when John was at the forge, and Anders found himself alone in the mill, he took John's Bible with the purpose of casting it into the stream; but, as if by mere accident, he opened the book, and now he read the words of the Saviour, Matt. xxiv, 41, 'Two shall be grinding at the mill, the one shall be taken and the other left.' These words touched his heart, and were like a thunder-clap to his conscience. Trembling, he laid the Bible in its place in the mill-chamber, and was from that very hour an altered man."

"Some time afterwards, Anders was heard to confess that Jesus Christ had pardoned even his sins. With glad cheerfulness and amicable confidence, these two men have thenceforth, in one mind, walked together; and in spite of the persecution raised by the enemies of the Gospel, many persons in that village, and still more from the districts, have united with these two believers, and by them have been encouraged to follow the Saviour."

A FATHER'S KISS.

A father was seeing his son off on the cars for some distant point, says the Hartford Post. There was a moment of quiet conversation between the two—perhaps a few words of such advice as a father could give a son, and then the train came thundering into the station.

As the latter, a tall fellow, well along in his teens, stepped on the platform, he extended his hands and his lips to his father. There was a gentle kiss of farewell, and the two separated. There was no gush, no nonsense, no affectation; just the expression of fatherly tenderness that had followed that son since he lay in the cradle.

Is there any danger of that boy straying from the path affectionately pointed out by his father? Or is there any danger of that father ever having to excuse that son because he is "sowing wild oats?" We think not. The gentle power of a mother's kiss has been sung by poets, but is there not also a wealth of tenderness and a lasting memory for good in the kiss of a father?

IS THIS MY FATHER'S WAY FOR ME?

So dark and all unknown to me,
Except the step I'm taking now;
But light enough when Thou art near,
To Thy sweet will I gladly bow.
Unknown to me
As depths of sea—
Is this my Father's way for me?

So full of failings; but these lead
To Thy forgiveness full and sweet,
How little of Thyself I'd know,
Did not Thy grace my failings meet.
Thy grace my plea
For sins I see—
Is this my Father's way for me?

So filled with everlasting love,
So fraught with mercies every hour,
Pardon, healing, crowning, filling,
Revealing Jesus' wondrous power.
Let these make me
Much more like Thee—
Is this my Father's way for me?

So full of sorrow pain and grief,
But thus I know Him better still,
I know His joy, His love, His peace,
I love to learn His precious will.
From these to be
By no means free.
Is this my Father's way for me?

CUPS OF COLD WATER.

There is a pleasant story told of a man living on the borders of an African desert who carried daily a pitcher of cold water to the dusty thoroughfare, and left it for any thirsty traveller who might pass that way. And our Saviour said: "Who-soever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only, in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward." But cups of cold water are not given in African deserts alone. A spiritual Sahara spreads over the whole earth and to its fainting travellers many a hand holds forth the grateful "cup." A lady whose home looks out upon a beautiful common, called to ask if I could tell her of some poor and sick persons to whom she could be of service in furnishing good books. The names of two were given; and the Testament, in large type, which shortly found its way to the old man's abode, also the green tea, and white sugar and the dollar bill, given her at parting—were they not "cups of cold water?" A poor Scotch comb-maker's wife, whose generous heart is larger than her purse, gave me fifteen combs, asking, in a half-doubting way, if I thought some poor children, who had none, would not like them. And so fifteen young hearts were made glad! Several young misses met in our pastor's parlor in the early part of the season, to sew for poor children. From time to time they have come together, plying busy fingers with happy hearts. And we have sixty-two garments as a result. Sixty-two "cups of water."

DR. TALMAGE says: "A great deal of sorrow is caused to young hearts and old by the thought that Christmas comes but once a year," but he continues, "why not extend the glorious season of joy, gladness and good-will throughout the year?" This beautiful thought has been brought rather forcibly to our attention of late by the hundreds of letters we daily receive, asking for "Christmas Boxes." What! Christmas Boxes in March, the idea! who ever heard of hanging up stockings in the Spring-time? But then the people have to use soap the year round and nearly twice as much is used in summer as in winter—you wouldn't think that—would you? But it is a fact, and if folks want "Sweet Home" Soap and wish to make the whole household merry with lots of useful, pretty, valuable and ornamental things, why not do it now as well as in December? and so we extend "Our Mammoth Christmas Box" offer for a limited time. Another thing! There was such an awful rush of orders last Christmas that some of our friends did not get the goods as soon as they expected. It aint so now, you can have the Mammoth Christmas Box when you want it. Better order at once.

The Most Awful Cry on Earth—The Cry for Bread—Brought the Wanderer to his Senses—His Resolution Formed in Disgust at his Circumstances—A Potent Argument—The Assurance of Welcome—The Resolution Founded in Sorrow—In Home-Sickness—A Prayer on Shipboard in a Storm—A Bather Carried Out to Sea—The Resolution was Promptly Executed—Twelve Sailors Drowned near Shore—A Prodigal who Never Got Home—The Contrast in the Destinations of Three Passengers.

"I will arise and go to my father." Luke 15: 18.

THERE is nothing like hunger to take the energy out of a man. A hungry man can toil neither with pen nor hand nor foot. There has been many an army defeated not so much for lack of ammunition as for lack of bread. It was that fact that took the fire out of this young man of the text. Storm and exposure will wear out any man's life in time, but hunger makes quick work. The most awful cry ever heard on earth is the cry for bread. A traveller tells us that in Asia Minor there are trees which bear fruit looking very much like the long bean of our time. It is called the carab. Once in a while the people reduced to destitution would eat these carabs, but generally the carabs, the beans spoken of here in the text, were thrown only to the swine and they crunched them with great avidity. But this young man of my text could not even get them without stealing them. So one day amid the swine troughs he begins to soliloquise. He says, "These are no clothes for a rich man's son to wear; this is no kind of business for a Jew to be engaged in—feeding swine; I'll go home, I'll go home; I will arise and go to my father."

I know there are a great many people who try to throw a fascination, a romance, a halo about sin; but notwithstanding all that Lord Byron and George Sand have said in regard to it, it is a mean, low, contemptible business, and putting food and fodder into the troughs of a herd of iniquities that root and wallow in the soul of man is a very poor business for men and women intended to be sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. And when this young man resolved to go home, it was a very wise thing for him to do, and the only question is whether we will follow him. Satan promises large wages if we will serve him; but he clothes his victims with rags, and he pinches them with hunger, and when they start out to do better he sets after them all the blood-hounds of perdition. Satan comes to us to-day and he promises all luxuries, all emoluments if we will only serve him. Liar, down with thee to the pit! "The wages of sin is death." O! the young man of the text was wise when he uttered the resolution: "I will arise and go to my father."

In the time of Mary, the persecutor, a persecutor came to a Christian woman who had hidden in her house for the Lord's sake one of Christ's servants, and the persecutor said: "Where is that heretic?" The Christian woman said: "You open that trunk and you will see the heretic." The persecutor opened the trunk, and on the top of the linen of the trunk he saw a glass. He said: "There is no heretic here." "Ah," she said, "you look in the glass and you will see the heretic!" As I take up the mirror of God's word to-day, would that instead of seeing the prodigal son of the text, we might see ourselves—our want, our wandering, our sin, or lost condition, so that we might be as wise as this young man was and say: "I will arise and go to my father."

The resolution of this text was formed in disgust at his present circumstances. If this young man had been by his employer set to culturing flowers, or training vines over an arbor, or keeping account of the pork market, or overseeing other laborers, he would not have thought of going home. If he had had his pockets full of money, if he had been able to say, "I have a thousand dollars now of my own; what's the use of my going back to my father's house? do you think I am going back to apologize to the old man? why he would put me on the limits; he would not have going on around the old place such conduct as I have been engaged in; I won't go home; there is no reason why I should go home; I have plenty of money, plenty of pleasant surroundings, why should I go home?" Ah! it was his pauperism, it was his beggary. He had to go home.

Some man comes and says to me: "why do you talk about the ruined state of the human soul? why don't you speak about the progress of the nineteenth century, and talk of something more exhilarating?" It is for this reason; a man never wants the Gospel until he realizes he is in a famine-struck state. Suppose I should come to you in your home and you are in good, sound, robust health, and I should begin to talk about medicines, and about how much better this medicine is than that, and some other medicine than some other medicine, and talk about this physician and that physician. After a while you would get tired, and you would say: "I don't want to hear about medicines. Why do you talk to me of physicians? I never have a doctor." But suppose I come into your house and I find you severely sick, and I know the medicines that will cure you, and I know the physician who is skilful enough to meet your case. You say: "bring on that medicine, bring on that physician. I am terribly sick and I want help." If I came to you and you feel you are all right in body and all right in mind, and all right in soul, you have need of nothing; but suppose I have persuaded you that the leprosy of sin is upon you, the worst of all sickness, O! then you say: "bring me that balm of the Gospel, bring me that divine medicament, bring me Jesus Christ."

But says some one in the audience, "how do you prove that we are in a ruined condition by sin?" Well, I can prove it in two ways, and you may have your choice. I can prove it either by the statements of men, or by the statement of God. Which shall it be? You all say, "let us have the statement of God." Well, he says in one place: "the heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked." He says in another place: "what is man that he should be clean? and he which is born of a woman, that he should be righteous?" He says in another place: "there is none that doeth good, no, not one." He says in another place: "as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." "Well," you say, "I am willing to acknowledge that, but why should I take the particular rescue that you propose?" This is the reason: "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." This is the reason. "There is one name given under Heaven among men whereby they may be saved." Then there are a thousand voices here ready to say: "well, I am ready to accept this help of the Gospel; I would like to have this divine cure; how shall I go to work?" Let me say that a mere whim, an undefined longing amounts to nothing. You must have a stout, tremendous resolution like this young man of the text when he said: "I will arise and go to my father."

"O!" says some man, "how do I know my father wants me? how do I know, if I go back, I would be received?" "O!" says some man, "you don't know where I have been; you don't know how far I have wandered; you wouldn't talk that way to me if you knew all the iniquities I have committed." What is that flutter among the angels of God? It is news, it is news! Christ has found the lost.

Nor angels can their joy contain,
But kindle with new fire;
The sinner lost, is found, they sing,
And strike the sounding lyre.

When Napoleon talked of going into Italy, they said: "You can't get there; if you knew what the Alps were you wouldn't talk about it or think of it; you can't get your ammunition wagons over the Alps." Then Napoleon rose in his stirrups and waving his hand toward the mountains, he said: "There shall be no Alps." That wonderful pass was laid out which has been the wonderment of all the years since—the wonderment of all engineers. And you tell me there are such mountains of sin between your soul and God, there is no mercy. Then I see Christ waving his hand toward the mountains; I hear him say: "I will come over the mountains of thy sin and the hills of thy iniquity." There shall be no Pyrenees; there shall be no Alps.

Again, I notice that this resolution of the young man of the text was founded in sorrow at his misbehavior. It was not mere physical plight. It was grief that he had so maltreated his father. It is a sad thing after a father has done everything for a child, to have that child be ungrateful.

How sharper than a serpent's tooth, it is,
To have a thankless child.

That is Shakespeare. "A foolish son is the heaviness of his mother." That is the Bible. Well, my friends, have not some of us been cruel prodigals? Have we not maltreated our Father? And such a Father! So loving, so kind. If he had been a stranger, if he had forsaken us, if he had flagellated us, if he had pounded us and turned us out of doors on the commons, it would not have been so wonderful—our treatment of him; but he is a father so loving, so kind, and yet how many of us for our wanderings have never apologized. We apologize for wrongs done to our fellows, but some of us perhaps have committed ten thousand times ten thousand wrongs against God and never apologized.

I remark still further that this resolution of the text was founded in a feeling of homesickness. I don't know how long this young man, how many months, how many years, he had been away from his father's house; but there is something in the reading of my text that makes me think he was homesick. Some of you know what that feeling is. Far away from home sometimes, surrounded by everything bright and pleasant—plenty of friends—you have said: "I would give the world to be home to-night." Well, this young man was homesick for his father's house. I have no doubt when he thought of his father's house, he said: "Now, perhaps, father may not be living."

We read nothing in this story—this parable founded on everyday life—we read nothing about the mother. It says nothing about going home to her. I think she was dead. I think she had died of a broken heart at his wanderings. A man never gets over having lost his mother. Nothing said about her here. But he is homesick for his father's house. He thought he would just like to go and walk around the old place. He thought he would just like to go and see if things were as they used to be. Many a man, after having been off a long while, has gone home and knocked at the door, and a stranger has come. It is the old homestead, but a stranger comes to the door. He finds out father is gone and mother is gone, and brothers and sisters all gone. I think this young man of the text said to himself: "Perhaps father may be dead." Still he starts to find out. He is homesick. Are there any here to-day homesick for God, homesick for heaven?

A sailor, after having been long on the sea, returned to his father's house, and his mother tried to persuade him not to go away again. She said: "Now you had better stay at home; don't go away; we don't want you to go; you will have it a great deal better here." But it made him angry. The night before he went away again to sea, he heard his mother praying in the next room, and that made him more angry. He went far out on the sea and a storm came up, and he was ordered to very perilous duty, and he ran up the ratlines, and amid the shrouds of the ship he heard the voice that he had heard in the next room. He tried to whistle it off, he tried to rally his courage; but he could not silence that voice he had heard in the next room, and there in the storm and the darkness, he said: "O, Lord! what a wretch I have been; what a wretch I am. Help me just now, Lord God." And I thought in this assemblage to-day there may be some who may have the memory of a father's petition or a mother's prayer pressing mightily upon the soul, and that this hour they may make the same resolution I find in my text, saying: "I will arise and go to my father."

A lad at Liverpool went out to bathe, went out into the sea, went out too far, got beyond his depth, and he floated far away. A ship bound for Dublin came along and took him on board. Sailors are generally very generous fellows, and one gave him a cap and another gave him a jacket, and another gave him shoes. A gentleman passing along on the beach at Liverpool found the lad's clothes and took them home, and the father was heartbroken, the mother was heartbroken at the loss of their child. They had heard nothing from him day after day, and they ordered the usual mourning for the sad event. But the lad took ship from Dublin and arrived in Liverpool the very day the garments arrived. He knocked at the door, and the father was overjoyed, and the mother was overjoyed at the return of their lost son. O! my friends, have you waded out too deep? Have you waded down into sin? Have you waded from the shore? Will you come back? When you come back, will you come in the rags of your sin, or will you come robed in the Saviour's righteousness? I believe the latter. Go home to your God to-day. He is waiting for you. Go home!

But I remark concerning this resolution, it was immediately put into execution. The context says "he arose and came to his father." The trouble in nine hundred and ninety-nine times out of a thousand is that our resolutions amount to nothing because we make them for some distant time. If I resolve to become a Christian next year, that amounts to nothing at all. If I resolve to become a Christian to-morrow, that amounts to nothing at all. If I resolve at the service to-night to become a Christian, that amounts to nothing at all. If I resolve after I go home to-day to yield my heart to God, that amounts to nothing at all. The only kind of resolution that amounts to anything is the resolution that is immediately put into execution.

There is a man who had the typhoid fever. He said: "Oh! if I could get over this terrible distress! if this fever should depart, if I could be restored to health, I would all the rest of my life serve God." The fever departed. He got well enough to walk around the block. He got well enough to go over to New York and attend to business. He is well to-day—as well as he ever was. Where is the broken vow? There is a man who said long ago: "If I could live to the year 1891, by that time I will have my business matters arranged, and I will have time to attend to religion, and I will be a good, thorough, consecrated Christian." The year 1891 has come. January, February, March, April, May, June—almost half of the year gone. Where is your broken vow? "O!" says some man, "I'll attend to that when I can get my character fixed up; when I can get over my evil habits; I am now given to strong drink," or, says the man, "I am given to uncleanness," or, says the man, "I am given to dishonesty. When I get over my present habits, then I'll be a thorough Christian." My brother, you will get worse and worse, until Christ takes you in hand. "Not the righteous; sinners, Jesus came to call."

O! but you say: "I agree with you on all that, but I must put it off a little longer." Do you know there were many who came just as near as you are to the kingdom of God and never entered it? I was at East Hampton and I went into the cemetery to look around, and in that cemetery there are twelve graves side by side—the graves of sailors. This crew, some years ago, in a ship went into the breakers at Amagansett, about three miles away. My brother, then preaching at East Hampton, had been at the burial. These men of the crew came very near being saved. The people from Amagansett saw the vessel, and they shot rockets, and they sent ropes from the shore, and these poor fellows got into the boat, and they pulled mightily for the shore, but just before they got to the shore the rope snapped and the boat capsized and they were lost, their bodies afterward washed up on the beach. O! what a solemn day it was—I have been told of it by my brother—when these twelve men lay at the foot of the pulpit and he read over them the funeral service. They came very near shore—within shouting distance of the shore, yet did not arrive on solid land. There are some men who come almost to the shore of God's mercy, but not quite, not quite. To be only almost saved is not to be saved at all.

I will tell you of two prodigals, the one that got back and the other that did not get back. In Virginia, there is a very prosperous and beautiful home in many respects. A young man wandered off from that home. He wandered very far into sin. They heard of him often, but he was always on the wrong track. He would not go home. At the door of that beautiful home one night there was a great outcry. The young man of the house ran down and opened the door to see what was the matter. It was midnight. The rest of the family were asleep. There were the wife and the children of this prodigal young man. The fact was he had come home and driven them out. He said: "Out of this house. Away with these children. I will dash their brains out. Out into the storm!" The mother gathered them up and fled. The next morning, the brother, the young man who had stayed at home, went out to find this prodigal brother and son, and he came where he was, and saw the young man wandering up and down in front of the place where he had been staying, and the young man who had kept his integrity said to the older brother: "Here, what does all this mean? What is the matter with you? Why do you act in this way?" The prodigal looked at him and said: "Who am I? Who do you take me to be?" He said: "You are my brother." "No, I am not. I am a brute. Have you seen anything of my wife and children? Are they dead? I drove them out last night in the storm. I am a brute. John, do you think there is any help for me? Do you think I will ever get over this life of dissipation?" He said: "John, there is just one thing that will stop this." The prodigal ran his finger across his throat and said: "That will stop it, and I'll stop it before night. O! my brain; I can stand it no longer." That prodigal never got home. But I will tell you of a prodigal that did get home.

In England two young men started from their father's house and went down to Portsmouth. The father could not pursue his children; for some reason he could not leave home, and so he wrote a letter down to Mr. Griffin, saying: "Mr. Griffin, I wish you would go and see my two sons. They have arrived in Portsmouth and they are going to take ship, and going away from home. I wish you would persuade them back." Mr. Griffin went and he tried to persuade them back. He persuaded one to go. He went with very easy persuasion because he was very homesick already. The other young man said, "I will not go. I have had enough of home. I'll never go home." "Well," said Mr. Griffin, "then if you won't go home, I'll get you a respectable position on a respectable ship." "No, you won't," said the prodigal: "No, you won't. I am going as a common sailor; that will plague my father most, and what will do most to tantalize and worry him will please me best."

Years passed on and Mr. Griffin was seated in his study one day when a message came to him that there was a young man in irons on a ship at the dock—a young man condemned to death—who wished to see this clergyman. Mr. Griffin went down to the dock and went on the shipboard. The young man said to him:

ing at East Hampton, had been at the burial. These men of the crew came very near being saved. The people from Amagansett saw the vessel, and they shot rockets, and they sent ropes from the shore, and these poor fellows got into the boat, and they pulled mightily for the shore, but just before they got to the shore the rope snapped and the boat capsized and they were lost, their bodies afterward washed up on the beach. O! what a solemn day it was—I have been told of it by my brother—when these twelve men lay at the foot of the pulpit and he read over them

"don't know me, do you?" "No," he said, "I don't know you." "Why, don't you remember that young man you tried to persuade to go home and he wouldn't go?" "O! yes," said Mr. Griffin, "are you that man?" "Yes, I am that man," said the other. "I would like to have you pray for me. I have committed murder and I must die; but I don't want to go out of this world until some one prays for me. You are my father's friend and I would like to have you pray for me." Mr. Griffin went from judicial authority to judicial authority to get the young man's pardon. He slept not night nor day. He went from influential person to influential person until in some way he got that young man's pardon. He came down on the dock and as he arrived on the dock with the pardon the father came. He had heard that his son under a disguised name had been committing crime and was going to be put to death. So Mr. Griffin and the father went on ship's deck, and at the very moment Mr. Griffin offered the pardon to the young man, the old father threw his arms around the son's neck and the son said: "Father, I have done very wrong and I am very sorry. I wish I had never broken your heart. I am very sorry." "O!" said the father, "don't mention it; it don't make any difference now. It is all over. I forgive you, my son," and he kissed him and kissed him and kissed him.

To-day I offer you the pardon of the Gospel—full pardon, free pardon. I do not care what your sin has been. Though you say you have committed a crime against God, against your own soul, against your fellow man, against your family, against the day of judgment, against the cross of Christ—whatever your crime has been, here is pardon, full pardon, and the very moment that you take that pardon your heavenly father throws his arms around about you and says: "My son, I forgive you. It is all right. You are as much in my favor now as if you had never sinned." O! there is joy on earth and joy in heaven. Who will take the father's embrace?

There was a gentleman in a rail-car who saw in that same car three passengers of very different circumstances. The first was a maniac. He was carefully guarded by his attendants; his mind, like a ship dismasted, was beating against a dark, desolate coast, from which no help could come. The train stopped, and the man was taken out into the asylum, to waste away, perhaps, through years of gloom. The second passenger was a culprit. The outraged law had seized on him. As the cars jolted, the chains rattled. On his face were crime, depravity, and despair. The train halted, and he was taken out to the penitentiary, to which he had been condemned. There was the third passenger, under far different circumstances. She was a bride. Every hour was gay as a marriage-bell. Life glittered and beckoned. Her companion was taking her to his father's house. The train halted. The old man was there to welcome her to her new home, and his white locks snowed down upon her as he sealed his word with a father's kiss.

Quickly we fly toward eternity. We will soon be there. Some leave this life condemned. Oh, may it be with us, that, leaving this fleeting life for the next, we may find our Father ready to greet us to our new home with him forever. That will be a marriage banquet! Father's welcome! Father's bosom! Father's kiss! Heaven! Heaven!

JEWISH REAL ESTATE IN PALESTINE.

A Christian gentleman now travelling in Palestine writes: "The Jews are buying land rapidly. The prohibition to their purchase of land is practically removed, and the Sultan has even sold them some of his own private property. A banker of Jerusalem told me that, in his opinion, in ten to twenty years the whole of Palestine will be in the possession of the Jews. Things move so rapidly in our days that it may be in the shorter period, or even less."

OUR MISSIONARY IN MISSOURI.

A LIBERAL RESPONSE TO "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S GENEROUS OFFER."

The Funds for Supporting a Missionary of The American Sunday School Union in North Missouri Supplied by "The Christian Herald's" Subscribers.

EVERY subscriber of this journal has a personal interest in the character and work of the excellent missionary whose portrait appears this week on the first page. Rev. G. W. Sharp is the missionary to whom reference was made in these columns on May 6, when the spiritual needs of the South-west were described in connection with the work that Dr. Paxson is doing there under the auspices of the American Sunday School Union. Dr. Paxson's story of the urgency of the work, of the fitness of this laborer to carry it on, and of the difficulty of securing the seven hundred dollars necessary to place him in the field, so impressed the publisher of this journal that he offered to give two hundred dollars of the amount required, if the subscribers would give the other five hundred dollars. Within a month the whole sum was furnished and Dr. Paxson was notified that he might retain

"The Christian Herald" Missionary.

This fact will, we are sure, be gratifying to our readers. Being entirely undenominational, the work is clearly in harmony with the principles of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and, being purely evangelical, every reader can sympathize with it and conscientiously pray for the divine blessing upon it. They will perceive with sincere pleasure that the continuously increasing prosperity enjoyed by this journal during the past year is bringing forth fruit after its kind. During that period it has done several good works. It gave substantial aid in the erection of the New Brooklyn Tabernacle; it provided the citizens of New York with the opportunity of hearing Dr. Talmage's Gospel sermons in their own city every Sunday night for seven months, at an expense of six thousand dollars; it has engaged and is supporting an earnest evangelist who conducts revival work free of cost in Churches which need the services of an evangelist; and it has now placed in a neglected field a missionary whose duty and delight it is to preach the Gospel to the poor and gather the children into Sunday Schools where they may hear of Jesus. It is a record of an eminently gratifying character and the publisher is devoutly thankful to God that his efforts have been so blessed of him, as to give the means for its achievement.

The Law or the Gospel.

Having provided the fund for the support of a missionary, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD left the selection of a suitable man for the work to the Rev. W. P. Paxson, D.D., who is in charge of the work of the American Sunday School Union in the South-west, and who thoroughly understands the nature of the field and the qualities needed in a successful laborer. He has selected the Rev. George W. Sharp, who is well known to him, and who has already done valuable work under his superintendence. Mr. Sharp was born in Clay County, Missouri, Jan. 20th, 1838. His father was a prominent lawyer of that State who, while quite a young man was elected a County Justice, and at the time of his death was Probate Judge of Macon Co. The son was left fatherless at the age of fifteen, but his mother, an eminently wise and godly lady watched carefully over his education and trained him in the fear of the Lord. The young man, after passing through the High School and McGee College, chose his father's profession, and was sent to the Law School of Cumberland University at Lebanon, Tenn., where he graduated in June, 1858. He at once commenced practice and met with marked success.

In the year 1863 when he was recognized as one of the rising lawyers of his State—a man who in five years practice had proved his ability and learning in many weighty cases—he attended a revival meeting at which, by the blessing of God, the whole course of his future was changed. He passed from death unto life and from that time longed to give himself wholly to Christ's service. Two years later the way opened and Mr. Sharp quitted the bar to study for the ministry. The Judge of the Circuit Court before whom he had chiefly practised, on hearing that the young man had given up the law to become a minister, exclaimed: "That may pay George in the next world, but it has a poor show in this." Doubtless it did seem to the legal mind at that time a step lacking in worldly prudence, but the judge himself became in later years a Christian and saw it in a new light. Other legal friends deplored Mr. Sharp's course and urged him not to abandon the brilliant prospects before him. Some of them gave practical proof of the sincerity of their appeals by offering him partnership. Mr. Sharp had to decide between wealth and distinction, on the one hand and poverty and hardships on the other. He did not hesitate, but counting, as Moses did, "the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures" of the world he remained true to the service of his Lord.

His ministry was blessed from the beginning. He labored in several churches in his native State, and did much evangelizing work. After some ten years' work he passed through a season of spiritual conflict in which he suffered severely. The difference between justification effected through faith in the finished work of Christ, and sanctification effected by the continuous work of the Holy Spirit was not clear to his mind, and for a time he was sorely troubled and distressed. He studied many works of eminent divines, especially those of Bunyan, Wesley, Chalmers and Newton, but the darkness did not lift until providentially he was directed to a work entitled Instant Salvation, by the Rev. James Gall of Edinburgh, which made the whole matter clear to him. Joy and peace filled his heart, and from that time he has never been disturbed by doubts. The experience has been eminently useful to him in his subsequent work; the lessons he learned in that time of darkness he has proclaimed to many in similar perplexity and they, too, have been delivered.

Sunday School Work.

In February, 1879, Mr. Sharp became interested in the magnificent work being done by the American Sunday School Union through the great South-west. None knew better than he the need of such work. He had always deplored the hostility of the sects and the folly of Christian men contending and competing with each other while great sections of the country were waiting for the preaching of the simple Gospel, which might be given them by united effort. Then the Union's work was primarily for the children and Mr. Sharp realized that no work had a brighter prospect or gave better promise for the community than that of winning the children for Jesus. He threw himself heart and soul into the work. Since that time he has travelled over 51,000 miles, chiefly on foot and in private conveyances, organizing Sunday Schools in neglected districts, visiting and nurturing them and superintending their work. Four hundred and ninety-five of these schools have been established and it is estimated that over 24,000 children have been taught in them, and 3,000 teachers regularly employed. Beside this Mr. Sharp has done much valuable work among adults on his journeys both by preaching, visiting and distributing Bibles. Nearly 3,000 copies of the Word of God have thus been introduced into the homes of the people.

While rejoicing in the success of this work, and its promise of further usefulness, the Sunday School Union suddenly discovered that it could not be continued. A variety of causes had combined to deplete the treasury of the Union, and it became imperatively necessary to reduce the number of missionaries employed. Some of the fields occupied must be temporarily abandoned, and among them, that in which Mr. Sharp was laboring. The managers made the announcement with deep regret, but as the funds for the support of the missionaries were exhausted, they had no alternative. They are relieved of the painful necessity in Mr. Sharp's case by the liberality of the subscribers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. In acknowledging the receipt of the money the District Secretary of the Union, Rev. L. Milton Marsh, says: "May the dear Lord prosper THE CHRISTIAN HERALD abundantly in its work of love."

The Field

which Mr. Sharp now occupies is North Missouri, a district equal in size to one-third of all New England, with a population of 889,000 souls. Some idea of the character of his work may be gleaned from the illustrations accompanying his portrait on the first page. No. 3 is a picture taken from a photograph of an Indian girl. There are many Indian families settled in this district, and much valuable work has been done among them by the Sunday School Union's emissaries. No. 4 is the typical log-house which is generally the first home of the Sunday School, where it has not a still earlier stage under a tree. Gradually the school grows, the parents of the children are reached, and a regular preaching service is inaugurated. Then a better building is needed, and a frame church such as that shown in illustration No. 5, is erected. So the work usually develops and becomes self-supporting.

The illustration No. 2, on the first page, is the portrait of Mr. S. Madison Hamilton of Baltimore. It gives us great pleasure to present this portrait. Mr. Hamilton read the article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of May 6th, and at once determined that the offer of the publisher should be accepted. He wrote to us to ascertain what response had come and on receiving a reply, sent a cheque for the balance. His was the largest contribution to the fund, exceeding even that of the publisher. "Let there be no delay," he wrote, "have the missionary in the field at once," and his wish was obeyed. To his promptitude and liberality is largely due the success of this effort. Contributions have also been received from:

E. P. Beall, E. De La Perrelli, Albert E. Le Grand, Elias W. Le Grand, John L. C. Le Grand, Edward I. Wade, R. S. Stoddard, John O. McFarland, G. N. B. F. Thos. McCalma, M. T. Gunderson, Geo. S. McKie, A. Type Setter, Alice Neil, A. Friend, Mrs. M. E. Beasley, A. Stranger, Sallie Ramsey, Wilson N. Hopkin, W. A. Spahr, Mrs. Florence M. Collins, M. Logan Guthrie, Mrs. E. L. F. Dodd, Miss Adeline Cornwall, Celia Devine Rantone, Lena Graw, M. A. Pearce, Mrs. E. J. Cook, John F. Boyle, Maggie Smiley, E. W. Simpson, P. H. Fair.

Mr. Sharp promises to send us reports of his labor which will be published as they are received. We earnestly hope that all our subscribers will pray for God's blessing to rest upon him in his work for Christ.

A FATAL SPRING.

A POOL of death is described in the San Francisco Chronicle. A correspondent of that journal states that at the foot of the Mendocina Mountains in California, and not far from the road between Hopland and Ukiah is a singular pool of water. It is caused by a spring flowing from gravelly soil. There is some fatal property in the water or in the exhalations from it. Around its sides or floating on its surface are dead birds and small animals who have evidently gone to it to drink and have lost their lives. The water is clear and sparkling, with nothing in its appearance to indicate danger. The correspondent avers that he has seen birds lower their flight as if to skin its surface and fall over helpless and die. Rumors are current that a lost child was found near it dead, with a beautiful bird in her hand, having probably bent over the deadly water to pick up the bird and been overcome by the fumes. "People who live within miles of it are aware of its fatal influence and give it a wide berth." Unhappily it is not so with the places which are fatal to spiritual life. Those places are much frequented though "many strong men have been slain there," while the water of life is offered freely to all and few care to take of it. (Rev. 22:17.)

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Mother's Heroic Self-Sacrifice — A Prisoner's Heavy Sentence — A Child Demented by Terror — Exposed by the Search Light — Poisoned by Wall-Paper.

HEROIC Endurance on the Part of a mother saved her daughter's life recently in Baltimore, Md. The mother was attending to some cooking operations in her kitchen while her daughter was in the cellar below, getting coal. Suddenly a part of the hearthstone fell through and immediately a cry of pain came from below. Looking through the hole in the floor the mother saw her daughter pinned to the ground by the heavy masonry. She was starting to her assistance when, to her horror, another piece of the flooring gave way and the stove pitched forward and was about to follow. Realizing that her daughter must be killed if the stove dropped, the mother seized it with her hands, almost red hot as it was, and pushing it back, held it up until help arrived. Her hands and arms were so terribly burned that there is little hope of her recovering the use of them. But she is not likely to be in want even if she cannot work again. The daughter, whose life she saved by her heroic self-sacrifice, is sure to work for her. Would that men whose right to eternal life Christ purchased with his blood could be so relied on to live for him! (Rom. 12:1.)

A Young Man Sentenced to Twenty-six Years' imprisonment is hoping to receive a pardon from the Governor of New York. About three years ago, a number of farmers in the vicinity of Buffalo were systematically robbed by a clever burglar. The thefts were craftily planned and successfully executed. In spite of their frequency, the thief could not be discovered. At last, two men, one of whom was only twenty years old, were caught in the act. On being arraigned, both men pleaded "guilty." A light sentence was expected, as the goods stolen were worth less than two dollars. The judge, however, believing the men to be guilty of the previous burglaries, sentenced them to imprisonment for twenty-six years. It now appears that the younger prisoner was unjustly sentenced. The crime of which he was convicted was his first offence, and he was not quite sober when he consented to join the veteran burglar in the expedition. These facts have been submitted to Governor Hill in the hope that the young man having served two and a half years of his sentence may be pardoned. If he had been guilty of the former burglaries, there would have been little hope of obtaining a pardon for him. It is recognized that long and persistent wrong-doing demands cumulative punishment. This principle is overlooked by men who, having rejected salvation through Christ, vaguely trust that God will be merciful to them when, after a whole life of wickedness, they stand at his bar. (Rom. 2:4, 5.)

A Child Lost in the Wilderness Caused much anxiety to his family at Mongaup, N. Y., last week. A press dispatch from Monticello says that for two days the whole township has been searching for the twelve year old son of a farmer. He had been taught to drive the cows home at milking time and started out to do so at the usual hour. As he did not return, the farmer went for the cows himself but found no trace of his son. He suspected at once that the child had wandered into "the wilderness," a great stretch of swampy forest land lying between the farm and the Black and White Lakes. As there are known to be wild cats in that region there was general alarm and a search party was organized. No trace of him was found though the search was continued with lanterns all night. All the next day and night he was sought but without success. On the second day a woman who had separated from the rest of the party caught sight of him at a distance. He looked utterly dazed and as he saw the woman approach him he ran away from her in terror. She shouted until the searchers heard her and came to her help. Following the track of the child's feet, which she pointed out, they found him hiding in the undergrowth. He was then seven miles from home. He was completely worn out and the terrors of the two nights in the forest had unstrung his nerves so that it was with difficulty he could be induced to return to his home. Christian workers, who seek wanderers from God, sometimes have a similar difficulty in persuading them to return to him. With a perversity as hard to overcome as the child's dementia they resist "the things that make for their peace." (John 12:40.)

An Unexpected Exposure Annoyed the Residents of an aristocratic district of New York on June 6. A little after midnight a fire broke out in a house on Madison Avenue. There was some delay in getting the engines to the place and the flames made considerable headway. Apparently there were not many persons on the streets at that hour, but in a short time the fire attracted a large crowd. The burning house became a brilliant spectacle which the assembled people watched intently. Then the engines arrived with their usual clatter and loud snorting noise, making everyone in the neighborhood aware of the fire. Just as they began playing on the burning house the man in charge of the search light on the tower of the Madison Garden turned the light up the avenue, making the thoroughfare as light as day. Instantly the people on the street saw that the windows of the surrounding houses were all occupied by watchers, who, aroused from their sleep by the unwonted noise and commotion, had not waited to make their toilets before looking out of the window. The search-light revealed them in all stages of dishabille. But only for a moment. They hurriedly moved out of sight, vexed beyond measure at having been seen so attired. Their vexation was natural but it would soon be forgotten. Far otherwise will it be in that day of sudden revelation when all things are exposed in the light of God's countenance. Then they who have been living in spiritual darkness of their own choice and have not been clothed with the robe of Christ's righteousness will call to the mountains and the rocks to fall upon them and hide them. (Rev. 6:16.)

A Lady's Mysterious Illness was Explained recently by an eminent New York physician. For some months past she has been suffering from insomnia, lassitude and loss of appetite. Having consulted physicians in Chicago, where she lived, and taken large quantities of the medicine they prescribed, without getting relief, she decided to submit her case to a New York specialist. After hearing her story of her symptoms and making a careful examination, he told her, she was suffering from anemia caused by arsenical poisoning. She declared that it was impossible, but the physician persisted in his diagnosis and questioned her closely about her home and surroundings. Among other questions, he asked her what kind of paper was on the walls of her bedroom. She told him it was excellent quality, of a pale green tint, and she had the same paper on other rooms which she occupied. There was, she said, no other color that the eye rested upon with so much pleasure. "That is the cause of your trouble," said the doctor. "If you will get some of that paper analyzed, you will find that it contains arsenic in large quantities. The lady did as she was advised, and the analyst confirmed the doctor's opinion. She immediately ordered the paper to be stripped off the walls and another kind of paper put on. The substitute does not gratify her taste, but her health has been restored since the change was made. An analogous sacrifice of taste in the surroundings of Christians afflicted with spiritual ailments might be similarly beneficial. There are some pleasant homes and public resorts in which the social atmosphere is detrimental to spiritual health. (II Cor. 16:17.)

Volume XIII., of The Christian Herald, containing the numbers for 1891, with complete index, bound in cloth, may be had from this office; price $2.50, including postage. A few volumes of 1884, 1885, 1887, 1888 and 1890 are also for sale. None are on hand prior to 1884.

THE WORD MADE FLESH.

S. S. LESSON FOR JULY 5, BY MRS. M. BAXTER.
JOHN 1: 1-18. GOLDEN TEXT, JOHN. 1: 14.

What Jesus was to the Apostle John—Filling the Universe and Eternity—The Origin of Life—The Life which Lights the World—John the Baptist's Mission—Sanctified and Consecrated—The Light Unrecognized—The Gift of Sonship—The Incarnation in its Effects on Humanity—The Test of Spiritual Life.

ESUS filled the horizon of the apostle John. In time and in eternity, Jesus was to him "the First and the Last," the source and the goal of all things. The kingly and priestly genealogy which circumscribed Matthew's view of Jesus in the past, the Adamic genealogy which bounded Luke's, could not restrain the prisoner at Patmos. John had feasted his eyes on his Lord, until his intense gaze saw far back beyond time into a past eternity, where he could discern nothing else but Jesus, and in concentrated utterance he says, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." With John all theology was Jesus himself, the doctrine was the Person. He tells us more about what he was than what he did. All John's knowledge centred in Jesus.

The Word!

John lived in the light of eternity, and breathed in eternal life from its very Source; he was filled, satisfied with Jesus. Inquisitive speculations about the past, arising from geological discoveries, found no place with him, Jesus was the solution of all. Howsoever, whosoever, or for whatsoever purpose they were made, "all things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that was made." He traced natural law, not to its own development, but to its Creator, its Lawgiver and Upholder. He made all things, he upholds them all "with the Word of his power." All power over animate and inanimate creation is given to him; this satisfied John. He saw that he had not to do with things or persons or laws which were intrinsically mighty, but back of them all was the Creator, "with whom we have to do."

There is a wonderful rest in the knowledge that "without him was not anything made that was made;" everything has its being by his permission, and he is in charge of all. "By him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers; all things were created by him and for him; and he is before all things, and by him all things consist." Here is the apostle, in his weakness and nothingness, looking out on a vast universe, in which he is but an atom, with all the consciousness of an intimate oneness with him who governs all! In relation to him, the universe is stupendous, but it is all subject to him in whose bosom he has learned to lie; why then should he fear? There is no chance in a life which is steadied and balanced by a real true acquaintance with God. To the eye which endures "as seeing him who is invisible" God is seen in everything. "He spake and it was done, he commanded and it stood fast." He who has learned to trace everything up to God is ready for any emergency.

"In him was life." "I am the resurrection and the life." (John 11: 25.) "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made, and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth." He breathed into Adam's nostrils "the breath of life, and man became a living soul" (or a breathing life. Gen. 2: 7.) Because God breathed man lived, because God spoke, the earth brought forth. Life may be transmitted, but can never be originated, by man; all life comes from him who is life. If this is so in the natural world, how much more so in the spiritual world! There is a sad, piteous attempt in these days to substitute something else for spiritual life. But we can never get beyond the declaration of John, "In him was life, and the life was the light of men." "You hath he quickened in trespasses and sins, wherein in times past ye walked according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience: among whom we all had our conversation in times past, in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind and were by nature the children of wrath, even as others." (Eph. 2: 1-3.) "Dead in trespasses and sins," or "passed from death unto life" (John 5: 24): one of these two states describes every child of Adam, baptized or unbaptized, communicant or not, intellectual or simple, every one is still dead in sin, or has "passed from death unto life." And none can pass from death unto life but by Jesus Christ. "No man cometh unto the Father but by me." (John 14: 6.) The religion of the day arrogates our independence of God: the Word teaches us the most absolute and indispensable dependence upon him. All religion, which keeps God at a distance, has the elements of heathenism in it. It consists of prayers which are not expected to be answered services which shall minister to the musical, artistic, or intellectual tastes of the people, but in which there is no attempt to draw near to God, or to give God a chance to act or speak. There may be certain acts of devotion which please the natural man, and gratify his desire to be something remarkable, but the life,—where is it? The worshippers are still dead.

But "the life was the light of men," though they may have been too blind to see it, "and the light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehended [or apprehended R. V.] it not." Amidst all the confusion between the real and the natural, "that true light . . . lighteth every man that cometh into the world." We know not how, we know not when, but God cannot deny himself. By some means or other, he communicates with every soul of man; every man has, at some period of his life, a time of visitation, a consciousness of being called into a near and more personal relation to God. He may stifle the conviction until it disappears out of his life, but on the great day of account, he will not dare to deny that God has spoken to him. The darkness, as a whole, comprehended him not, man as a race, still casts out Jesus, ignores him in politics, puts him outside of family life, casts his word out of the schools, makes everything a recreation and a pleasure but his service, and he is still the "despised and rejected of men;" yet the true light is shining, and all who will can find their way to the Father through him.

Side by side with him, the eternal Son and Word of God, he sent a human being to bear testimony, "There was a man sent from God whose name was John." This is all we read of him here. Elsewhere we find he was "filled with the Holy Ghost from his birth." (Luke 1: 15.) "The child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, and was in the deserts until the day of his shewing unto Israel." Filled with God, educated directly by God in his desert life, John was peculiarly the sent of God. "The same came for a witness, to bear witness of that light, that all men through him might believe." The vocation of John was to awaken and arouse a generation as full of externalism of agnosticism, and of senseless, pride of intellect as the present, to the great fact that God incarnate was in their very midst.

What need was there for a witness, if the true light was in the world? Was not his presence its own witness? "He was in the world, and the world was made by him, and

The World Knew Him Not.

He came up to his own, and they that were his own (the Jews) received him not," (R. V.) Man is by his fallen nature so self-centered that it interferes with him, and puts him out of his way, to have another Light than his own reason, another Master than his own will; he would rather be left to himself; man is so far fallen that he does not perceive, until he is aroused to see it, his own need of God. Man is become flesh, and the spirit-nature, "dead in trespasses and sins," needs to be quickened, that there may be any desire after God. But the true Light does light "every man that cometh into the world." And "to as many as have given heed to the Light, and received him, to them gave he power (or the right) to become the sons of God." Just that which the serpent held out to Eve as an inducement to sin, "Ye shall be as gods," Jesus holds out as a gift to those who receive him as their own personal Saviour, the right to become the sons of God, "even to them that believe on his name; which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of men, but of God." A heavenly generation of man, born of the Spirit of God in whom the spirit "the hidden man of the heart in that which is not corruptible," shall again have its place of honor in the being of man, and make a home for his God within him. But, that this may be possible, the Word, the Life and Source of all things, must himself come down. And he came, that man might again be made spirit, and he "dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father,"—not the glory which man prizes, of gold and silver, horses and carriages, servants and soldiers, houses and lands, he was "full of grace and truth;" this was his glory. "And of his fullness have all we (believers) received, and grace for grace; for the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth [the glory of our Lord] came by Jesus Christ." If grace and truth are lacking in a child of God, the proof of his sonship is wanting. "Of his fullness have all we received." Let none deceive himself, this is God's test of real spiritual life; and where either grace or truth are lacking, God will not pass a man as one of his.

"The Word was made Flesh,"

THE STONE KINGDOM.

The Stone which smites the Symbolical Image on its Feet and then fills the Whole Earth.

BY W. GREENE, C. E.*

OUR Blessed Lord could, by reason of his divine nature, foresee clearly the awful work that Satan would carry out on this earth, as god or ruler of the same, and clearly foretold in the prophetic Scriptures with the greatest precision and detail, the varied forms of evil, secular and ecclesiastical, that would arise in the lapse of the ages in our world. One of his most remarkable discourses is that which contains that notable prayer, called the Lord's Prayer, in which occur the words, "Thy kingdom come."

In this short sentence is contained in embryo the everlasting blessing that is to come to this world when the wicked one is put out, and the glorious prophecy is fulfilled, "The kingdoms of this world have become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever."

We know from Isa. 9, that his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice, from henceforth even for ever. Luke, the Evangelist, says he shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end. Isaiah in his 2d chapter, says, "The law shall go forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem, and he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people. And they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks. Nation shall not lift up sword against nation neither shall they learn war any more."

Such are some of the events that accompany the setting up of the throne of Christ at the commencement of the Millennium. Now this throne is prepared in heaven, as is also the king. "The Lord hath prepared his throne in the heavens and his kingdom ruleth over all" (Ps. 103: 19). Now, seeing that this glorious kingdom has to be established, and soon, as we believe. Peter exhorts us to be looking for and hastening the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens being on fire, shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat. Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. (II. Pet. 3: 12.)

But for the setting up of the Kingdom of Christ we have a definite time and manner when that is to take place in Daniel 2: 44. where it is written, In the days of these kings shall the God of Heaven set up a kingdom, so until we see the Roman earth divided into Ten Kingdoms, as indicated by the Ten Toes of the Image of Daniel 2, and the Ten Horns of the Beast, we cannot expect to see that kingdom established, for the Word of God is clear and precise and worthy of our attention in this matter as to the time of the establishment of Christ's Kingdom.

Be it also remembered that the predicted Sovereignty of Judah passed far beyond the limits of mere supremacy among the tribes of Israel. It was an imperial sceptre, which was entrusted to the Son, "I will make him my first-born higher than the kings of the earth." (Ps. 89: 27.) "All the kings shall fall down before him, all nations shall do him service" (Ps. 72: 11.) Now, our Lord sprang from Judah, and of Judah, he says, "Judah is my law-giver." In the great final conflict against his enemies mentioned in the 10th chapter of Zechariah it says, "The Lord of hosts hath visited his flock, the house of Judah, and hath made them as his goodly horse in battle." In Genesis 49: 10, it is written, "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah nor a law-giver from between his feet until Shiloh come"; but as events prove this cannot mean that royal power was to be exercised by the house of Judah only "until the Advent of Christ.

Hengstenberg has rightly interpreted in his Christology, "Judah shall not cease to exist as a tribe, nor lose its superiority, until it shall be exalted to higher honor and glory through the great Redeemer who shall spring from it, and whom not only the Jews but all nations of the earth shall obey." The meaning of the prophecy therefore was not that Judah was to exercise royal power until Christ, and then lose it, which is the lame and unsatisfactory gloss usually adopted; but that the pre-eminence of Judah is to be irrevocably established in Christ, not spiritually, but in fact in the kingdom of which Daniel prophesies. "Thy kingdom come" refers to the establishment of the Sceptre and throne of Judah which shall destroy all earthly thrones and kingdoms and fill the whole earth. Thus God makes Judah his new centre, and says, "Yet I have set my king upon my holy hill of Zion, thou Judah art he whom thy brethren shall praise."

But Satan has his own exaltation in view. Of him it is written, "He opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called god, or that is worshipped." By him the Roman Empire is reconstructed, and divided into ten distinct kingdoms and from the Greek or eastern portion of that kingdom shall arise that terrible enemy of God and his people, whose destruction is to be one of the principal events of the coming of our blessed Lord.

In the face of these solemn facts do we not do well to close this paper with the words which he taught us to use, "Thy kingdom come."

THE SOJOURNER AT VERNON.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for July 5. "The word was made flesh, and dwelt among us." John 1: 14.

VERNON folks were not accustomed to visitors thirty years ago. The little village perched on the cliffs overlooking the sea is quite a fashionable resort now. Since a famous artist spent a summer there painting the sea and the crags, and sold his two pictures for more money than would have bought every house in the village, the summer boarder has been a familiar figure to the fishing folk. They were surprised to hear how the New York people admired the pictures of their rugged cliffs, and still more surprised when one lady visitor, who prided herself on being "intense," declared that she hoped there would be a dreadful storm while she was there, that she might see those crags in their true grandeur. They wanted no storms. Those cruel rocks were the dread of every wife and mother in the village and not a few of them had reason to hate them for causing the death of some one dear to them.

But thirty years ago the advent of a quiet studious looking stranger caused a sensation in the village. He had come for rest and change, Widow Goodlow said. He was boarding at the widow's cottage, recommended there by the widow's only son, who lived in the city and, "fairly worshipped Mr. Landon." A sort of a clergyman he was, the widow said. "Leastways she gathered as much from Tom's letter; but not just a regular clergyman somehow. Tom spoke about his visiting sick folks and giving them medicine and his house was full of glass cases and little drawers with curious stones, and moths and butterflies in them and he had young men there and talked about these things. He preached on Sundays too."

The people used to look at him wonderingly as they saw him walking across the big boulders at low tide, stooping now and again to pick up a shell or stone and again climbing the cliffs to gather the moss which grew in the crevices. Why he should care for such things they had no idea, and most of them looked on the clergyman as a kind of harmless lunatic. Widow Goodlow described his enthusiasm over his treasures and those who heard her were astonished that a real sensible man should spend his time that way. The men especially had a poor opinion of city folks if this man was a specimen of them.

Yet Mr. Landon won the respect of some of the villagers. There was a case of small-pox in one of the houses and every one avoided that house. Even the doctor, who usually rode over from the next village to see anyone who was sick in Vernon, neglected the case after his first visit when he diagnosed the disease. The wife of the patient declared her man would surely have died if Mr. Landon had not gone to see him every day and told her what to give him. No one else came near, she said. And he worked a double cure; for the man was notorious for his drinking habits and when he got well Mr. Landon "talked to him like a father and got him to swear off, so as you would not know him now for the same man."

One night, nearly a month after Mr. Landon's arrival, a sudden storm visited the coast. Some of the fishing-boats came back early, the men having recognized the signs of the approaching tempest and taken warning. Others came in later and only the most skillful seamanship availed to save them from destruction on those cruel rocks. Mr. Landon was out, clad in a long oilskin coat, watching the storm. It was a grand sight as flash after flash of lightning illumined the giant waves which near shore were crested with white foam. There was some dark object indistinctly visible far out at sea. The watcher on the cliff was not sure what it was. The shouts below him in the village told him, however, that the people there knew. They were getting out their life-boat to be ready for use if it became possible to launch it. Above the roar of the wind and the waves he could hear the men calling to each other and the women crying. There was one shriek that pierced his ear which seemed to express a concentration of human anguish never to be forgotten. It was that of a newly married woman whose young husband was in the doomed ship then making a gallant but futile struggle to keep off the rocks.

Mr. Landon went down to the little group of villagers. Brave men used to the dangers of the sea stood around the life-boat, but none dared face those wild seething waters. The first grey streaks of dawn showed in the east and revealed the ship. She had struck on a sunken rock and the waves swayed her to and fro threatening every moment to engulf her. Now if ever was the time to act; but none stirred. Mr. Landon stripped off his coat and took off his shoes. No one was noticing him until with a rope tied around his waist he was making his way to a ledge of rocks, which he knew well, overhanging the sea.

"What are you going to do sir?" asked a rough fisherman.

"I am going to that ledge," said Mr. Landon. "I shall be clear of the undertow from there."

"Don't you do it," said the fisherman; "it is certain death. No one could live in such a sea."

"I am going," said Mr. Landon calmly. "You see that the rope is paid out properly."

The man would have held him back by force but he shook himself free and made his way to the ledge. In another minute he had plunged into the angry waters and was striking out for the ship. A cry of mingled pity and admiration went up from the group on the beach. Again and again they thought he was drowned, as he disappeared beneath the waves, but they saw him rise again and at last within a short distance of the wreck. He was seen now from the deck and they were throwing a rope to him. Then they saw him pulled on board and they made the rope fast. One by one the crew worked their way along that rope safely to shore. Last of all came Mr. Landon and the Captain. They came almost together; for the ship was breaking up and there was no time to lose.

"Let us pray," said the clergyman as all stood together on the beach. Kneeling there he thanked God for the lives saved and prayed that they might be spent in Christian service.

A deed so heroic had never before been witnessed on those shores. All the village had seen it and they talked it over in every home. When Mr. Landon went out later in the day, after recruiting his strength by a long sleep, men gathered around him and shook him by the hand. Women clung to him and thanked him with moist eyes for beloved lives saved and seemed ready to worship him. Why had he risked his life like that for men who were almost strangers to him?

Mr. Landon told them why, next Sunday when by invitation of the local clergyman he occupied the pulpit of the village church. "The love of Christ constraineth us" was his text, and he told them of what a power that love was in the heart of man. How it caused men to forget themselves, to give themselves for others, to live a new life of helpfulness and consecration, seeking day by day to tread in the footsteps of him "who went about doing good;" so that the life of the true Christian became like an incarnation of the love of God. When men so live, he told them, others see not them but the love which is embodied in them, like him of whom it was said, "the word was made flesh and dwelt among us."

Whether any of his hearers could attain to such an ideal they doubted, but there was not one there who doubted that in the stranger who had come among them they had seen just such a life.

BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

WHEN our older people were children, there was no juvenile literature. If the book appetite arose, they were fed on a slice of Wilberforce's Practical View of Christianity, or little tidbits from Edwards on the affections, or were given a few nuts to crack from Chalmers's Astronomical Discourses. Their fathers and mothers sighed lest these little ones should turn out badly, because they liked ginger-snaps better than Westminster Assemblies, and would spend their money for marbles when it ought to have gone toward furnishing red flannel shirts for the poor heathen children in Kamtchatka. You lost all faith in John Bunyan's veracity, and whistled incredulously when you came to that story about Apollyon. Pictures were scarce, and a book was considered profusely adorned that had at the beginning a sketch of the author in gown and bands, and long hair of powdered whiteness, and at the close in ornate letters the word Finis, which you were told meant The End, although, after wearily reading it through, you did not know whether it was the end of the book or the end of you. You might as well feed your baby on lobster-salad as at that early age to have been expected to digest the books that were set before you.

But now the children's library is filled with books of large type, and tasteful vignettes, and lids ridged, and flowered, and scrolled, and columned, and starred with all the fascinations of the book-bindery. There is now danger that what is called the "milk for babes" shall become nothing but chalk and water. Many of the Sabbath-schools are doing much to foster a taste for trashy literature. In some of these libraries you find sentimental love-yarns; biographies of generals who were very brave, and good examples in some respects—when they were sober; fairy stories, in which fairies had very loose morals; accounts of boys and girls who never lived—books in which there is no more religion than in Don Quixote or Gulliver's Travels. We have been wondering why some religious society did not publish a nice little edition of Baron Munchausen, with a moral at the end, showing our dear little people the danger of tying your horse to the top of a church-steeple. On Sunday night your child does not want to go to bed. He cries when compelled to go, and looks under the bed for some of the religious hobgoblins that come out of the Sunday-school library. Religious spooks are just as bad as any other spooks. A child is just as afraid of Floras, Pomonas, sylphs, oreads, and fairies, as of ghosts. The poor little darling in the blue sack goes home with a book, thinking she has heaven under her arm, and, before she gets through reading the story of love and adventure, feels so strange that she thinks she must be getting lots of religion.

In the choice of our children's books, let us not mistake slops for simplicity, nor insult our children's tastes by disquisitions about "footsy-tootsies," or keep informing them of the historical fact, which they learned a great while ago, that "Mary had a little lamb," or assemble the youngsters in coroner's jury to clear up the mystery as to "who killed cock-robin." If a child has no common sense at seven years of age, it never will have.

A DROUGHT NEEDED.

ONE of the present wants of the Church is a few less religious speakers. We have not half enough of men and women who have something useful to say. But speaking bores have become an affliction in some of our eastern Churches. They are devouring every green thing. They are a grasshopper devastation. Many of them prefer Sabbath Schools for regular beverage, and the way they hop about whenever there is a chance to annoy the little ones is amazing. They are dying for a chance to make a speech. Others of these rhetorical nuisances prefer a diet of prayer-meetings. While you are trying to hold the meetings tightly in your grasp, they crawl in with something that they think must be said. All the time they are speaking we are studying the most Christian way of choking them off. They go to and fro, like him who sends them on their mission, seeking whom they may devour. Some time ago the cry was for more religious talkers. Now, at the East, we are praying for a drought of them. A few weeks of abstinence would improve our appetite. For a little while, instead of insisting so much on the example of Demosthenes and Cicero, let us bethink ourselves of Washington Irving, whom we never saw but once, and that while he was breaking down in the only speech he ever made.

WIT HARNESSSED.

I TAKE down from my library the biographies of ministers and writers of past ages, inspired and uninspired, who have done the most to bring souls to Jesus Christ, and I find that without a single exception they consecrated their wit and their humor to Christ. Elijah used it when he advised the Baalites, as they could not make their god respond; telling them to call louder as their god might be sound asleep or gone a-hunting. Job used it when he said to his self-conceited comforters, "wisdom will die with you." Christ used it when he ironically complimented the hypocritical Pharisees, saying: "The whole need not a physician," and when by one word he described the cunning of Herod, saying: "Go ye, and tell that fox."

Matthew Henry's Commentaries, from the first page to the last, coruscated with humor as summer clouds with heat lightning. John Bunyan's writings are as full of humor as they are of saving truth, and there is not an aged man who has ever read Pilgrim's Progress who does not remember that while reading it he smiled as often as he wept. Chrysostom, George Herbert, Robert South, John Wesley, George Whitefield, Jeremy Taylor, Rowland Hill, Nettleton, Charles G. Finney, and all the men of the past who greatly advanced the kingdom of God consecrated their wit and their humor to the cause of Christ.

BRIEF NOTES.

The railroad from Jaffa to Jerusalem is making progress. The first section, which reaches from Jaffa to Ramleh,—about ten miles—is finished.

The Canada Presbyterian Assembly assembled at Kingston, elected as Moderator the Rev. D. Wardrope, of Guelph, the Convener of the Foreign Mission Committee.

The Rev. W. Haslam, the eminent preacher, has returned from India. He there visited fourteen of the Church Missionary stations and held many missionary services.

Dr. Herman Adler has been formally elected Chief Rabbi of the Jews of Great Britain. He is the son of the late Chief Rabbi who was elected in 1845, and died last year.

Extensive preparations are being made for the Decennial International Convention of the Christian Endeavor Societies to be held in Minneapolis and St. Paul, Minn., July 9-12.

Postmaster-General John Wanamaker has denied on the witness-stand that he was guilty of collusion with the officers of the Keystone Bank in the frauds of that institution.

Dr. W. S. Rainsford, rector of St. George's Church of New York, announces that the doors of the church will be open all day and every day. Persons desiring a few minutes of retirement for meditation or prayer, may enter.

The census just taken in Great Britain shows a decrease of half a million in the population of Ireland since 1881. There are now about 3,500,000 Roman Catholics, and 1,400,000 Protestants in the country. Since 1881 the population of London has grown from 3,815,704 to 4,211,056.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond has been conducting services in the Congregational Church, Hanover, Conn. The Pastor, Rev. H. Higgins, writes that "the hearts of Christian people were deeply moved and that many sinners were brought to conviction of sin, and a good number professed conversion."

The American Institute of Christian Philosophy of which Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., is President, will hold its fifteenth Summer School at Avon-by-the-Sea, N. J., August 4-13. Among the speakers will be Dr. Francis L. Patton, President of Princeton University; Prof. Edward J. Hamilton, D.D., of Hamilton College, N. Y., and Dr. W. W. McLane of New Haven, Conn.

Mr. D. L. Moody's College Students' Summer School at Northfield, Mass., will commence June 27, and continue until July 9. Among the eminent professors who have promised to assist, are: W. Moore of Union Theological Seminary, Virginia; W. G. Moorehead of Xenia, O.; Dr. W. R. Harper of Yale and R. E. Speer of Princeton. The athletic exercises will be in charge of Mr. A. A. Staggs of Springfield, Mass.

The Ninth General Conference for Bible Study and Equipment for Christian work at Northfield, Mass., will be held July 30th—August 9. Among the speakers will be Rev. A. J. Gordon, D.D., of Boston; Rev. F. B. Meyer of London; Rev. Arthur T. Pierson and Russell Crowell of Philadelphia; Dr. L. W. Munhall, Major D. W. Whittle, and R. A. Torrey. The musical Exercises will be conducted by Mr. Ira D. Sankey and Mr. George C. Stebbins.

Mr. James H. Cannon, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD evangelist, closed his two-weeks' special services at Asbury M. E. Church, New York, on June 19. During the time seventy-five persons have been led to seek Christ. Some idea of the cosmopolitan character of the population surrounding Dr. Stone's church may be gained from the fact that the seekers one night included four Italians, three Irishmen, one Frenchman and one German, beside Americans. Mr. Cannon is assisting this week in the missions in New York.

A proposal is made to have an exhibit at the approaching World's Fair in Chicago, of methods of evangelistic, philanthropic and reformatory work. It is proposed to do this by means of charts, photographs, etc. It is suggested that a large building should be erected for the purpose, which should also contain a room suitable for great religious conventions, which might be made very profitable at a time when there will be a large influx of visitors from foreign lands. A meeting to consider this proposal will be held to-morrow, June 25, at three o'clock in the Manager's room of the Bible House. The call for it is signed by Dr. Josiah Strong, General Secretary of the Evangelical Alliance in the United States, and other eminent men representing the various religious societies.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Swiss Railroad Horror—Is Hayti's President Insane?—Canada's New Premier—America and the Russian Hebrews—An Indian Prince and an Authoress Wed—A Brave Female Explorer—General Notes.

RAILROAD Horror, Involving the death of nearly two hundred persons, is reported from Basel, Switzerland. A heavily loaded excursion train on the Moenchstein Railroad, fell through a bridge, and plunged into the river below. Two engines and the first car were completely submerged and all the passengers in the car perished, together with the engineers and trainmen. The excursionists, who, only a few hours before, had been in the full enjoyment of a musical fete, were mixed up in inextricable confusion among the debris in the stream, while two more cars filled with passengers hung suspended from the broken bridge, threatening every moment to share the same fate. The passengers in these escaped with difficulty. Six bodies were recovered from the wreck, being less than one half the number of those who perished. Troops assisted in the work of rescue. It is impossible to adequately describe the harrowing scenes that took place, while the search for the dead and dying was conducted by the light of blazing fir trees. Nearly all the lost belonged to the town of Basel.

In China, Justice is Rarely Tempered with mercy. The law is inexorable. Fifteen criminals, were recently beheaded at Kowloon, near Hongkong. Three of them were among the freebooters who looted a steamer five months ago, killing the captain and mate and stealing $30,000 in coin and goods. Beginning with Lai Atsat, the pirate chief, all were decapitated by the crown executioner, a herculean fellow wielding a keen two-edged sword, much in the fashion of a butcher slaughtering a bullock in the shambles. It is now announced that the Emperor has decided that all who were involved in the recent attacks on the Christian Missions at Wusuch, must die. As this sweeping sentence involves several mandarins, it has created great excitement in the Empire.

After a Brief but Exciting Struggle over the succession to the Canadian Premiership, made vacant by the recent death of Sir John Macdonald, Senator J. C. Abbott, formerly Mayor of Montreal, and the Conservative leader in the Upper House of the Dominion Parliament has been chosen. The French Canadian element supported Sir Hector Langevin, and would have compromised on Sir John Thompson (whose portrait appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last week), while the Protestant element rallied around Sir Charles Tupper. Senator Abbott, was finally taken up as a compromise. He is a native of Montreal, in the prime of life and of moderate political views. He has already held several important offices. It is quite possible that his ministry may only be a temporary one. A portrait of Premier Abbott is given above.

A Wave of Tropical Heat Passed Over the Eastern States on the 15th, 16th, and 17th, insts., being especially severe in New York, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Hampshire and Vermont, the mercury at many points in the two last mentioned states verging on one hundred degrees. In New York City there were many cases of sunstroke, a few being fatal, and scattering cases are reported elsewhere. In some rural districts vegetation was almost destroyed. The hottest place on the continent was Providence, R. I., where the thermometer stood at 107 in the shade. Such a record in June is unprecedented in the history of the Signal Service. The wave was followed by heavy electrical storms.

When it was Announced Several Months ago that Mrs. French Sheldon, a beautiful and accomplished American lady, was about to set out on a journey through Central Africa in a palanquin, intending to adopt a friendly and conciliatory policy toward the natives and to establish the fact that a Christian woman had nothing to fear even among savages, there was an expression of surprise at her daring. And now another American woman, no less courageous, has come to the front in the person of Mrs. Josephine Diebitseh Peary, wife of the Lieutenant, who sailed two weeks ago to explore North Greenland. Mrs. Peary accompanies her husband on a journey which cannot fail to be full of perils and discomforts; but she is strong and a capital traveller and considers Arctic journeying far less dangerous and exhausting than travel in the tropics. Her summer outfit consists of a heavy woolen double-breasted combination dress, with a duplicate over it in red blanketing, and over all a loose coat made of heavy blanketing and reaching to the knee. It has no opening except at the neck. The hood is sewed closely leaving only the face visible. Four pairs of socks of the heaviest wool and a pair of moccasins and one of snowshoes complete the suit. That for winter is made exclusively of furs. Mrs. Peary's portrait is given above.

The Nero of Hayti, President Hyppolite, was reported to have been assassinated by one of his subjects, who had sworn to avenge the wholesale slaughter, of which the Dictator was guilty, while suppressing the recent rising at Port-au-Prince and Jacmel. The rumor of his assassination was current at all the leading parts of the island, but was afterward officially denied, although Hyppolite's tyrannical rule had aroused the public feeling to such a pitch that this event was not unexpected. Some of his brutal butcheries, under the guise of necessary military measures, have already been described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in whose columns a portrait of the Dictator was recently published. On June 5th, he capped the climax of his bloody rule by putting a number of political prisoners mercilessly to death, some of them being taken into the public square at Jacmel and shot in the presence of their own families. Over two hundred men perished in this way within two weeks. Hyppolite tried to bully the foreign Consuls, into surrendering as prisoners certain fugitives who sought refuge with them, but he was compelled to apologize. He is said to be a maniac, alternately raving and weeping in his palace at Port-au-Prince.

Tariff-Maker William J. McKinley Has Been chosen by the Ohio Republicans as their standard-bearer in the approaching fight for the governorship. At the State Convention held in Columbus last week, he was unopposed for the nomination and his name was presented by ex-Governor Foraker, supported by Senator Sherman in a stirring speech. The platform is strongly protective and recognizes the McKinley Bill as the ablest expression of that principle.

A Notable Event of the Week was the Marriage of Dr. Charles Alexander Eastman, a full-blooded Chief of the Sioux Nation, to Miss Elaine Goodale, the well-known authoress, who has been for some time past doing missionary work among the Indians at the Pine Ridge Agency, Dakota. Dr. Eastman, whose tribal name is "Ohyesa" (the winner), is a splendid example of the possibilities of the Indian. His forefathers roamed the plains in war-paint and with blankets for a covering; while he is a man of refinement and education, an honor graduate of Dartmouth College, and the equal of the white, physically and intellectually. He has studied medicine and was recently appointed Government Medical Director at Pine Ridge Agency. There the pair will make their home and continue their mission work. Dr. Eastman's success furnishes a hint of what might reasonably be expected in the direction of Indian civilization and culture, if our government were to deal with its wards in a spirit of Christian helpfulness and to labor for their true elevation instead of permitting them to become the prey of selfish agents and speculators.

After Many Months of International Negotiation, an agreement has at last been reached between England and this country on the Behring Sea dispute. This consummation has been delayed somewhat by the illness of Secretary Blaine, and the final negotiations were in charge of Secretary of the Navy, Tracy. By the understanding reached, the killing of seals in excess of 7,500 during the season is prohibited, and these are to be taken on the islands, solely for the subsistence of the natives. Naval officers are empowered to seize poachers and hand them over to the authorities of their respective nations. Toward the close of the negotiations, Lord Salisbury sought to impose conditions which this government decided to be inadmissible, and therefore rejected. Four war vessels will be ordered by Secretary Tracy to proceed to the seal islands to enforce the agreement, and Britain will be similarly represented.

At the Thirteenth Annual Convention of the Jewish Ministers' Association, which was held in New York City on the 15th inst., a leading subject of discussion was the barbarous treatment of the Hebrews by Russia. Rabbi Gustav Gottheil of the Temple Emanuel, who was chairman of the Convention, laid before the members a letter from an English woman in Russia, in which the writer described the hardships which the Jews were suffering. Whole families were ordered out of Moscow on a few hours' notice. Some of the examples of cruelty were startling, and recalled the days of mediæval persecution. The reading was followed by earnest speeches, and a committee was appointed to address President Harrison and implore him, in the name of humanity, to protest against the Czar's treatment of his helpless subjects. This is the first united action taken by the Hebrew clergy in the matter. Rabbi Gottheil is the senior and the ablest of the Hebrew ministers in this country; a man of great erudition and wide influence. He is about sixty-six years of age and a native of Posen. Educated under the most eminent leaders of Reformed Judaism abroad, he occupied a pulpit at Manchester, England, before coming to this country. On the retirement of Rabbi Adler he was chosen as pastor of the Temple Emanuel, the leading synagogue.

UNDER SURVEILLANCE.

A NEW SERMON, PREACHED TO SAILORS BY PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON.

Job's Complaint—Weary of Being Watched and Corrected—I. Some Men Specially Tracked—Admonished by Their Conscience—Checked by Misfortunes—An Angry Man on a Steamboat—II. Apt to Dislike the Watching—Want Liberty to Sin—Would Like to Hear that God was Dead—III. Little Things Need Most Watching—IV. The Watching an Evidence of Love.
"Am I a sea, or a whale, that thou settest a watch over me?"—Job 7: 12.

JOB was in great pain when he thus bitterly complained. These moans came from him when his skin was broken and had become loathsome, and he sat upon a dunghill and scraped himself with a potsherd. We wonder at his patience, but we do not wonder at his impatience. He had fits of complaining, and failed in that very patience for which he was noted. Where God's saints are most glorious, there you will find their spots. The weaknesses of the saints lie near their strength. Job is the most patient of men, and cries, "I will not refrain my mouth; I will speak in the anguish of my spirit; I will complain in the bitterness of my soul." As part of his bitter complaint, he said, "Am I a sea, or a whale, that thou settest a watch over me?"

He seemed to be watched and whipped, and then watched again. It seemed to him that God concentrated all his strength upon him in afflicting him. He was spared no suffering, and he cries at last, "I am watched, and checked, as if I were a great sea needing always to be held in bounds, or a terrible sea-monster wanting always a hook in its jaws. Lord, why dost thou harass me thus? I am such a poor, insignificant thing, that it seems out of thy usual way to be so rough upon one so feeble. The raging ocean, or the mighty leviathan, may need such watching, but why dost thou spend it on me?" I shall not moor myself to Job's sense of the words; but I shall spread sail for a voyage further out to sea. This sort of talk may have been used by many a man who is now within hail of my voice—may have been used by sailors now before me.

I. I say that some men seem to be specially Tracked and Watched by God. We hear of persons being "shadowed" by the police, and certain people feel as if they were shadowed by God; they are mysteriously tracked by the great Spirit, and they know and feel it. Wherever they go, an eye is upon them, and they cannot hide from it. They are like prisoners under arrest—they can never go out of reach of the law. They cannot get away from God, do what they may. There are men who have been in this condition for years; and they know what I mean.

All men are really surrounded by God. He is not far from every one of us. Yet there are certain people to whom this is more clear than it is to others. Some are singularly aware of the presence of God. Certain of us never were without a sense of God. It has made us happy to see God in his works. "The fool hath said in his heart, No God;" but this folly we never cared for. We knew that God was good, even when we felt we had offended him. With others God's watch is seen in a different way. They feel that they are watched by God, because their conscience never ceases to rebuke them. The voice of conscience is not pitched to the same key in all men; neither is it equally loud in all people. Conscience can be made like a muzzled dog, and then it cannot bite the thief of sin. Conscience can grow like a man with a cold, who has lost his voice. But it is not so with all men, even after years of sin. Some have a naturally tender conscience, and while in sin they are not easy. "You were wrong," says conscience; and his voice is very solemn. Restrained by Providence.

Certain men are not only plagued by conscience and dogged by fear, but the providence of God seems to have gone out against them. Just when the man had resolved to have a bout of drinking, he fell sick of a fever, and had to go to the hospital. He was going to a dance; but he became so weak that he had not a leg to stand upon. He was forced to toss to and fro on the bed, to quite another tune from that which pleases the ball-room. He had yellow fever, and was long in pulling round. God watched him, and put the skid on him just as he meant to have a break-neck run downhill. The man gets better, and he says to himself, "I will have a good time now." But then he is out of berth, and perhaps he cannot get a ship for months, and he is brought down to poverty. "Dear me!" he says, "everything goes against me. I am a marked man;" and so he is. Other people seem to get on, though they are worse than he is. Time was when he used to be lucky too; but now he has parted company with success, and carries the black flag of distress. He is driven to and fro by contrary winds; he makes no headway; he is a miserable man, and would wish that the whole thing would go to the bottom, only he dreads a place which has no bottom, from which there is no escape, if—once you sink into it. The providence of God runs hard against him, and thus he sees himself to be a watched man.

A Ring of Prayers.

Yes, and God also watches over many in the way of admonition. Wherever they go, holy warnings follow them. They cannot escape from those who would be friends to their souls. They seem to be surrounded with a ring of prayers and sermons and holy talks. The boy said, "If I could get away from my mother I should be free! I have been tied long enough to her apron strings. I am old enough to do as I like. If I could get away from my father's chidings and prayings, I shall have a fine time of it." So the boy ran away, and went to sea; and when he got on board, a good old sailor tackled him, and talked to him about his soul; and then another pleaded with him. The boy said to himself, "Why, I have got out of the frying-pan into the fire. I came here to be out of the way of religion, and here it is!" I have known a sailor to go from port to port, and wherever he had landed there has been some gracious man or woman waiting to lead him to Christ. May it be often so! May it be as it was with our dear friends Fullerton and Smith on board the steamboat! Mr. Fullerton spoke to a rough man, and asked him if he was saved; and the man was angry, cross, vexed, and went to the other side of the vessel. There he complained to Mr. Smith, "That man over there asked me if I was saved; he is a fool!" "Very likely," said Smith; "but then, you see, he is a fool for Christ. I think it is better to be a fool for Jesus than to be wise for the devil." He began to plead with him, when the man cried out, "There is a regular gang of them; I cannot go anywhere but they are on to me." Some here present have had to dodge a great deal to keep out of the way of gospel shots. Their track has been followed by mercy, and they have been pursued by swift cruisers of grace. They have been like fish taken in a net—surrounded on all sides, and neither able to pass through the meshes, nor to break the net, nor to leap out of it. Oh, that the net of Christ's love may so entangle you all, that you may be his for ever!

II. Secondly, we notice that they are very Apt to Dislike this Watching. Job is not pleased with it. He asks, "Am I a sea, or a whale, that thou settest a watch over me?" These people, to whom God pays such attention, are foolish enough to murmur that they are so hedged in, and they are vexed to be made to feel that God has his eye upon them. Do you know what they would like? They want liberty to sin. They would like to be let loose, and to be allowed to do just as their wild wills would suggest to them. They would cast off every restraint and have their fling of what the world calls "pleasure." They would like to empty all the cups of the devil's sideboard, and be as merry as the worst of men when they are taking it free and easy. That is why they would send their conscience to sleep, drown their fears, and escape from chastening providences and warning admonitions. They would like to live where no Christian person would ever worry them again with wearisome exhortation. They demand liberty: liberty to put their hand into the fire! liberty to ruin themselves!

Men do not like this being surrounded by God—this wearing because they would drop God from their thoughts. If to-morrow we could hear, by telegram from heaven, that God was dead, what crowds would buy the newspaper! It would be the greatest relief in the world to many a godless wretch if he could feel sure that there was no God. To some of us this news would be death; we should have lost our Father, our Comforter, our Saviour, our all. Alas! many wish there were no God; and if they cannot persuade themselves that there is none—and it is very hard for a sailor to do that—yet they try to forget him. If God is out of mind, he is as good as out of the world to the careless sinner. When God comes with inward fears, and awakens conscience, and sends cross providences, so that the man feels pulled up and made to pause; then he knows that there is a God, for he feels a power which works against his sin, from which he cannot get away. He longs to be clear of this secret force; but it wraps him about on every side.

The Bit and Kicking-strap—

Once more, there are some who do not like to be shadowed in this way, because they want to have their will with others. Shall I speak a sharp word, like a two-edged sword? There are men—and seamen to be found among them—who are not satisfied with being ruined themselves, but

They Thirst to Ruin Others.

They lay traps for souls, and they are vexed that their victims should escape them. They are angry because certain poor women are not altogether in their power. Woe unto the men who lead women astray! I have heard of sailors who, in every port they enter, try to ruin others. I charge you to remember that you will have to face these ruined ones at the day of judgment. You sailed away, and they never knew where you went; but the Lord knew. I say there are men who would like to have full license to commit wantonness, and they are grieved that they are hindered in their carnival of sin. May God grant that the channel of evil may be blocked for you, and may you be piloted into the waters of repentance and faith!

This is why some kick against God. I fear these people will be much vexed with me for speaking so plainly; but you must not think that it will alarm me should you be angry. I am rather glad when fellows get angry with my preaching. These will come again. You with whom the sermon goes in at one ear and out at the other, you get no good whatever; but a man who fires with wrath, and says, "How dare that fellow speak thus to me?" is sure to listen again; and it is very likely that God will bless him. But whether it offends you or pleases you—I repeat my warning—I charge you, do not drag others down to hell with you. If you must go there yourselves, seek not to destroy those around you. Do not teach boys to drink, and to swear; neither tempt frail women to commit uncleanness with you. God help you to shake off all vice; for I know that vile habits are often the reason why men kick against the restraint of God's loving hand.

III. And now I have got to the very heart of my text. The third part is this—that this argument, against the Lord's dealings is a very bad one. Job says, "Am I a sea, or a whale, that thou settest a watch over me?" Listen. To argue from our insignificance is poor pleading; for the little things are just those against which there is most need to watch. In life, men fall by very little things. One does not need to watch against his dog one-half so much as against a horse-fly, or a mosquito, for those will sting you when you least expect it. The Little Things Want most Watching, therefore it is poor reasoning when we complain that God watches us as if we were a sea, or a whale. After all, there is not a man here who is not very like a sea, or a sea-monster in this respect, that he needs a watch to be set over him. A man's heart is as changeable and as deceitful as the sea. When you are down in the fore-castle with a little band of praying men, how very good you feel! Let us see you when you are on shore, and there is plenty of grog about. It is easy to have a calm sea when there is no wind, but how different is the ocean when a gale is blowing! We are all very well when far away from temptation, but how are we when the devil's servants are around us?

I shall now go further, and show that, by reason of our evil nature, we have become like the sea. This is true in several ways; for, first, the sea is restless, and so is our nature. "The wicked are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt." When they are thoughtful no good comes of their thoughts. Their waters cast up—what? Pearls and corals? No; "mire and dirt." I do not need to explain those words. If any of you have to keep company with these restless beings, you know how foul-mouthed they can be. They cast up worse things than mire and dirt when they are stirred up.

Furious as the Sea.

Let us say, next, that the sea can be furious and terrible, and so can ungodly men. When a man is in a fury, what a wild beast he can be! A landsman looks on the sea when it has put on its best behavior, and he says, "I should not mind going a voyage. I feel I shall make a splendid sailor." Let him look at that same ocean by-and-by. Where is the sea of glass now? Where are the gentle waves, which seemed afraid to ripple too far upon the sand? The sea roars and rages and raves. The Atlantic in a storm is terrible; but have you ever seen a tempest in a man's nature? It is an awful sight, and one which causes gracious eyes to weep. What a miserable object is a man with the drink in him! He was as decent a fellow as one could talk with; but now that the drink has mastered him the devil has come on board, and you will do well to give him a wide berth. When you feel the Lord's restraint, you need not ask, "Am I a sea, or a whale?" for your own heart may answer, "You can be more furious than the sea itself."

Human nature is like the sea for mischief. How destructive is the ocean, and how unfeeling! It makes widows and orphans by the thousand, and then smiles as if it had done nothing! Terrible when its power is let loose! Do not talk of the destructiveness of the sea; let the reckless sinner think of the destructiveness of his own life. You that are living in sin, and in vice, what wrecks you have caused! How many who set out on the voyage of life, have gone upon the rocks through you! A foul word, a loose song, a filthy act, and a gay craft has become a wreck. Conscience can fill in the details. Ah me! one cannot say to God, "Am I a sea, or a sea-monster?" or he might well reply, "No shark has devoured so many as the drunkard in his cups, the swearer in his presumption, and the unclean in his lust!" Ah me! I could weep to think how much of mischief any one of you who are unconverted may yet do! The Lord deliver you from being left derelict, to cause wreck to others!

Havoc it can Work

IV. Last of all, I would remark that all they complained of was sent in love. They said, "Am I a sea or a whale, that thou settest a watch over me?" but if they had known the truth they would have blessed God with all their hearts for having watched over them as he has done. For God's restraint has #### Kept us From Self-ruin.

If the Lord had not held us in we might have been in prison; we might have been in the grave! Who knows what would have become of us? An old Scotchman said to Mr. Rowland Hill, what I am quite sure would have been as true of me. He looked into Mr. Hill's face so keenly and so often, that at last good Rowland asked him, "Why are you looking at my face so much?" "I was thinking," said the Scotchman, "that if you had not been converted by the grace of God, you would have been a terrible sinner." And, surely, this would have been my case. Nothing half-and-half would have contented me. I should have gone to the end of my tether. Is not the same true of some of you?

God will not always deal roughly with you. Perhaps to-night he will say his last sharp word. Jesus is here at this hour. He that died on Calvary looks down on us: believe on him. He lifts his pierced hands, and cries, "Look unto me, and be ye saved." Accept the Saviour; and though you be as a sea, or as a whale, you shall no longer complain of the Lord's watching you but you shall rejoice in perfect liberty. He is free who loves to serve his God. He makes it his delight that he is watched of the Lord. Lord bless sailors! May we all meet in the Fair Havens! Amen.

LIEUT. C. A. L. TOTTEN

Professor of Military Tactics in Yale University and Author of Works on Prophecy.

STUDENTS of prophecy will not be disposed to join in the ridicule with which the press has assailed Lieut. C. A. L. Totten, of Yale University, since he boldly declared that we are now living in the last decade of this dispensation. They will rather remark the significance of the fact that Lieut. Totten should have arrived at a conclusion nearly identical with their own from a different set of data by a different line of reasoning. They will also pray that the world, which has turned a deaf ear to their warnings may listen to a man holding so conspicuous a position as Lieut. Totten and may prepare for the day which is surely approaching. The majority of Christian men may be disposed to think lightly of Lieut. Totten's complicated mathematical calculations and will prefer to rely on the explicit declarations contained in the prophecies of Daniel and Revelation, but even they will be interested in noticing that those calculations lead him to the belief that the end of this dispensation and the beginning of the Millennium cannot be later than the end of March, 1899.

We hope in an early number to publish a brief epitome of Lieut. Totten's theory, and in the meantime our readers will be glad to have his portrait which we give in this column. Lieut. Totten is just turned forty years of age. He is now Professor of Military Tactics in Yale University. He has written several books on the technical details of his profession which are accepted text-books. He has also patented several inventions connected with gunnery.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

The Housewife's Cares.*

RESTLESSLY Elise turned from the window and seated herself at her writing desk, upon which lay an unfinished letter and an open Bible. She had been reading and writing. She sighed profoundly as she read. Her mind was evidently too disturbed to enable her to concentrate her thoughts upon the words of Holy Writ. Her conscience reproached her that she had neglected her early morning devotions, before the cares and distractions of the day laid claim to her attention. Faithfully had the girl Elise promised her mother that she would never permit any ordinary hindrance to interfere with this duty. Her neglect accordingly made her heart heavy. Vainly she strove to excuse herself. A mother's and a housewife's cares are so many and so varied, she argued; they also are duties that cannot be neglected; in many cases, they are of paramount importance and their observance is as truly God's service as the reading of his word. But her excuses did not quiet the reproaches of her awakened conscience. Her day had begun without the blessing which puts all the confusion of the day in order. She had forgotten that "when to-morrow's burden is added to the burden of to-day, the weight is more than one can bear."

A Dream in the Night.

Charlotte raised herself and excitedly said: "Otto, I had a dream in the night. I know it was only a dream, but yet it torments me. I stood upon a high rock and round and about and beneath me was a dark and unfathomable sea of gray fog. I heard a voice saying: 'Leap down; this is Eternity.' I awoke with a start; a great horror fell upon me. During that short dream, I experienced the sensations of a lifetime. It is impossible to describe the terror that overwhelmed me. My years seemed to have been passed in a purposeless dream. My future was without comfort and beyond hope of change. 'Leap down' said the voice. I saw Eternity before me. 'Your doom is irrevocably fixed; what was visionary is now a reality; the step from life to death is before you.'"

"You should be glad it was only a dream," said her husband, soothingly.

"But, Otto," she cried, vehemently, "that moment will, must come, and I will be as frightened and wretched as I am now."

He had thrown his arm protectingly around her, but sat with downcast eyes. He knew not what to say. What comfort would it be to speak to his young wife of a good conscience, of uprightness, of morality! No, that heaven of his had been long shattered. In the presence of the fearful mystery of death, the last prop had given way. As the truth became apparent to him, the false supports upon which he had hitherto leaned slipped from beneath him. Was he not guilty of her mental agony? Had he not led her into this miserable condition? These thoughts weighed heavily upon his heart and disturbed his faith in his former opinions.

"Otto," she cried, breaking the silence and gazing appealingly into his face, "can you not comfort me?"

"I comfort you?" he repeated. "I cannot comfort you. You must turn, 'he added in a low voice,' to the Source from which you formerly obtained help and comfort. Your love cannot comfort me, nor can my love help you; we cannot lean upon the earthly."

After her husband left the room she hastened to her chamber and poured out her penitence with bitter self-reproach. The world and its pleasures had estranged her from her God; she had gradually neglected prayer, and she found that society was but a poor comforter when the body was sick and the soul out of tune, and now that she had turned away from the world with a feeling akin to disgust, she found that the Lord was as far off from her as ever.

The Golden-Bride.

In the cool sweet air of the early morning, amid the peace and beauty of this lovely May-day, Herr von Budmar and his good wife were seen crossing the mead and strolling beneath the shadowy elms by the clear brookside, as they had done fifty long years ago, their goal the same as then, the old trysting-place the green fir height.

"My dear Fritz," said the golden-bride, "surely goodness and mercy have followed us all the days of our life. From this height we look down upon our beloved home with its many guests; even so will our freed spirits soon look down from the bright world above upon our children and our children's children."

The Frau Oberforsterin was the tiring-woman for the golden-bride. The bride-groom stood musingly by the window, absorbed in pleasing recollections, when the door softly opened and the object of his thoughts entered. She was arrayed in her bridal dress of fifty years ago, with the single exception of a rich white silk kerchief, adorned with beautiful old point, which was crossed upon her bosom. Upon her head rested a small white coiffe, encircled by the golden wreath. Herr Budmar gazed at his dear bride, the good-wife, the faithful mother—upon the same smooth brow, the same large, child-like eyes, the same bright countenance as of old. Tears rushed to his eyes as he took her in his arms and clasped her to his heart.

"I thank thee, my wife, for the goodness, the faithfulness and love which thou has bestowed upon me all these gathered years," he said in a voice tremulous with emotion. "I cannot repay thee, but the Lord will reward thee for it."

She could not speak. She only looked lovingly into his face through a mist of tears.

As they stood by the window, they saw Elizabeth and her husband coming through the garden who, seeing the grandparents, quickened their steps and hastened to greet the pair.

The May evening was spent in strolling through the pleasant garden, so full of peace and fragrance and when the twilight deepened, the guests all gathered in the old living-room sacred with memories of the past. The golden-bridegroom and his gracious bride again took the places of honor upon the old carved sofa, and children and children's children gathered lovingly about them.

MECCA AND ITS PILGRIMS.

(See Illustration.)

ATTENTION has been directed anew to Mecca and its pilgrimages by the startling statement made by officials in India and now to be investigated, that one-third of all the pilgrims who leave Bombay and Calcutta for the shrine of the Prophet never return. They either die of the discomforts and vile accommodations on the voyage, are carried off by cholera or kindred diseases at Jeddah, or fall victims to violence, which seems to be almost unrestrained among Mohammedans returning from the shrine.

When it is considered that no less than 200,000 persons annually arrive at Jeddah, the port of the Moslem "Sacred City," on the Red Sea, this statement possesses an appalling significance. The voyage is made in old-fashioned filthy sailing craft of all kinds, though some of the pilgrims who can afford it take steamer. On entering the Red Sea, the thermometer usually stands at 100 or over, in the shade. Many succumb to the frightful temperature.

No Christian is allowed to enter Mecca, and those who have done so have accomplished it at great personal risk. It is a well-built city, 70 miles from Jeddah, with a population of about 50,000. The "Caaba," or shrine of Mahomet stands in the centre of the great square and around it the pilgrims walk seven times nightly, praying as they go. The pilgrims is usually closed with the ascent of Mount Arafat, to the east of Mecca. The road from Jeddah to the "Sacred City" is always dotted with pilgrims, who usually spend about two weeks on the journey to and fro.

A NOBLE LIFE ENDED.

The Rev. J. Gilmour, the Famous Missionary in Mongolia, is Dead.

(See Portrait.)

NEWS has just been received by cable of the death of the Rev. J. Gilmour, who for more than twenty years has labored for Christ among the Mongols. The bare announcement of the sad event is all that the cable brings, so that nothing is as yet known here of the cause or circumstances of his death. His friends, however, learned from his latest letters that he had been suffering from bronchitis and it is conjectured that a relapse took place which terminated fatally.

Mr. Gilmour was born in Glasgow, Scotland, in 1843. He was educated at Glasgow High School, from which he proceeded to the University of that city. After graduating there with the degree of Master of Arts he went to Edinburgh University, but he did not complete his course there as he felt himself called to foreign mission work. Classical learning, he realized, would be of little service to him in that sphere of labor and he was eager to get to his work. He devoted some time to the study of medicine and surgery and in 1870 he sailed for China. His final destination was Mongolia, a large and densely populated country, lying between Siberia on the north and China on the south. Little was known of the existing condition of its people, though they were the ancient stock from which sprang the Chinese, the Japanese, the Tartars and other races.

His journey from China was overland and was performed in true Oriental fashion. Setting out from Kalgan in China, he travelled 84 miles in a caravan of camels through Mongolia to Kiachta, on the Russian frontier. Returning thence he lived with a lama or a priest in a Mongol tent, until he had acquired the language. The accommodation and the fare were horrible but he accepted both until he was able to preach in the Mongolian tongue. Then he set out on his missionary journeys, attired in native costume and living the life of a Mongol wanderer. Since that time, with a brief interval of rest at home in 1883, he has labored in this uninviting field. The Lord has blessed his work and has now called him from labor to reward.

A JAPANESE PRINCE'S FUNERAL.

ON the next page we give an illustration of the scene at the "Burning Temple," Toki Japan, on the recent occasion of the funeral of Prince Sanjo, whose obsequies were attended by Japanese officials of the highest rank. The rites were those of the Shinto sect, of whose faith Prince Sanjo was a devoted adherent. Shinto or Sinto-worship is the oldest form of religion in Japan and is recognized by the State. Prince Sanjo's remains were robed in the richest costumes pertaining to his office and almost covered with enormous bouquets of artificial flowers. The funeral procession from his residence was escorted by guard composed of the principal police officials, a troop of horsemen, the marine band, two battalions of infantry of the Imperial Guard, all headed by a corps of trumpeters playing the funeral march. A company of Shinto priests, with the emblems of their faith, formed a part of this imposing procession and carried a banner on which was inscribed the name by which the dead prince was officially known in the highest classes of the State, Zo-sho-ichi-i, a title that had been conferred by the emperor. The decorations of the prince were also borne in the procession, and included medals and crosses of Orders of the highest rank in Japan, Belgium, Italy and Russia. The emperor by a special message, conveyed his wishes for an orison for the deceased, and wrote in the highest terms of admiration, declaring himself inconsolable by reason of the prince's death. He added that during his life the prince had done much to increase the prosperity of the empire and to transform the old political methods into new and better channels. Modest, faithful, great as a statesman, he had furnished a rare example for the nation. He was one of the later generation of Japanese statesmen, who succeeded in greatly moderating the persecution directed against the Christians. Although himself a devotee of the national religion of the "Empire of the Rising Sun," he was a foe to intolerance and the policy of foreign exclusion. Shintuism is the ancient creed of the country—Buddhism being modern by comparison. The Sinto worshipper has a host of deities to whom he offers prayers and sacrifices, the great central deity being "Ten-sio Daisin," The Sun Goddess.

Prince Sanjo, besides possessing high qualities as a public official, was distinguished as a poet and artist, and many of his paintings have become famous in Japan. The illustration shows the interior of the "Burning Temple" with the officiating priests in the foreground, performing the rites and reading the orisons, peculiar to the Japanese funeral service.

THE CAPTAIN'S BARGAIN.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

BY JULIA McNAIR WRIGHT.

The Schoolmaster.

THE Superintendent never resumed the confidence he had begun to the schoolmaster, as they sat near the mill. As it was the first, so it was the last unveiling of his inner life. It had been one of those sudden expansions of which even the most reticent of natures now and again feel the need—and of which they always repent. The Superintendent shut himself up in greater reserve than ever.

But the schoolmaster did not forget. He had been very greatly surprised, and he often recurred to what the Superintendent had spoken, Mr. Murray bore none of the physical or mental marks of a man that ever indulged in intoxicants. In what way had the fiery breath of the demon swept over him, and blasted all his life?

But while making no more revelations of himself, Mr. Murray did not relax his interest in Robert. The child fascinated him. Instead of going to his lonely cottage by a bridle-path which few ever traversed, he now went and came by the road which passed the mill. He always stopped and spoke to Robert, and often took the boy up before him, and let him have a ride, even going several times up and down the same quarter of a mile, that the child's ride might be longer. This was fine. But Robert's joy was modified by the fact that while he rode away in state, like a Prince in a fairy tale, Pink and Bop and the twins were left on common ground, and often roaring lustily. That was more than he could stand.

"I likes the ride," he said, finally, looking Mr. Murray squarely in the face, as was his wont in speaking. "But, I guess, I'd better stay on the ground with them."

"Why cannot you have your ride in peace, if they are crying?" said the Superintendent.

Robert lifted his steadfast gaze to the speaker's face. "Because, I loves 'em," he said simply.

Such love as this Mr. Murray thought would be well worth the winning. The possession of a child like Robert would add a joy to life, and make it a pleasant thing to live. To gain Robert's love he redoubled his attentions.

The men who were driving a wagon for the Superintendent, left one day at the mill a splendid rocking-horse, with red and gilt caparisons and flowing tail. Christmas brought a blue cap with a gilt cord, a pair of mittens with fur tops, and a fur collar. The congregation at the school-house said it was "clean extravagance the way 'Zekiel Allen dressed out that boy." But, in fact, Captain Ezekiel would have been better pleased if the gifts had not come. In his secret heart he hoped that by spring Mr. Murray would have lost his interest in the long-unseen Robert.

But spring brought back Mr. Murray—and with him a soldier's outfit—a drum, sash, sword, trumpet, and toy gun for Robert. There was not an item for any of the others, but that did not matter, for Pink pounded the drum, and Bop blew the trumpet, and Robert made flags for each of the twins to carry, and the joyful procession marched up and down before the mill, deploying, wheeling, right flank! left flank! forward, march! charge! in grand style. They were very happy with the new toys, but Captain 'Zekiel felt a jealous suspicion of them. It was not that his own children got none—oh, no; but that the presents were evidently meant to bribe the love of Robert.

"The Superintendent is rich," he said one evening when Robert rushed in, triumphant, waving a "Jack the Giant-Killer" with glaring pictures. "He can give you more than I can."

"But he isn't you, father!" said Robert, discerning with prescient love the secret pain, and slipping in between the Captain's knees and leaning back on his breast, "he's only another man."

"Aye, but he wants to make you love him more than you do us," said the jealous Captain. "If he had you up to his house he could give you a pocket full of trinkets every day."

"But he couldn't give me Pink," said Robert, "and he didn't make my trundle-bed; you did."

"I see," said Mrs. 'Liza, sewing with tenfold energy. "The Superintendent wants to take Robert from us."

"But he couldn't!" cried Robert. "You wouldn't let him, mother! You won't let him have me or Pink or Bop, or any of us!"

For the time had not only passed when Robert feared that he would be sent away, but he had now no realizing sense that he belonged to the household any less than Pink and the others. And it had faded out of his mind that Captain 'Zekiel had found him, a forlorn, weeping stray, abandoned by a tramp, on the roadside. He realized, however, that the Captain and Eliza were jealous of the attentions and caresses of Mr. Murray, and that made him more shy with the Superintendent. He did not now always run out with a shout of welcome when he heard the hoofs of the tall roan. He could not be less than gracious and attractive, for that was his nature, but Mr. Murray saw that he made no progress with the child.

The Superintendent had a disposition that demanded all or nothing. If Robert had learned to love him more than anyone else, had been willing to go away and live with him and never return to his home at the mill, that would have pleased Mr. Murray. He would not have considered that such an abandonment of his family argued a less steadfast and faithful nature than it would be good to see. He wondered at his own craving fondness for Robert. He said to himself, and once or twice at the mill to Captain Allen, "That boy ought to be mine;" "If I had that boy I'd do well by him;" "If I had a son he would be like that." When, the next summer, he used to meet Robert and Pink trudging to the red school house, Robert carrying the little lunch-basket and the books of both, never thinking of asking Pink to carry anything, Mr. Murray would indulge in a dream about—if the boy were his what he would do for him, what an education he would give him, what heights he might gain. He could not resist the temptation of stopping now and then at the school-house to hear Robert read, which he did with notably less sing-song than the other children, or to see him "spell down" his class in words of four or five letters, or even to hear him "speak a piece" on Wednesday afternoons. The Superintendent seemed to take so much interest in the boy and to be as proud of him as if he were his son.

"That is a very bright child," he said to the schoolmaster; "quite worth teaching. He is worth all the rest of the lot put together."

And Mr. Murray glanced with indifference at the other pupils. He was not one of those who regard with respect and interest the young heir of immortality wherever found. The schoolmaster rather resented this undervaluing of his other neophytes.

"They are all nice children," he said, "honest, kindly, industrious. Some of those who seem most slow have very good minds, and are of those that will be heard of. Out of just such red school-houses, off just such blue benches as mine, have come some of our noblest, wisest, most useful, most famous men."

"Oh, yes, I know," said Mr. Murray, "but this boy is a jewel. I wonder how he comes to be so different from the rest of Allen's children. Allen is a huge, roughly-built, sandy-haired man; his wife a small, dark, black-eyed, wiry woman. Little Pink is a pretty child, quite the best you could expect from her parents. Bop and the twins are downright homely little youngsters. But look at Robert. See how well he is made; see how he carries his head, and see those curls. I respect Mrs. Allen for not being such a vandal as to cut them off. See what lovely eyes: I have seen such eyes—long ago. What refined features! Schoolmaster, you study such things. What blood has cropped out here? Why is the boy so different from his family?"

"The explanation just here is plain and easy," said the schoolmaster. "The boy is not like the family, because he does not belong to the family. A poor woman—a drunken woman, I believe—died down here in Lacy, and left the child to her family, who were too poor to take care of him, and so Captain Allen, who found him crying as they were taking him to the poorhouse, took pity on him, and adopted him, and he is bound to him until he is twenty-one."

The schoolmaster was a man of veracity, and supposed he was telling the exact truth. But it was now three years since the incidents occurred which he endeavored to narrate, and they had nearly passed from his mind, and were also mingled with the various gossiping versions of the neighborhood. It was thus he garbled Robert's simple story.

"An adoption!" cried Mr. Murray. "Such a child as that in want of a home, going a-begging for a family! Why wasn't I the one to pass by as he was going to the poorhouse? I might have had him! I could have done more for him than Allen. Why was it not my luck to get him? That is just my fortune; money, only money—not the child—and I might have had him, if I had been the one to pass by."

The schoolmaster felt pretty sure that if Mr. Murray had been the one to hear Robert's infant wails, he would very likely have not been the one to heed. He might not have noticed at all, or he might have said, why did not some of the women do for him? or he would have thought it was the county's duty to see to him. Now that the child was grown strong and handsome, and well-ordered, he wanted him.

"But your question of heredity is not solved," said the schoolmaster. "It is much less strange, that a frank, generous, kindly little man like that, should be the son of Captain Allen and Eliza, than that he should be the child of some degraded, drunken beggar. The truth about Robert's heredity is even more puzzling than you supposed it to be."

"It passes comprehension," said the Superintendent; "and, if he is the child of a drunken mother, it is only more instantly necessary that you remember my words to you, schoolmaster, and teach him temperance." What a cruel shame, if owing to some inherited thirst, that beautiful boy should fall under the curse of the age. Are you teaching him temperance?

"Yes; I am teaching them all temperance," said the schoolmaster. And so he was, in his own fashion.

Mr. Murray happened to look in at the school-house window, one afternoon, just as one of these lessons was being given, and he remained, an auditor, until it was finished.

The schoolmaster, with the savings of two laborious years, had treated himself to a fine large microscope. This instrument, in its mahogany case, occupied a place of honor on a side table. It was a world of wonder, a more than Aladdin's lamp to the children, who looked with joy to the occasions when the schoolmaster revealed to their wondering gaze its enchantments. Whenever the schoolmaster took a little key from his vest-pocket, and approached the sacred altar, where reposed the marvel, the children stowed their books under the blue desks, and fairly held their breath with expectation. Any one of them might have the honor of being summoned as officiating acolyte of the occasion.

On this afternoon the schoolmaster had a bowl of water and some green weeds from the nearest pond. He put some of the green plant in a large, clear glass. As it floated, the children coming near to look, one by one, saw that the plant seemed supplied with minute green sacs filled with air.

"Now take your seats," said the master. "This is called a bladder-plant, from these wee green bladders whereby it floats. Listen, and Nathan will tell you what he sees. Nathan, come forward."

Nathan came gladly. "Now, tell us what you see in the water, Nathan."

"I see little live things; some have little shells on them like muscles, only they look about as big as tiny pin-heads. Some have little whirling wheels on their heads. A good many are like very, very wee caterpillars."

"Those last are the water-bears," said the schoolmaster. "Now look at the bladder-plant."

"The bladders," said Nathan, "are little bags. Their mouths are open. They are set round with hairs. Some of the bags look full of something, and dark. Some of them seem to have some live thing kicking in them. Some are empty, and as you look in at the door it is like a little clear green room. O! I see a water-bear swimming up to one! He looks in. He seems to think it is pretty. I guess he wants to know what is inside. Now he swims to one of the bags where there is something kicking. He looks in there. Now he goes to an empty one. Now he swims by. No; he changes his mind. He thinks he will go in. He pokes in his head. The little hairs at the door bend inward, they let him go in easy. He is in! Oh, now he is trying to come out!"

Great excitement in the listening school, eyes wide open, heads bent forward.

"Can he get out?" cried some one.

"No! no! he can't," exclaimed Nathan, all eager. "The hairs bend in and let him in, but he cannot get by them to go out! They won't bend out. Oh, he can't get out."

The schoolmaster now took one of the dark full sacs, cut it open with a very fine sharp instrument, and put it under the glass.

"Now what, Nathan?"

"Oh, that bag is full of dead things, of what you might call the bones of these bits of creatures, the shells off one of those tiny things like muscles. They are things that have gone in, and have got all melted up."

"Here is another," said the schoolmaster, putting a lighter green sac in place, also cut open. "What now?"

"That is the very sac the water-bear looked into to see some kicking. The kicking thing was another water-bear. Now it is dead. The one that went in just now is kicking too."

The schoolmaster took that sac, also, opened it, and released the struggling water-bear.

"What now, Nathan?"

"He is out, but he doesn't feel good. He doesn't swim round as he did before he went in. I think he is going to die, schoolmaster. Oh, here is another bear just going into a sac. Let him out quick, won't you?"

The schoolmaster opened the sac, and the freed little animal swam off.

"He got out, right off, and nothing but him," said Nathan. "Schoolmaster, isn't it queer that when they look in and see the dead ones, and the bones and skins, or see other ones caught and kicking, and can't get out, that they don't learn better than to go in themselves? I should think they'd have sense to keep out!"

"People do not have sense to keep out, when the circumstances are just about the same. Now, all of children, listen. You know what I have told you of these little, palace-rooms where the doors are in, and not out, and the things that swim by seem curious to know what is inside. Some of these gay ones hold struggling captives; others are full of the relics of the past.

CAPTAIN'S BARGAIN.

Now, that is a little parable to let the little green sacs stand in places where strong drink is sold. Those who enter such places form a drinking habit, and then they cannot get free of it. Persons, yet free, go into these dens for drinking. They see in them people all ragged, poor, unhappy, bloated, crazy, wrecked and ruined victims of habit. They see yet others, who learn that they are enslaved, who have a sense of shame and danger, and struggle to get rid of the appetite that makes prisoners of them, and destroy them. In this little plant, the little animals get into the plant, the plant melts up their bodies, seems to suck up their juice and on it, until nothing is left but fine bony parts. So the unhappy person who goes into a grog-shop is that the dealer feeds on him until health and happiness and money and respectability are all gone, and nothing is left of him but a poor body that is ready for the dealer's field. Is it not strange that we see how many persons are ruined by drink, any of us will turn into places where drink is sold, and will even ourselves begin to take the fatal liquor?"

It was not only in the school-room that the master gave his moral lessons. He was much with his pupils of doors. Many a ramble they took with him, and many an hour he spent, sitting on a fence and talking to them, as they worked in gardens. He could find on every garden some theme for pertinent and fitting remark.

Mr. Britt's two grandsons were drinking her vegetable-beds one Saturday, and Pink and Robert stood looking on. The schoolmaster was sitting on the gate-post. "Robert," he said, "bring me that branch which hangs near your shoulder."

Robert carefully broke off the little branch in question. "Do you see these curled-up leaves?" said the schoolmaster, pointing to some leaves rolled together. "They hung like little long purses. The boys looked at these little leaf-sacs."

"Do you see," said the master, "there is a tiny caterpillar in each leaf-sac. He has made this nest for himself, by spinning lines of silk across the leaf, from edge to edge. By tightening the lines he has bent the leaf, until the edges come together.

Thus he has a neat little silk-lined house. Look at the way in which he has made a cover or roof; would you think so humble a creature had such ingenuity? He has bitten a line nearly across, below the tip of the leaf, and so it has bent downward, and he is shielded from dew, sun, and rain. But, now look at this." The master held out two or three purses, where the carefully made green roof had been eaten up, and only the dry mid-vein left. "These caterpillars, after so much care in constructing a home with a roof, are given, oddly enough, to eating their roofs. They lie in their nests and gnaw off the roof. Then they are exposed to heat and wet. Their home is spoiled. Now, Robert, look at this other branch."

"Oh! that is queerer still!" cried Robert. "Here are purse houses that have been all gnawed away, and the poor little caterpillars have only a few dry threads to cover them. They lie on the stems, as if they felt very badly. Their homes are more worn out than our mill," added Robert, with a sigh.

"Now, this is another kind of caterpillar, and it not only eats its roof, but it eats all its house. It constructs it carefully, of a silk-lined leaf—and then destroys it. It is now turned out to the weather, and by this time it is getting perhaps old and weary in its caterpillar life, and almost ready to go into its next, or pupa state, and it is too late to build another snug home."

"What a fool it is!" said Tom Britt. "The idea of taking pains to build a nice house, and then turning yourself out of it—by eating it up!"

"Did you never see men act just so?" said the master. "Many an one have I known, who has built up a pleasant home and has then drunk the roof from over his head—or drunk up his whole home. Many a homeless drunkard is homeless because he has drunk up furniture, house, and fields. I have known men to swallow big houses and little gardens and farms—indeed the entire product of years of industry. Now, boys, whenever you see caterpillars, remember what I have told you, and that he who begins to drink is very likely to go on, until he commits the folly of drinking up all that he has. The Scripture says, 'The drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty.'"

On another day he showed them the gay little sundews, which with red rays and sweet honey-drops, attract small insects, and so entangle them in a sticky fluid, and pierce their bodies, and hold them fast, and suck up all their juices to feed the plant.

Such were some of the lessons of the schoolmaster.

THE BLOOD THAT SPEAKETH.

HEBREWS XII: 24.

The sprinkled blood is speaking
Before the Father's throne,
The Spirit's power is seeking
To make its virtues known.
The sprinkled blood is telling Jehovah's love to man,
While heavenly harps are swelling
Sweet notes to mercy's plan.

The sprinkled blood is speaking
Forgiveness full and free,
Its wondrous power is breaking
Each bond of guilt for me.
The sprinkled blood's revealing
A Father's smiling face,
While Jesus' love is sealing
Each monument of grace.

The sprinkled blood is pleading
Its virtue as my own,
And there my soul is reading
Her title to Thy throne.
The sprinkled blood is owning
The weak one's feeblest plea;
'Mid sighs, and tears, and groaning,
It pleads, O Lord, with Thee.

The sprinkled blood is shedding
Its fragrance all around,
It gilds the path we're treading,
It makes our joys abound.
The sprinkled blood is forming
Those mansions bright and fair,
Where saints in heaven adoring,
Shall serve our Jesus there.

Oh wondrous power that seeketh
From sin to set me free!
Ah, precious blood that speaketh!
Should I not value thee?
O bleeding One, I love thee,
I love Thy atoning stream;
Lord, make its power constrain me,—
Let Christ be all thy theme!

Home, Sweet Home.

John Howard Payne, the writer of that beautiful, pathetic ballad, could scarcely have even dreamed what a monument he was erecting to his memory when composing those few simple verses, so full of pathos that the most hardened can neither read nor hear them without confessing, to self at least, that a tender chord is touched. "There is no place like home, be it ever so humble." Doubly true is this if it possesses the essential virtue of Cleanliness (akin to Godliness) which renders the plainest abode attractive, and without which the palace loses its chief charm.

No mother or wife can, alone and unaided, make the home clean and cheerful. Sweet Home Soap will do more than any other thing to assist our mothers and wives in giving home a clean and cheerful appearance. It removes dirt easily and quickly, because it is made of the best materials put together in the right proportions. No expense is spared in its manufacture; every detail is closely watched by the members of the firm, who fully understand their business. If these were not the facts, J. D. Larkin & Co., could not continue to come before the public, year after year, nor could they make such offers as they do. The very fact that their trade is increasing rapidly every year is sufficient evidence of the great merit of Sweet Home Soap and the many other useful articles given with every box ordered.

AN EASTERN FABLE.

One day the master of Lukman, said to him, "Go into such a field and sow barley." Lukman sowed oats instead. At the time of harvest his master went to the place, and seeing the green oats springing up, asked him, "Did I not tell you to sow barley here? Why then, have you sown oats?" He answered, "I sowed oats in the hope that barley would grow up." His master said, "What foolish idea is this? Have you ever heard of the like?" Lukman instantly replied, "You yourself are constantly sowing in the field of the world the seeds of evil, and yet expect to reap in the resurrection day the fruits of virtue! Therefore, I thought also, I might get barley by sowing oats." The master was abashed at the reply, and set Lukman free.

THROWN TO THE LIONS.

The Rev. Thomas Cook relates: "One of the Emperors of Rome wanted to repair the Colosseum. He asked for plans, and plans were sent in and accepted, and the day came for the opening. Two thrones were erected, one for the Emperor, and one for the architect, whom the Emperor 'delighted to honor.' At a signal from the Emperor the Christians were brought into the arena; at another signal the wild beasts were let loose upon them, and soon they did their fearful work. The architect, it seems, had been brought up under Christian influence when young. As he gazed upon the scene he said, 'What if I am against these men of God, and am on the other side?' and the architect pointed to these individuals, and said, rising from his seat, 'I stand up to tell you I am on their side; I am a Christian too.' The Emperor was thunderstruck, and he said savagely, 'Throw him to the lions.' They threw him in, but the reward he got was a martyr's crown. It will cost you something, perhaps, to take a stand for God and as a supporter of Christianity, but it is worth it in time, and it is worth it in eternity. Let every man here now say, in view of the possibilities of life, and the great harvest day, which is not far off, 'Whatever it will cost and involve, I will be a Christian too.'"

HOW HINDOO CHRISTIANS GIVE.

"Our Christians give until they feel it," says a writer in the Record of Christian Work. "The senior catechist at Madanapalle, who has been supported for twenty-three years by the Sabbath School of the church in Kinderhook, who receives only $100 salary, always gives in benevolence one-tenth, and often one-eighth of his income, as I well knew. He has a family of eight children. One of the higher paid native pastors in our mission, who receives nearly $150 per year salary, makes one-tenth his minimum, and often gives one-eighth or one-seventh of his income to the Lord. Scores of our native Christians loyally make one-tenth of their minimum in giving, and those who have no money give in substance. In many of our Christian families in the villages who have no money to give, the mother, with the consent of all the family, takes out a handful of the allotted grain as she prepares the daily meal, and when Sunday comes makes the family offering to the Lord in kind."

PRAYER IN THE BATTLEFIELD.

During the Civil War a strong young soldier was ordered on ambulance duty. He had to carry the wounded from the field of battle. At Chancellorsville, the ground was strewn with all sorts of things which the men flung away so as to not cumber them in the fight. While the soldier was helping to carry away the wounded, he picked up a little book from the trampled road. He put it in his pocket, as he had no time to see what it was. Soon after he came to a wounded man, and was about to carry him off the field to the hospital, but the surgeon said it was useless, as the man was dying. Presently the dying soldier turned his eyes on the healthy man, and as he did so he gasped, "Pray for me; I am dying—pray for me!" The soldier in attendance was a brave young fellow, and very anxious to help his dying comrade; but he could only with shame stammer out, "I cannot—I don't pray for myself!" "But," pleaded the other in a low moan, "you must pray for me; I am dying." The young soldier was in deep distress. For the first time he wanted to pray. What could he do? In his trouble he thought of the book he had picked up. What was it? He drew it from his pocket. It was a copy of 'The Soldier's Prayer Book,' printed in Philadelphia. In his despair the young man opened it, and found, to his joy, on the first torn and muddy page a prayer for a dying soldier. The strong, healthy fellow uncovered his head, and with solemn feelings reverently read the prayer for his dying comrade, who soon after peacefully breathed his last.

The young soldier was speedily called to attend on other wounded comrades, but he never forgot that death-scene—he felt so ashamed that, though his duty was to tend the sick and wounded, he could be of no use to a dying soldier. He learnt the great value of prayer, and became convinced that a man who cannot pray is powerless in the battle of life. He was afterwards then taken captive, and carried to a prison in Richmond. Away from the excitement of the battlefield the Spirit of God visited him. He saw that his past life had been full of sin; he had lived without prayer. He was filled with distress, and in the solitude of the prison he raised his heart and voice to God. He found the value and the power of prayer. He became a changed man, and could pray with his fellow-soldiers, and lead them to Jesus. The news was speedily sent home to his praying wife, and great was her joy to find that her husband had become a praying Christian. But though rejoicing in the light of the Gospel, he never forgot the day when he was obliged to say with shame to a dying comrade, "I cannot pray!"

THE UNIVERSITY OF PARIS.

What is usually called "The University of Paris," but what is really only an aggregation of several different faculties, is without doubt the largest educational institution in the world. Last year it had a scholastic population of 10,173, which is however, a decrease of about 200 compared with the preceding year. Of this number, 1,086 were foreigners, representing thirty-five different countries. Russia sent the largest contingent, namely, 292. Next in order comes North America with 167; but as Mexico is separately reported this must refer chiefly to the United States. There were 14 Roumanians, 93 Turks, and 63 Englishmen. The other lands represented fall below sixty, six having but a single representative. The great majority of foreigners—759—was the school of medicine. The entire number of female students was 14. Of this number 123 were in the medical department; 92 were Russian, 17 French, 7 English and but 1 American. In the department of science there were 19 ladies, nine of them Russians and six French. One of the latter received the doctor's degree with the highest possible honors. The faculty of Protestant theology reports 29 regular students.

VISITING MANDARINS.

Miss F. M. Williams, a missionary in China, writes on a visit to Ts'ang hi (near Pao-ning): "Directly we arrived here some men from the men (magistrate's) came to ask for our passports, and find out how long we intended staying. We went into the city at the West Gate, and so met the two men who had taken our passports; they said they would show us the way to the mandarin's yamen. We said we did not wish to go there but they pressed us. When we arrived at the place they asked us in, so we said if the mandarin's wife would see us we would go in. After a few minutes we were invited in the lady's guest-room; she was very gracious to us, quite friendly and nice. The mandarin was in an inner room, and from there kept asking questions, either through his wife through Ts'aita-fo, our woman. The mandarin wanted, of course, to know why we had come? Were we going to do trade? Had we brought anything to sell? Who had sent us? Were we going to rent a house? How long were we going to stay? Had our Queen sent us to China? The wife was quite young, about thirty, and pretty. On November 1 a boy came to ask us to go to the military yamen. The mandarin's wife wished to hear from our book—it was not at the same place where we were in the other day; that was civil mandarin. The mandarin wife and daughter were so nice and friendly; the wife had seen me at Pao-ning, so treated me quite like an old friend. They listened quietly the Gospel, and seemed intelligent. We stayed a long while."

THREE PLACES OF BLESSING.

Rev. C. H. Spurgeon says: "At a prayer-meeting a brother exclaimed, 'O Lord, I bless thee that I have enjoyed thy presence on the water, in the water, and under the water.' The friend thought this a singular remark and so he followed the good man and sought an explanation. 'What said the brother, 'I was once a sailor and I found the Lord with me on water in many a voyage; I was wrecked, and he was my Friend in the water; and after that I became a diver, and blessed be his name, the Lord Jesus has been precious to me with fathoms down.' Where can a believer be cast and find it impossible to be in fellowship with his Lord?"

The Beneficent Work of the Flower Mission Among the New York Poor.

ONE of the most gracious of all the charities of the great metropolis is the Flower and Fruit Mission, which brings every summer to the poor and sick, the offerings of kind friends in city and country. A few years ago, a number of Christian ladies who visited the sick in the tenement districts on the east and west sides of town, decided to extend their calls to the hospitals. They began to take flowers to the patients, and observed with pleasure the keen satisfaction and delight with which they were received. Other ladies soon united with them and the field of operations was widened to include the hospitals, homes and insane asylums in the city and suburbs, as well as the institutions on the East River islands. To flowers were added fruits, jellies, condensed milk and other delicacies suited to the sick.

These ladies, many of them wealthy leaders of society, found

A Higher Pleasure

in their good work than they had anticipated. Soon kind friends in the neighboring country towns were anxious to be included in the beneficent movement; they gathered and packed the flowers for shipment to the city and found to their gratification that the express companies would charge nothing for transportation. The headquarters for the Mission were at first established at 239 Fourth Avenue, but were afterwards moved to 104 East 20th Street, where, during the hot days of summer, these good ladies and their friends deny themselves the pleasures of the country and voluntarily stay in town to attend to their sick charges. The headquarters are given by All Souls' Church free and the Mission managers so arrange matters that the running expenses are very small indeed. It is a beautiful scene to witness them busily

Sorting the Flowers

and with deft fingers tying them in bunches and preparing them for distribution in the crowded hospital wards. Great crates of fruit, baskets of flowers—roses, lilies, hyacinths, dahlias, pinks and pansies—rosy apples and tempting cherries; luscious grapes, dark and light in color, and boxes of canned fruits, sauces and dainties are all piled up in the rooms of the Society, whence they are delivered to the visitors. Each visitor has her own district and is accompanied by a servant or porter bearing the articles she is to distribute.

In this voluntary service, the Society enlists as aids, missionary nurses, Bible readers, city missionaries and a number of responsible district visitors, who know the needs of the section to which they are assigned. Each bunch of flowers or basket of cherries goes where it is most welcome and nothing is wasted.

The special value of the work of this Society is in its care for

who cannot avail themselves of the fresh-air country holiday, but must remain in town during our tropical midsummer, when tenement life becomes unbearable. It is during this period, when every one who can get away, flees the city, that most of our city charities suspend operations absolutely or partially; but sickness and death are then most rife, especially among the children. The fresh eggs, butter, fruit and condensed milk that are sent out with the flowers are then more prized than ever. How much the flowers themselves are appreciated wherever they go, the reports of the Flower Mission show.

Societies, churches, Sunday Schools, Kings' Daughters, Temperance Unions, Christian Endeavor societies, all contribute to the store of good things that are distributed through the Mission, which has its "open days" on Monday and Thursday. On the latter day, the most flowers are received, on the former, the most substantial articles. Work for the present summer has begun in good earnest and the tenement children are the happy recipients of an abundance of flowers and fruit. The beneficiaries range from up to wrinkled old men and women, some of them verging on a hundred years.

The interest with which the Flower Mission is regarded by generous dwellers in the country is shown in the cordial letters of encouragement received by the Secretary of the Mission, Miss Russell. One lady writes:

"I have just finished arranging some flowers to go to you in the morning and I do not consider the pleasant work done until I shall have told you how much good your work is doing us. In a place like this (a country town) it is extremely hard to awaken in children a missionary spirit. Your Mission has given my Sunday School class just the energy and impetus that I had failed to inspire hitherto. My own boy, every morning brings me his hands full of morning glories 'for the poor little children in the hospital.'"

If the generous donors could hear the expressions of real gratitude with which their gifts are received, they would be well compensated.

Along the East and West sides, where the tenements are like ovens at this season of the year, the children will follow the "flower ladies" for blocks,

Begging for a Blossom;

the boys will dash frantically after them, offering to carry the basket for a spray of greens; the old women's wrinkled faces will ripple over with smiles, as their fingers close over blooms that recall long-forgotten perfumes. There are thousands of these city children to whom trees, grass and flowers are almost total strangers. The flowers and the delicacies bring a little brightness into their clouded lives.

But it is to the hospitals that the flowers bring their sweetest sunshine. The pale faces of the patients brighten, when the "flower lady" arrives, and it is admitted by the physicians that these buds and blossoms have not only done much to alleviate pain, but have actually prolonged the lives of many of the sick, who were despondent and friendless.

Many of the scenes witnessed by these visitors on their daily rounds are such as would

Melt a Heart of Stone.

Children starving and mothers almost insane through want and suffering; households where a daily supply of even the poorest food is a stranger; helpless cripples, the blind, the paralytic; people living like animals and sleeping on straw; orphans huddling together like lambs without a shepherd, kept alive by kindly neighbors, who have enough of their own to care for. In all such ministrations the Mission is heartily seconded by the King's Daughters and the Lend-a-Hand Clubs, as well as by the W. C. T. U. Societies and others which have formed themselves into branch Flower Missions. Even the young ladies of Vassar College have taken a lively interest in this philanthropy, and find time now every year, in the midst of their busy student life, to dress two hundred pretty dolls and send them to

of fresh flowers are opened and the beauties of garden and field are disclosed just as they have lain since being packed by the senders. They are usually sprinkled over with damp grass or surrounded by layers of moss, each layer covered by wet cloth or sheets of dampened newspapers. As a rule, they arrive in very good condition. Some of the bouquets made up by the Mission ladies are equal in beauty and fragrance to any that can be gathered from the costly conservatories of the rich.

Christmas is a season of great activity at the Flower and Fruit Mission. Although the blossoms are gone, there are many good things sent to the Mission that bring joy to the homes of the poor; there are toys, clothes and food for the sick, and delicacies which the convalescent alone can appreciate. Where there are many little ones in an institution, the Mission takes the place of dear old Santa Claus, and dispenses such gifts as add to the pleasures of the season and delight childish hearts. Dolls, games, marbles, pictures, balls and scrap-books are sent to the tenement houses also, so that the poor children may not be forgotten. But, of course the Christmas cheer dispensed by the Mission, as a whole, is of a much more substantial character. Fully 40,000 of the sick, the poor and gladden the hearts of the little waifs at Christmas time.

Over two hundred towns and villages now send their quota of gifts to the Flower and Fruit Mission. These donors are scattered over half a dozen states and their number is increasing every year. They have learned the blessedness of giving and find a pure enjoyment in doing what they can to alleviate the distress of the poor of the great city. Our illustration shows the scene at

The Rooms of the Mission

on the morning of the arrival of the flowers and fruits from the country. For hours East Twentieth Street, in front of the Mission, is crowded with drays and express wagons, loaded with crates and boxes. The flowers on being unpacked are immediately given over to a number of ladies and are sorted into bouquets of various sizes, and fruit is also assorted and, with the other, is prepared for distribution. The borrowed baskets the insane are made at least temporarily happy by these nosegays every season. The sweetest of all the posies are sent to the blind asylums, where their fragrance is a source of the keenest enjoyment to those afflicted ones who, though they may never hope to see the treasures of the garden and admire their varied and delicate hues, are yet quick to recognize in the grateful aroma of the flowers the goodness of God who cares for all his creatures, and who has stamped in every bud and leaf the revelation of his love.

LOST SHEEP.

Rev. Dr. Talmage's text for last Sunday was: "All we like sheep have gone astray: . . . and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all."—Isa. 53:6.

WITHIN ninety years at the longest all who hear or read this sermon will be in eternity. During the next fifty years you will nearly all be gone. The next ten years will cut a wide swath among the people. The year 1891 will to some be the finality. Such considerations make this occasion absorbing and momentous. The first half of my text is an indictment: "All we like sheep have gone astray." Some one says: "Can you not drop the first word? that is too general; that sweeps too great a circle." Some man rises in the audience and he looks over on the opposite side of the house, and he says: "There is a blasphemer, and I understand how he has gone astray. And there, in another part of the house, is a defrauder, and he has gone astray. And there is an impure person, and he has gone astray." Sit down, my brother, and look at home. My text takes us all in. It starts behind the pulpit, sweeps the circuit of the room, and comes back to the point where it started, when it says: "All we like sheep have gone astray."

I was, like many of you, brought up in the country, and I know some of the habits of sheep, and how they get astray, and what my text means when it says: "All we like sheep have gone astray." Sheep get astray in two ways: either by trying to get into other pasture, or from being scared by the dogs. In the former way some of us got astray. We thought the religion of Jesus Christ short commons. We thought there was better pasturage somewhere else. We thought if we could only lie down on the banks of distant streams, or under great oaks on the other side of some hill, we might be better fed. We wanted other pasturage than that which God through Jesus Christ gave our soul, and we wandered on, and we wandered on, and we were lost. We wanted bread and we found garbage. The further we wandered, instead of finding rich pasturage, we found blasted heath and sharper rocks and more stinging nettles. No pasture. How was it in the worldly groups when you lost your child? Did they come around and console you very much? Did not the plain Christian man who came into your house and sat up with your darling child give you more comfort than all worldly associations? Did all the convivial songs you ever heard comfort you in that day of bereavement so much as the song they sang to you, perhaps the very song that was sung by your little child the last Sabbath afternoon of her life?

There is a happy land, far, far away,
Where saints immortal reign, bright,
Bright as day.

Did your business associates in that day of darkness and trouble give you any especial condolence? Business exasperated you, business wore you out, business left you limp as a rag, business made you mad. You got dollars, but you got no peace. God have mercy on a man who has nothing but business to afford him. The world afforded you no luxuriant pasturage. A famous English actor stood on the stage impersonating, and thunders of applause came down from the galleries, and many thought it was the proudest moment of all his life; but there was a man asleep just in front of him, and the fact that that man was indifferent and somnolent spoiled all the occasion for him, and he cried "Wake up, wake up!" So one little annoyance in life has been more pervading to your mind than all the brilliant congratulations and successes. Poor pasturage for your soul you found in this world. The world has cheated you, the world has belied you, the world has misinterpreted you, the world has persecuted you. It never comforted you. O! this world is a good rack from which a horse may pick his hay; it is a good trough from which the swine may crunch their mess; but it gives but little food to a soul blood-bought and immortal. What is a soul? It is a hope high as the throne of God. What is a man? You say: "It is only a man." It is only a man gone overboard in sin. It is only a man gone overboard in business life. What is a man? The battle-ground of three worlds, with his hands taking hold of destinies of light or darkness. A man! No line can measure him. No limit can bound him. The archangel before the throne cannot outlive him. The stars shall die, but he will watch their extinguishment. The world will burn, but he will gaze on the conflagration. Endless ages will march on, he will watch the procession. A man! The masterpiece of God Almighty. Yet you say,

"MY CHILDREN COME OUT."

"It is only a man." Can a nature like that be fed on husks of the wilderness?

Substantial comfort will not grow
On nature's barren soil;
All we can boast till Christ we know
Is vanity and toil.

Some of you get astray by looking for better pasturage; others by being scared of the dogs. The hound gets over into the pasture field. The poor things fly in every direction. In a few moments they are torn of the hedges, and they are plashed of the ditch, and the lost sheep never gets home unless the farmer goes after it. There is nothing so thoroughly lost as a lost sheep. It may have been in 1857, during the financial panic or during the financial stress in the fall of 1873, when you got astray. You almost became an atheist. You said: "There is God, that honest men go down and thieves prosper?" You were dogged of creditors, you were dogged of the banks, you were dogged of worldly disaster, and some of you went into misanthropy, and some of you took to strong drink, and others of you fled out of Christian association, and you got astray. O! man, that was the last time when you ought to have forsaken God. Standing amid the foundering of your earthly fortunes, how could you get along without a God to comfort you, and a God to deliver you, and a God to help you, and a God to save you? You tell me you have been through enough business trouble almost to kill you. I know it. I cannot understand how the boat could live one hour in that chopped sea. But I do not know by what process you got astray; some in one way, and some in another, and if you could really see the position some of you occupy before God this morning, your soul would burst into an agony of tears and you would pelt the heavens with the cry: "God have mercy!" Sinai's batteries have been unlimbered above your soul, and at times you have heard it thunder: "The wages of sin is death." "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God." "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." "The soul that sinneth, it shall die."

When Sebastopol was being bombarded, two Russian frigates burned all night in the harbor throwing a glare upon the trembling fortress; and some of you are standing in the night of your soul's trouble. The cannonade and the conflagration, the multiplication of your sorrows and troubles I think must make the wings of God's hovering angels shiver to the tip.

But the last part of my text opens a door wide enough to let us all out and to let all heaven in. Sound it on the organ with all the stops out. Thrum it on the harps with all the strings atune. With all the melody possible let the heavens sound it to the earth and let the earth tell it to the heavens. "The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." I am glad that the prophet did not stop to explain whom he meant by "him." Him of the manger, him of the bloody sweat, him of the resurrection throne, him of the crucifixion agony. "On him the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all."

"O!" says some man, "that is not generous, that is not fair; let every man carry his own burden and pay his own debts." That sounds reasonable. If I have an obligation and I have the means to meet it, and I come to you and ask you to settle that obligation, you rightly say, "Pay your own debts." If you and I, walking down the street both hale, hearty, and well, I ask you to carry me, you say and say rightly: "Walk on your own feet!" But suppose you and I were in a regiment and I was wounded in the battle and I fell unconscious at your feet with gunshot fractures and dislocations, what would you do? You would call to your comrades saying, "Come and help, this man is helpless; bring the ambulance; let us take him to the hospital," and I would be a dead lift in your arms, and you would lift me from the ground where I had fallen and put me in the ambulance and take me to the hospital and have all kindness shown me. Would there be anything mean in your doing that? Would there be anything demeaning in my accepting that kindness? Oh, no. You would be mean not to do it. That is what Christ does. If we could pay our debts then it would be better to go up and pay them, saying, "Here, Lord, here is my obligation; here are the means with which I mean to settle that obligation; now give me a receipt; cross it all out." The debt is paid. But the fact is we have fallen in the battle, we have gone down under the hot fire of our transgressions, we have been wounded by the sabres of sin, we are helpless, we are undone. Christ comes. The loud clang heard in the sky on that Christmas night was only the bell, the resounding bell of the ambulance. Clear the way for the Son of God! He comes down to bind up the wounds, and to scatter the darkness, and to save the lost. Clear the way for the Son of God! Christ comes down to us, and we are a dead lift. He does not lift us with the tips of his fingers. He does not lift us with one arm. He comes down upon his knee and then with a dead lift he raises us to honor and glory and immortality. "The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." Why then, will no man carry his sins? You cannot carry successfully the smallest sin you ever committed. You might as well put the Apennines on one shoulder and the Alps on the other—how much less can you carry all the sins of your lifetime? Christ comes and looks down in your face and says, "I have come through all the lacerations of these days, and through all the tempests of these nights; I have come to bear your burdens and to pardon your sins and to pay your debts. Put them on my shoulder; put them on my heart." "On him the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all."

Sin has almost pestered the life out of some of you. At times it has made you cross and unreasonable, and it has spoiled the brightness of your days and the peace of your nights. There are men who have been riddled of sin. The world gives them no solace. Gossamer and volatile the world, while eternity, as they look forward to it, is black as midnight. They writhe under the stings of a conscience which proposes to give no rest here and no rest hereafter; and yet they do not repent, they do not pray, they do not weep. They do not realize that just the position they occupy is the position occupied by scores, hundreds and thousands of men who never found any hope.

If this meeting should be thrown open, and the people who are here could give their testimony, what thrilling experiences we should hear on all sides! There is a man in the gallery who would say: "I had brilliant surroundings, I had the best education that one of the best collegiate institutions of this country could give, and I observed all the moralities of life, and I was self-righteous, and I thought I was all right before God as I am all right before men; but the Holy Spirit came to me one day and said: 'You are a sinner;' the Holy Spirit persuaded me of the fact. While I had escaped the sins against the law of the land, I had really committed the worst sin a man ever commits—the driving back of the Son of God from my heart's affections. And I saw that my hands were red with the blood of the Son of God, and I began to pray, and peace came to my heart, and I know by experience that what you say this morning is true. 'On him the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all.'"

Yonder is a man who would say: "I was the worst drunkard in New York; I went from bad to worse; I destroyed myself; I destroyed my home; my children cowered when I entered the house; when they put up their lips to be kissed I struck them; when my wife protested against the maltreatment. I kicked her into the street. I know all the bruises and all the terrors of a drunkard's woe. I went on further and further from God, until one day I got a letter, saying:

"My dear husband: I have tried every way, done everything, and prayed earnestly and fervently for your reformation, but it seems of no avail. Since our little Henry died, with the exception of those few happy weeks when you remained sober, my life has been one of sorrow. Many of the nights I have sat by the window, with my face bathed in tears, watching for your coming. I am broken-hearted; I am sick. Mother and father have been here frequently and begged me to come home, but my love for you, and my hope for brighter days, have always made me refuse them. That hope seems now beyond realization, and I have returned to them. It is hard, and I battled long before doing it. May God bless and preserve you, and take from you that accursed appetite, and hasten the day when we shall be again living happily together. This will be my daily prayer, knowing that he has said: 'Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' From your loving wife,"

MARY.

"And so I wandered on and wandered on," says that man, "until one night I passed a Methodist meeting-house, and I said to myself, 'I'll go in and see what they are doing,' and I got to the door, and they were singing:

All may come, whoever will,

This Man receives poor sinners still.

"And I dropped right there where I was and I said, 'God have mercy,' and he had mercy on me. My home is restored, my wife sings all day long during work, my children come out a long way to greet me home, and my household is a little heaven. I will tell you what did all this for me. It was the truth that this day you proclaim: 'On him the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all.'"

Yonder is a woman who would say: "I wandered off from my father's house; I heard the storm that pelts on a lost soul: my feet were blistered on the hot rocks. I went on and on, thinking that no one cared for my soul, when one night Jesus met me and he said, 'Poor thing, go home! your father is waiting for you, your mother is waiting for you. Go home, poor thing!' and, sir, I was too weak to pray, and I was too weak to repent, but I just cried out, I sobbed out my sins and my sorrows on the shoulders of him of whom it is said: 'The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all.'"

There is a young man who would say: "I had a Christian bringing up; I came from the country to city life; I started well; I had a good position, a good commercial position, but one night at the theatre I met some young men who did me no good. They dragged me all through the sewers of iniquity, and I lost my morals and I lost my position, and I was shabby and wretched. I was going down the street, thinking that no one cared for me, when a young man tapped me on the shoulder and said: 'George, come with me and I will do you good.' I looked at him to see whether he was joking or not. I saw he was in earnest, and I said: 'What do you mean, sir?' 'Well,' he replied, 'I mean if you will come to the meeting to-night, I will be very glad to introduce you. I will meet you at the door. Will you come?' Said I, 'I will.' I went to the place where I was tarrying. I fixed myself up as well as I could. I buttoned my coat over a ragged vest and went to the door of the church, and the young man met me, and we went in: and as I went in I heard an old man praying, and he looked so much like my father, I sobbed right out and they were all around so kind and sympathetic that I just there gave my heart to God, and I know this morning that what you say is true; I believe it in my own experience. 'On him the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all.'"

Some one comes here this morning, and I stand aside. He comes up these steps. He comes to this place. I must stand aside. Taking that place he spreads abroad his hands, and they were nailed. You see his feet, they were bruised. He pulls aside the robe and shows you his wounded heart. I say, "Art thou weary?" "Yes," he says, "weary with the world's woe." I say, "Whence comest thou?" He says, "I come from Calvary." I say, "Who comes with thee?" He says, "No one; I have trodden the winepress alone!" I say, "Why comest thou here?" "O!" he says, "I came here to carry all the sins and sorrows of the people." And he kneels and he says: "Put on my shoulders all the sorrows and all the sins." And conscious of my own sins, first, I take them and put them on the shoulders of the Son of God. I say: "Canst thou bear any more, O Christ?" He says, "Yea, more." And I gather up the sins of all those who serve at these altars, the officers of the Church of Jesus Christ—I gather up all their sins and put them on Christ's shoulders, and I say: "Canst thou bear any more?" He says, "Yea, more." Then I gather up all the sins of a hundred people in this house and I put them on the shoulders of Christ, and I say: "Canst thou bear more?" He says, "Yea, more." And I gather up all the sins of this assembly and I put them on the shoulders of the Son of God and I say, "Canst thou bear them?" "Yea," he says, "more!"

But he is departing. Clear the way for him, the Son of God! Open the door and let him pass out. He is carrying our sins and bearing them away. We shall never see them again. He throws them down into the abyss, and you hear the long reverberating echo of their fall. "On him the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all." Will you let him take away your sins to-day?

To-day the Saviour calls. All may come. God never pushes a man off. God never destroys anybody. The man jumps off. It is suicide—soul suicide—if the man perishes, for the invitation is, "Whosoever will, let him come." Whosoever, whosoever, whosoever! In this day of merciful visitation, while many are coming into the kingdom of God, join the procession heavenward.

Seated among us during a service was a man who came in and said: "I don't know that there is any God." That was on Friday night. I said, "We will kneel down and find out whether there is any God." And in the second seat from the pulpit we knelt. He said: "I have found him. There is a God, a pardoning God. I feel him here." He knelt in the darkness of sin. He arose two minutes afterward in the liberty of the Gospel; while another sitting under the gallery on Friday night said: "My opportunity is gone; last week I might have been saved, not now; the door is shut." And another from the very midst of the meeting, during the week, rushed out of the front door of the Tabernacle, saying: "I am a lost man." "Behold! the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world." "Now is the accepted time. Now is the day of salvation." "It is appointed unto all men once to die, and after that—the judgment!"

SIGNS OF HARVEST.

BY REV. H. M. WILDER.

OD'S scheme is a vast and comprehensive one, involving: 1. The preservation of all the chosen people, by means of whom the design was to be carried out. 2. The preparation of the chosen people, in all essential ways, for their part in the fulfilment of the design. 3. The preparation of the world at large—politically, intellectually, and materially, for the use and possession of the chosen people, when they, and those joined to them, shall be ready for the Kingdom.

Now, inasmuch as the Hebrews showed themselves in every way unfit for their high national position and destiny 2500 years ago, the Lord God has since then been putting them through and training that shall make them fit and qualified, when the Kingdom and Holy Nation shall be finally and permanently established. This discipline and training are of a compound character; but chiefly and essentially spiritual, according to the principle and power of faith. It has also been political, social, commercial and intellectual. For most of the time, and to most of the people, it has been bitterly painful in every one of these departments—through many tribulations we must enter the Kingdom—and to the experience of both Jew and Christian, both nationally and individually, the tribulations have indeed been many. Both Christians and Jews have had full measures of political subjugation, social discomfort and disgrace, trading and commercial disaster and loss, and educational disadvantage and detriment. And now, many of them are enjoying the exact reverse of all this, and to such marked degree that Jews and Christians stand at the head of all mankind in all spheres of human life. This surely is a sign of the times!

The Result of Training.

Equally significant do we regard what we believe to be the fact, that after all the vicissitudes of religious experience during the same 2500 years, individual spiritual character in both Jews and Christians has attained a higher standard and quality than ever before. It is a natural result of the long discipline of these centuries that faith has reached, in some of God's people, a higher development, and shaped into a more nearly perfect type, than formerly; so that in this respect it is true of many who are last in being called, that they shall be among the first in the Kingdom.

In comparison with the mass of mankind, these will doubtless be very few in number. The present are days of spreading unbelief, infidelity, and libertinism, and answer to the condition implied in the King's words: "When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" He evidently did not anticipate finding much; but the harvest of faith which he will reap with his own living ones will surely answer to all the pains he has bestowed upon its cultivation, and yield him fruit, in some thirty, in some sixty, in some even a hundred-fold.

Current Works of Faith.

There are works of faith being done, and answers to prayers of faith being received now which equal and surpass anything of the kind ever before recorded. Many of Christ's people have proved his words true which he said to some who marvelled at his miracles: "Greater works than these shall ye do, because ye believe in me." Christian ministers, preachers, philanthropists, nurses, and others, can testify to miracles of conversion, of healing, of help, of deliverance, the record of which, were it all compiled together, would astound even those who believe. The Holy Spirit of God is working mightily in these last days, and fulfilling the Divine promises in such measure as to set many of his people looking for the outpouring, while it demonstrates to them the presence of the hand of God, and the truth of his Word. On the whole, therefore, we are constrained to think that the present times are showing such signs as are indicative of ripening unto harvest.

Social and Religious Signs.

Every phase of doctrine, every form of ecclesiasticism, every effort of philanthropy, and every theory of reform, has been exhausted in the effort to amend the world in its social and moral conditions, and they have all miserably failed. The total sum of human misery is no less, certainly, if it is not greater, than it ever was before. Civilization, highly vaunted as it is by many, is seen by others to be a sham, except in so far as it has borrowed from the morals of Christianity some saving truths and maxims.

For five thousand years the cleverest, ay, and many of the best of mankind, have been trying their utmost, in these and various other ways, to remodel the state of human affairs and perfect the conditions of human life. But the world is unsaved by them yet—the efforts and schemes are all failures; and although the world is wealthier and more civilized than ever before, there is also in it more wretchedness and iniquity, inveterate, widespread, subtle, and insidious. There is, in fact,

A Double Harvest Ripening—

one a crop of good seed, the other a crop tares. Not only has the mystery of the Kingdom of heaven been gradually developing and ripening, but the "mystery of iniquity," or lawlessness, has been working also, and a great harvest for the fire it will afford. God's nation, Israel of the ten tribes, has been sifted through the world, preserved in most marvellous manner, yet disciplined and taught by historical, political, commercial, ecclesiastical, and spiritual experiences, for their high destiny. Out of them, by means of the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, he has been taking for himself, generation by generation, a people of "Israelites indeed," each one personally saved and purified through faith and the Holy Spirit. To these he has joined like believing ones, taken in like manner out of every other nation, and kindred, and tribe, and tongue; for to all these the Gospel has been preached.

Preservation of the Jews.

He has also preserved, in no less marvellous, yet more open and distinctive manner, the Jews, who are the House, or nation of Judah and his fellows. These have exhibited the effects of their severe discipline and training, in having continued, for a long period, true to the worship of their fathers; and they have been punished and blessed according to the Covenant, in proportion to their faithfulness and righteous obedience. In this connection it is significant that the chief Rabbi of the Jews of St. Petersburg, lately charged upon the Russian Jews that their recent dreadful sufferings were, in his opinion, a divine punishment for their general sinfulness, and disobedience of the laws of their God, whom they profess to serve. On the other hand, the more favored Jews in Western Europe, having among them some of the most God-fearing men now living, are being blessed under the Covenant, and are the financiers of the world.

The Land of Palestine.

God has also kept the land of Palestine from being a profitable or happy possession to any of the nations who have subdued it. Yet in recent years he has restored the long-withheld "latter rain" and is causing the land to revive and show signs of renewed fertility; thus bringing it into readiness for the use and occupation of the people to whom he gave it for an everlasting possession, and to whom it has belonged all the time, although they have been absent from it.

He has given the nations of the world time and opportunity to try every form of government and every mode of philanthropy possible to man, and by their failure has demonstrated the utter inability of man to save himself or rule aright. He has also let them have full experience of all kinds of evil, and permitted Satan to test and try them with all his subtle and sensual powers, inasmuch that those who were not indisposed to let Satan lead them captive at his will have even become "children of the evil one." On the other hand, these evil powers and influences have also tried and tested the faith and virtue of the children of light, showing them the wickedness of sin, promoting in them an abhorrence of all evil, and a love of all that is good. So the mystery of the kingdom and the mystery of iniquity have been working side by side; the one to the perfecting of righteousness and holiness by faith, and eternal life; the other to all deceivableness of unrighteousness and eternal death.

The Solemnity of the Times.

Because the time of the end of this age is near; because iniquity abounds; because the acceptable year of the Lord is closing; because the day of vengeance of our God is at hand; and because the kingdom of heaven is nigh, even at the doors; we are constrained to say to each of our readers: "Flee from the wrath that is coming." "Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness." "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." "There is salvation in none other."

THE FIRST DISCIPLES.

S. S. Lesson for July 12, By Mrs. M. Baxter.
John 1: 29-42. Golden Text, John 1: 29.

THE first disciples of Jesus had previously been followers of John the Baptist, the "man sent from God," who stood in the twilight, between the dispensation of the law and the Gospel. He was an unusual man, so absorbed with his vocation to prepare for the coming of his Lord, that none of those things which absorb an ordinary man, neither domestic comforts, nor food, nor clothing, might interfere with it.

As yet Jesus had lived the life of an ordinary artisan, but things had been ripening for his ministry, and the time ordained of the Father was at hand. "The next day, John seeth Jesus coming, ran unto him and saith:

Behold the Lamb of God

which taketh away the sin of the world. This is he." More than thirty years of intense expectation culminated in that moment; the years of solitude and fasting, and of communion with God in the desert had been a preparation for this moment. Now he no longer cried, "The kingdom of heaven is at hand," Jesus, the Son of God, and the Son of Man, stood before him, and his educated soul, taught by the Holy Ghost, who had filled him from his very birth, recognized Jesus as the sacrifice, "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world!" When the consummation of this dispensation shall arrive, and Christ shall claim his bride, it will be the marriage, not of the King of kings, but "the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready." (Rev. 19: 7.) The beginning and ending of our knowledge of Jesus is of him as the Lamb, we can never get beyond that—we worship the Lamb, we follow the Lamb.

John testified of the Lamb of God: "I knew him not," and then told the wondrous story of the baptism of the Lord Jesus, and of the testimony from heaven which then came down by the Holy Ghost, "and I saw and bare record that this is the Son of God." "The next day after," John repeated his testimony, "Behold the Lamb of God," and two disciples which had formerly followed him, left him to follow Jesus. These were the first disciples of Jesus, they had been in training to John the Baptist, had learned the lessons of repentance and confession of sin which he taught; had seen his unworldly Christ-concentrated spirit, and now John could lead them no further, they had found "the Lamb of God," they must follow him. This is the mission of an evangelist, to lead souls as far as to the Lamb of God; he will then himself take charge; and any teaching given to disciples is in vain if it does not go to cement the union between Christ and them.

But are there not many who seem to pass through a kind of conversion, and yet very little apprehend the Cross of Christ, very little enter into the spirit of Jesus as the Lamb? Are there not many who "follow their own spirit," and have never laid down or lost their own lives for Jesus? These the way of the Cross; they will not cross themselves out of their hopes, and pride and expectations; they are "enemies of the Cross of Christ." They want to be saved by the Lamb without following the Lamb; to accept of God's forgiveness, but to live their own selfish and self-sufficient life. These have not been educated in a John the Baptist school, in which one of the first and principal lessons is, "He must increase, but I must decrease."

Do not Understand

When the two disciples of John left him and followed Jesus, he put to them a testing question, "What seek ye?" and their first word of answer was in itself a surrender: "Rabbi, (my Master), where dwellest thou?" His answer was an invitation: "Come and see." It is a blessed thing when a young disciple seeks in Jesus a Master from the very first, and a dwelling-place where he dwells:

Such Disciples do not Make Backsliders.

Their first day of faith was spent with Jesus, not with the multitude; it was a good beginning. One of the two, Andrew, was too full of his new-found treasure to keep it to himself; "he first findeth his own brother Simon, and saith unto him, We have found the Messiah, which is, being interpreted, the Christ; and he brought him to Jesus." From the very first, that which most filled John's deeply prepared heart, "the Lamb," was less in the eyes of Andrew than the vision of the Messiah, which answered to the expectations of the day. Already thoughts of the earthly glory of the reign of the Messiah were waking up in the new disciple; he had not learned his own heart, not yet the deep sin of a lost world, as God had taught it to John in the desert; and thus he had not the same appreciation of Jesus as the Lamb of God.

But Andrew, earthly as was his own conception of his Master, must share with Peter his acquaintance with him. He brought Peter to Jesus, who, when he beheld him, gave him a new name; "Thou art Simon, the Son of Jona, thou shalt be called Cephas, which is by interpretation a stone." Real contact with Jesus prepares for a new name and a new character. "If any man be in Christ he is a new creature, old things are passed away; behold, all things have become new." The son of thunder could become the disciple of love in the epistle of John, the Saul of Tarsus who once breathed out threatenings and slaughter, became the disciple who taught us to bear one another's burdens and "so fulfil the law of Christ." It is a law of true spiritual life that it must propagate itself: it cannot do otherwise. The soulful life, the carnal mind, which consists of feelings, emotions, thoughts, opinions, and which has its centre in itself, has no such power; it revolves around itself. But a spiritual man, one filled with the Spirit of God,

Becomes Reproductive,

"Out of him shall flow rivers of living water;" "everything shall live whither the river cometh." (Ezek. 47: 9.) John led Andrew to Christ, and Andrew Peter. And there is little doubt that when, on the following day, "Jesus findeth Philip," who "was of Bethsaida, the city of Andrew and Peter," these two brethren had some hand in the meeting between Jesus and their old fellow-townsmen. Philip, on his part, no sooner comes in contact with Jesus than he seeks another soul. "Philip findeth Nathaniel and saith unto him, 'We have found him of whom Moses in the law, and prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph.'" "We have found the Messiah" was testimony sufficient for Peter; but the learned Nathaniel, deeply read in Scripture, must be convinced from the Word that Jesus had a just claim to the Messiahship; that this was he "of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write," and his first question was based upon the knowledge of the then prophetic Scriptures; "Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" Philip's answer was a practical one: "Come and see." True disciples of Christ are not afraid to have all things brought to the test; they want nothing to be taken for granted; they bear their testimony of the Lamb of God, and then say to the inquirer, "Come and see for yourselves, what a Saviour Jesus is."

Hidden beneath the exterior of that meek and lowly Man who stood before Nathaniel were the eyes which are "as a flame of fire" (Rev. 1: 14), and he read Nathaniel through and through, and said of him; "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile." Jesus knows each one of his disciples; what they are, and what he is able and willing to make them. He loves his own, not for what they can bring him, but from the fount of his own love.

DOING OUR SHARE.

Four Points on the S. S. Lesson Pertinently Illustrated.

1. "Behold the Lamb of God." Here is the first recorded testimony. John points out Jesus and declares him to be the "Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." Countless millions have since, by blessed experience, confirmed the eternal truth of these precious words. Sin-burdened multitudes cast down, despondent, cheerless, comfortless, full of despair and spiritually dead, have looked and lived, and to-day Jesus is their Saviour and Burden-Bearer. Others are groping in the dark, longing for deliverance, knowing not which way to turn. You and I have a work to do. Long since, John has been gathered to his reward and now we must take up the work and point sinners to Christ. The weakest testimony is better than none, and sometimes the feeblest instrumentalities, by the blessing of God, become the mightiest agencies for good. Often the smallest child, however weak, can use this weapon for the Master, and God will surely add his blessing.

Here is a little story for our encouragement. Years ago, in one of our well-to-do country churches, the preacher, a very learned man, strove hard to win over to Christ a wealthy lady, who regularly attended the services and very liberally contributed, not only to the church, but to every worthy charity brought to her notice. In fact she "went about doing good," yet she lacked that faith in Christ so necessary and essential to salvation. The pastor earnestly prayed with her, and for her, in public, and in private, and one Sunday evening he preached a sermon especially designed to fit her case, and with great warmth and eloquence delivered the message.

It was a Methodist church, and it frequently happened that at the close of the preaching service, the meeting was "thrown open for testimony." When the preacher had finished and resumed his seat, a little boy, crippled for life by an accident, arose, and in broken words testified to his great joy in believing, and expressed a desire for the prayers of the congregation that he might ever be kept faithful. It was but a very feeble effort of a very feeble child, and the preacher seemed greatly annoyed that the boy had broken in on the good impression he thought his sermon had made, and which through this diversion had apparently in a large measure, been dispelled.

The next morning the wealthy lady called on the pastor and in a most agitated manner asked him to pray with her. She felt so troubled since last night that she could not sleep, and being inwardly convicted of sin, was earnestly desirous of making her peace with God. Together they knelt in prayer, and earnestly besought him, who said "Come unto me all ye who are heavy laden," for deliverance and rest. Finding peace, according to promise, the pastor engaged her in conversation and inquired which part of his sermon had most impressed her. "Ah! Doctor," replied she, "nothing that you said unusually affected me. I know you to be an eloquent man and I expected a good sermon. But when that little crippled boy arose and told how grateful he was for what Jesus had done for him, then the scales fell from my eyes and I saw how ungrateful a wretch I had been. God has blessed me with health, wealth and friends, and all these years I have not acknowledged him. But by his help I will endeavor to atone for the past and lead a life of earnest devotion and close consecration."

2. Hearing John's testimony, two follow Jesus, and thus we have the first disciples, the beginning of the Christian Church. They heard, saw and believed. No time wasted in useless argument.

How needful it is to be prompt to accept Jesus. On every hand dangers beset us, and before we are aware, it may be too late. In a mining district of Scotland some earnest missionaries were holding Gospel meetings, and urging men, women and children to accept Christ. One evening after the exhortation many miners crowded the inquiry room, and quite a number were soundly converted. The next day an accident happened and one of the miners was badly hurt. While in a half unconscious state, he was heard to whisper, "I am glad I settled it last night! I am glad I settled it last night!" On inquiry it was found that he was one of the number who the night before had given their hearts to God. Though, through a merciful Providence his life was spared, he never regretted having settled it that night.

3. "What seek ye?" The first words of the Master as recorded by John, and with these words Jesus meets all who seek him.

When the blind Bartimeus cried "Thou Son of David, have mercy on me." Jesus asked, "What wilt thou that I should do unto thee?" and so when trembling sinners come to him, Jesus inquires, "What seek ye?" He wants an itemized statement, he wants particulars. You must formulate your wants. You must know your wants to have them supplied. Too many people cry, "Help, Lord, help!" without knowing what they really want.

If you, pleading the promises, present a bill at the bank of faith, you must accompany it with an itemized statement, if you expect it to be promptly honored. If you want deliverance from any particular sin, say so. If you want strength to bear some unusual strain, say so. If you want God to save your wayward boy, say so. Don't generalize. Particularize, and you will often find that while you tell God all about it, he reveals to your eyes and to your hearts, the very means of deliverance that theretofore had been hidden. Try it and the flood of peace and light that will flow in upon your soul, will satisfy you for the effort it may require to go into the very details of that for which you seek help from God.

4. Andrew gets his brother. The first missionary effort. Andrew evidently could not have known much about the details of the faith to which he so cheerfully and suddenly subscribed, yet immediately there sprang up in his heart the desire to win others to participate with him in the joys that were in store for him. Some would wait until they had advanced a little further in the knowledge of these things, others would regret that their opportunities for working for the Master were so limited as to render them almost unworthy of serious consideration, but Andrew did that which was nearest at hand, without waiting for more light or greater opportunity, and if we all would profit by the example that he thus sets us, and all Christians would do their duty as Andrew did his, the world would be converted before the end of this century.

But here is a little story, which shows how, by doing our share, we may be instrumental in winning over others to do theirs, and thus be the means of accomplishing the mightiest results for God.

There is a story about the First Brick Church in a western city, which is both interesting and instructive. It is said that when the church which preceded the one that now stands, became too small to accommodate the throngs that sought to worship God at that place, it was suggested that a larger church be built in order that none might be deprived the privilege. The official brethren held conferences and meetings, and talked and discussed and argued and planned and disputed. For a time everybody believed the church was to be built, but after a great deal of discussion and very little giving, it was finally decided to drop the project for the present. With a saddened heart the preacher announced the result to the congregation. But there was a little boy in that Sunday School, who believed that the people meant what they said, when they declared their intention of building a new church. He was not present the evening on which the announcement that the project had fallen through was made.

The next morning there was a ring at the bell of the parsonage and the door being opened, a little boy inquired diligently after the pastor. He refused to make his business known to the servant that opened the door and insisted so urgently on seeing the pastor himself, that finally he had his desire gratified. His first words were: "I hear you are going to build a new church," to which the pastor somewhat hesitatingly assented and the boy continued: "And I have brought a load of bricks and I wish you would tell me where I shall put them." The pastor looked out upon the street and there was a small toy wheelbarrow with two bricks in it. He took in the situation at once and patting the boy on the head, he said to him "Wait, my little fellow, I will show you where to put the bricks to good advantage." Putting on his hat he walked by the side of the boy with the wheelbarrow until he came to Brother Brown's wagon factory. Brother Brown had done a tall amount of talking, but somehow or other had successfully dodged the real point at issue. The pastor found him in his office and greeted him with: "Good morning, Brother Brown, after all, we are going to have our new church and more than that, the first load of bricks is already at hand." Brother Brown looked up somewhat incredulous and astonished. The pastor asked him to step outside and see for himself. He led him out and showed him the wheelbarrow and told him the story and asked him, whether he did not consider that as an object lesson from Providence and an intimation to do his duty. Brother Brown did not hesitate very long, but shaking the pastor and the boy by the hand, simply said, "You can put me down for $2,000." The pastor, thanking him, went on and made the round among all the trustees and other official brethren and before the day was over enough money was pledged to build the First Brick Church, which stands to-day as a monument to the little boy who, in faith, went forth and did that which was nearest at hand.

Suppose there were 3,000,000 Christians in the world to-day, all earnest and consecrated with a desire for souls and that each one did as much in one year as Andrew did in that one day! Where there are 3,000,000 now there would be 6,000,000 Christians the next year, and the year after that 12,000,000, and the year after that 24,000,000, and the year after that 48,000,000, and the next 96,000,000, and the next 192,000,000, and the next 384,000,000, and the next 768,000,000, and the last year of this century 1,536,000,000—more souls than the earth contains, and then indeed would every knee bow at the name of Christ and own him Lord of all.

A SISTER'S DEVOTION.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for July 12: "Behold the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world." John 1: 29.

THE proprietor of a large millinery establishment in a great city sat at her desk with her cheque-book before her. She had just written a cheque for a large sum and she sat looking at it thoughtfully.

"I wonder what Miss Marsh does with her money?" she said to her husband, who was waiting to drive his wife out of town to her suburban home.

"Oh, I suppose she gets through it like the others," he replied.

"No, she does not. She spends scarcely anything on dress, she wears no jewelry, she lives in the very cheapest boarding-house and never takes any pleasure. Yet I pay her a very large salary; I believe there is no employee in any house in the country who gets so large a sum. She is well worth it, I admit, for there never was such a girl to work and she has far more skill than I have. Still, I wish I knew what she did with it."

"Saves it, perhaps," the husband suggested.

"No, she has scarcely anything left within a week of my paying her for the quarter. I have found that out. No, she spends it in some mysterious way."

"Give it up," said the man rising. "Are you ready?"

Miss Marsh was called, the precious slip of paper handed to her, and the employer drove away. The girl, a bright, plainly dressed, alert business woman, went back to her work and remained to a late hour. The next day she visited the bank and went thence to a merchant's office where she paid in the bulk of what she had received, reserving but little more than was necessary to pay her modest board bill.

"You still keep up your little payments, I see, Miss Marsh," said the merchant. "I admire your devotion, but I fear it is wasted. Your brother will never repay you. He is not worth all the money you are paying for him."

"Oh, yes, sir, he is worth it to me. He is all I have in the world," the girl replied, the tears rising to her eyes. "Father and mother are both dead and I promised mother to be true to him. He is living an honest life now and when this is paid I will get him to come back and we can be together again."

"Let me see, how long have you been paying at this rate?"

"It is three years now, and it will take me two years longer."

"Well, well, you are a good girl; I wish your brother was more deserving of you."

"I never saw such a case of sisterly devotion as that," the merchant said after she was gone, to a friend who had heard the conversation. "That brother of her's is as idle and dissolute a young scamp as ever lived. He was in our employ and managed to get his hands on the money in a very smart way. We liked him and trusted him, but we heard afterward that he was a regular gambler. He made a pretty large defalcation before we discovered what he was doing. He got away before we could have him arrested. Then this girl came and pleaded for him. Made quite a scene. Finally undertook to pay the whole amount in quarterly payments with interest. She is doing it, too. She has only one more year to pay, though she does not know it, for we shall forego the interest. Strange, isn't it that the innocent should suffer for the guilty in that way."

"Yes, it seems a natural law and it is not always voluntary as in this case. The drunkard's wife and children suffer more privation by his misconduct than he does. Every evildoer drags some one down with him. The worst of it is that their suffering does not rehabilitate him. This girl seems to have that hope to cheer her. She evidently hopes that her sacrifice will restore him to society and redeem him. I suppose if he came back now you would not proceed against him?"

"No, we could not after accepting the girl's money. But she does not seem to understand that. She means to pay it all before she gets him back, and start him clear with nothing against him. But his character is gone just the same. He will never be anything else but a defaulter. Her paying back what he stole does not clear him. It discharges our claim, but it does not set him right."

"Not in the sight of God, of course. But there again we come back on the same law. The only way of rehabilitation we know of comes to us through the suffering of the innocent. It does not seem just, but somehow it gives relief to the conscience. I have seen men overwhelmed by the thought of the sins they have committed, despairing of mercy, take new hope and confidence when they were told that Christ had suffered in their place and made atonement for them. The theologians call it 'saving truth' and they are right; for it does save. The men who believe it reform; it changes their life."

"Yes, I have seen that, too; but I cannot understand it."

"Well, there is power in it, even in the modified case of this girl. If that brother of her's has any good at all left in him, there is nothing so likely to develop it as what she has done and suffered for him. We can understand that, and it seems to be God's way. Men are redeemed by love and nothing else."

A SUNDAY SCHOOL BOY IN A MINE.

A SUNDAY School superintendent recently returned from Europe says: "While I was travelling through Wales there was an accident in one of the mines. A number of men and boys were shut up in a part of the cuttings, and men were laboring night and day to cut through the dense mass of timber and rubbish which barred the escape of the prisoners. It was feared that the deadly gas of the mine had killed them, but it was possible they might be alive so the men worked on. Some of them had sons or brothers on the other side of that wall of debris, so it was no wonder they worked hard. But their labor was lost. When they made a passage through every one was dead. I visited some of those bereaved families. In one a boy of fifteen was dead. I asked about him. 'Well sir,' said the father, 'it's hard to lose him, but if one of us had to go, it's best it should be him. He was the only one fit to go. I've never run much on religion, nor have any of us but him. He was a regular Sunday School boy. We used to laugh at him, but he held on. When we found him he had his Testament in his poor dead hand!' They showed me the little soiled book. Several of its leaves were turned down and on one of those I read the words: 'Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh!'"

A MISTAKEN TEACHER.

AT the recent anniversary of the English Sunday School Union, a clergyman said: "I have always taken a deep interest in the Sunday Schools connected with the two churches of which I have been pastor. Now, in my first charge when I was a young man we had one teacher named Ward. He was rather a dull man but very painstaking. He knew his failing and exaggerated it. He would say, 'I am not fit for this work, I cannot interest the boys. I cannot keep their attention. You need a brighter man.' Then he would resign and we had to talk him over. We held him to his post by making him confess that he ought to stay until a better man could be found to take his place. We never found a better man, for he was really good, and in earnest. At last we lost him. He left the town to live in Edinburgh. He went away believing that his Sunday School work had been a failure. Now mark this: Only six weeks ago a missionary from Central Africa attended at my church to speak at a missionary meeting we were having. It turned out in conversation that when he was a boy he had been in my first Sunday School and was in the class of Mr. Ward, that discouraged teacher. He said to me, 'I want to find that man out if he is still alive. I want to thank him for what he did for me twenty years ago.' I say to every teacher here, never be discouraged. 'Though the vision tarry, wait for it, because it will surely come.' (Heb 2: 3.)

THE OAK TREE.*

PERHAPS you will be surprised to hear that there are about three hundred kinds of oak in the world, and some of these are very different looking from ours; but they all bear acorns. This is the royal fruit. Only two kinds of oak are natives of Britain, and these are very nearly alike. The leaves of the common oak have no stalks. The acorns of the other kind, which is known as the durmast oak, are on very short stalks; and the leaves have long stalks, and lie flat on each side of the stem, so that it is sometimes called the flat leaved oak, and also the sessile-fruited oak—that is, the oak which has its fruit sitting on the twigs. . . . When the oak has ripened his acorns, he feels that his work is done for another year, and that it is time to get ready for his winter rest; so he begins by letting his leaves turn yellow and brown. He was nearly the last of the trees to don his summer dress, and he is one of the last to put it off—indeed, he often keeps some of the brown leaves on his branches all through the winter. The leaves fall, but the little buds stay on the branches. If it were not for these we might think the oak was dead, he sleeps so soundly; but they are God's promise to us that the winter will pass and summer will come again, when the trees and plants have had their rest.

The Ash.

The ash is often called the husbandman's tree, because its wood is so much used in making his tools, wheels, shafts, and other such articles that require to be light and springy. It has also been used for weapons of war from the earliest times. Those of you who have read the old Greek stories will remember the "mighty ashen spear" of the great warrior Achilles. The ash and the oak seem to be as different as two trees can be. The ash does not grow as old as the oak, and it does its work best when it grows fast, perhaps because it has a different kind of wood to make. Some have one thing to do, some another; some can work fast, and some only slowly; and God gives each one the power that is best for the work he gives him to do. Our mistake is when we think our own work the best, and our own way the only right one, and do not see that our Father needs all.

The Christmas Tree—The Fir.

We often see fir trees in a very strange place, bearing wonderful fruit of gold and silver, shining lights, and glittering toys.

The fir tree stood
In a beautiful room;
A hundred tapers
Dispelled the gloom.

All decked with gold and silver was he,
And lilies and roses so fair to see.
Hurrah for the fir tree, the Christmas tree;
A prince in all the forests is he!

The little children
With merry shout
Came crowding, clustering Round about.

Brighter and rounder grew their eyes,
And they gazed at the fir tree in glad surprise.
Hurrah for the fir tree, the Christmas tree;
A prince in all the forests is he!

In olden times all trees were sacred things—temples of nature, holy houses where people worshipped their gods. You have been told the story of the great world-tree, which the people of the north said was ash; and also in what great reverence the ancients held the oak. The pine was the sacred tree of the Germans. The Christmas-tree was a picture of the old world-tree, with the eagle on the top, and the lights were the stars shining among the branches. When the Germans became Christians, they could not give up loving their old pine tree, and so they turned it into a Christmas-tree, and set an angel or a dove on the top instead of an eagle, and let its lamps tell a new story of the night when the light came into the world. A young spruce was the tree generally chosen for the Christmas festivities.

The Aspen.

These leaves have forgotten to make a long point, and are nearly round. They are so thin and light that they quiver in the tiniest puff of a breeze; and when we wish to say that any person has trembled a great deal, we say he trembled like an aspen leaf. If the aspen leaves are still, you may be quite sure that a great storm is coming on, and you must run home as quickly as possible; for the whole earth has stopped breathing, in awful expectation of the coming tumult. Why does this little leaf tremble so much? The Scottish Highlanders give a strange answer. They say that the Cross of our Saviour was made of aspen wood, and that the tree has never since ceased to tremble with horror at having been put to such a terrible use.

For fear, the aspen, pallid and weak,
Which sighs by the moorland side,
And gave the wood for that hallowed Cross
On which the Saviour died;
Which stood erect, while its fellow-trees
Stood, Till its merited punishment came,
And since the doom of that terrible day
Has quivered and bent with shame.

We know that the aspen trembled before that time, and that God himself gave the leaves those long, slender stalks, and we will not think of them as quaking with fear. No; they are dancing with delight and joy in the beautiful world, and smiling in the glorious sunshine!

The Lapland Birch.

You may imagine how precious the birch must be in Lapland, where it is the only tree. The Lapp children must know all its ways. It grows on bravely, and does its best there, in spite of the cold; but with all its striving it can only manage to become a very small tree, often only a bush, and sometimes only a little plant. A gentleman once brought away six full-grown trees in his pocket. It is used there for many purposes. Baskets, mats, cords, waterproof boots and shoes, are all made of the bark. The houses are roofed with it instead of tiles; strips of it are twisted into torches, which burn well because of the stores of oil they contain; and in times of scarcity the inner layers of the bark are ground into flour for bread. Sometimes the natives get a large piece of bark, cut a hole in the middle for the head to pass through, and then use it as a waterproof cloak—a very funny one. Whenever you visit the birch tree, listen to its gentle whisperings of its high mission, and may yours be the same noble aim.

A Famous Cedar Grove.

Far away on the hills of Lebanon, there stands now a little grove of trees, shut in between snowy mountain peaks—all that is left of the celebrated forest to which Hiram, king of Tyre, and Solomon, king of Israel, sent their little armies of woodmen with their axes. Two or three of these trees are so old that perhaps they were alive and young when their fathers were carried away to build the temple, in Jerusalem, and the palaces of the king. The wandering Arabs call these old trees the saints and look on them with great reverence, and say that they are wiser than men—that when a storm is coming on they lift up their boughs to the sky, as if preparing to bear the weight of snow; and when the snow is ready to melt they bend down to the ground to let it fall. The whole place is scented with their fragrant resin. This cedar resin is so bitter that no insects trouble the tree, and it is left to grow and spread out its branches to a great

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,

Bible House, New York City.

This week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes out to our readers in a new dress of type and in an enlarged form. We trust that they will agree with us in regarding the change as in the line of improvement. While new and interesting departments have been added, it will be observed that none of the standard features which have made the paper so popular in the past have been omitted.

STRUGGLING YOUNG MEN.

TAKE care of yourself. Nobody else will take of you. Your help will not come up two or three or four flights of stairs; your help will come through the roof, down from heaven, from that God who in the six thousand years of the world's history never betrayed a young man who tried to be good and a Christian. Let me say in regard to your adverse worldly circumstances in passing, that you are on a level now with those who are finally to succeed. Mark my words, and think of it thirty years from now. You will find that those who, thirty years from now, are the millionaires of this country, who are the orators of the country, who are the poets of the country, who are the strong merchants of the country, who are the great philanthropists of the country—mightiest in church and State—are now on a level with you, not an inch above, and you in straitened circumstances now.

Herschel earned his living by playing a violin at parties, and in the interstices of his playing he would go out and look up at the midnight heavens, the field of his immortal conquests. George Stephenson rose from being the foreman of a colliery to be the most renowned of the world's engineers. No outfit, no capital to start with! Young man, go down to the library and get some books, and read of what wonderful mechanism God gave you in your hand, in your foot, in your eye, in your ear, and then ask some doctor to take you into the dissecting-room and illustrate to you what you have read about, and never again commit the blasphemy of saying you have no capital to start with. Equipped! Why, the poorest young man is equipped as only the God of the whole universe could afford to equip him.

THE GYMNASIUM.

FROM long experience of the advantages of this institution we commend it. We are glad to know it is gaining in favor every year, and I know of nothing more free from dissipation, or more calculated to recuperate the physical and mental energies. While there are a good many people who have employed this institution, there is a vast number who are ignorant of its excellences. There are men with cramped chests and weak sides and despondent spirits who, through the gymnasium, might be roused up to exuberance and exhilaration of life. There are many Christian people despondent from year to year, who might, through such an institution, be benefited in their spiritual relations. There are Christian people who seem to think that it is a good sign to be poorly; and because Richard Baxter and Robert Hall were invalids, they think that by the same sickness they may come to the same grandeur of character. I want to tell Christian people that God will hold you responsible for your invalidism if it is your fault and when, through right exercises and prudence, you might be athletic and well. The effect of the body upon the soul you acknowledge. Put a man of mild disposition upon the animal diet of which the Indian partakes, and in a little while the blood will change its chemical proportions. It will become like unto the blood of the lion, or the tiger, or the bear, while his disposition will change, and become fierce, cruel, and unrelenting. The body has a powerful effect upon the soul.

There are good people whose ideas of heaven are all shut out with clouds of tobacco smoke. There are people who dare to shatter the physical vase in which God has put the jewel of eternity. There are men with great hearts and intellects in bodies worn out by their own neglects—magnificent machinery capable of propelling a Majestic across the Atlantic, yet fastened in a rickety North River propeller. Martin Luther was so mighty for God—first, because he had a noble soul, and secondly, because he had a muscular development which would have enabled him to thrash any five of his persecutors, if it had been Christian so to do. Physical development which merely shows itself in fabulous lifting, or in perilous ropewalking, or in pugilistic encounter, excites only our contempt; but we confess to great admiration for the man who has a great soul in an athletic body, every nerve, muscle, and bone of which is concentrated to right uses. Oh, it seems to me outrageous that men, through neglect, should allow their physical health to go down beyond repair. A ship which ought, with all sail set and every man at his post, to be carrying a rich cargo for eternity, employing all its men in stopping up leakages! When you may, through the gymnasium, work off your spleen and your querulousness, and one-half of your physical and mental ailments, do not turn your back upon such a grand medicament.

HEALTHY CHILDREN.

OUR goody-goody kind of children make namby-pamby men. I should not be surprised to find that a colt which does not frisk becomes a horse that will not draw. It is not religion that makes that boy sit by the stove while his brothers are out snow-balling, but the "dumps." The boy who has no fire in his nature may after he has grown up, have animation enough to grease a wagon-wheel, but he will not own the wagon nor have money enough to buy the grease. The best boy I ever knew, before he went to heaven, could strike a ball till it soared out of sight, and, in the race, as far as you could see, you would find his red tippet coming out ahead. Look out for the boy who never has the fingers of a good laugh tickle him under the diaphragm. The most solemn-looking mule on our place has kicked to pieces five dash-boards.

There are parents who notice that their daughter is growing pale and sick, and therefore think she must be destined to marry a missionary, and to go to Borneo, although the only recommendation she has for that position is that she will never be any temptation to the cannibals, who, while very fond of cold missionary, are averse to diseased meat; or, finding their son looking cadaverous, think he is either going to die or become a minister, considering that there is great power of consecration in liver complaint, and thinking him doubly set apart, who, while presbytery are laying their hands on his head, has dyspepsia laying its hand on his stomach.

Oh! for a religious literature that shall take for its model of excellence a boy that loves God, and can digest his dinner in two hours after he eats it! Be not afraid to say, in your account of his decease, that the day before you lost him he caught two rabbits in his trap down on the meadow, or soundly thrashed a street-ruffian who was trying to upset a little girl's basket of cold victuals. I do not think that heaven is so near to an ill-ventilated nursery as to a good gymnasium. If the church of God could trade off three thousand hogsheads of religious cant for three thousand hogsheads of fresh air and stout health, we would be the gainers, but the fellow with whom we traded would be cheated mercilessly and forever.

START RIGHT.

THE theory is abroad among young men, that they must first sow their wild oats, and afterward Michigan wheat. Let me break the delusion. Wild oats are generally sown in the liver, and they can never be pulled up. They so pre-occupy that organ that there is no room for the implantation of a righteous crop. You see aged men about us at eighty erect, agile, splendid, grand old men. How much wild oats did they sow between eighteen years and thirty? None, absolutely none. God does not very often honor with old age those who have in early life sacrificed swine on the altar of the bodily temple. Remember, O young man, that while in after life and after years of dissipation you may perhaps have your heart changed, religion does not change the liver. Trembling and staggering along these streets to-day are men, all bent and decayed and prematurely old, for the reason that they are paying for liens they put upon their physical estate before they were thirty. By early dissipation they put on their body a first mortgage, and a second mortgage, and a third mortgage to the devil, and these mortgages are now being foreclosed, and all that remains of their earthly estate the undertaker will soon put out of sight.

SCIENTIFIC FARMING.

THERE are now in the United States many agricultural colleges. They are doing much for the science of farming. May all prosperity attend them! We think, however, that men seldom get to be practical farmers through such institutions. The students there have so delicate a time that they will not feel much like going out into the teeth of the northeast wind to sow winter grain, or drag logs through the snow with the thermometer five degrees below zero. We think that the most successful farmers are those who in boyhood rise at early daybreak, milk the cows, and drive them out to pasture, eat a chunk of salt pork, and get off to the fields before city people have come to their last morning dream. Many of the best farmers in the best farming region of the world never heard of an agricultural college. The practical part of the science of agriculture must be dug up by two brawny hands out of the middle of a cornfield. Those make the successful farmers who come in the regular line of succession. Their father tilled the soil, and their grandfather, and their great-grandfather, who went from the plough to Lexington, and back again from Lexington to the plough. Many a man puts down his gilt-edged book on phosphates and subsoiling, puts on his gloves, takes a jack-knife, and goes out to trim his grape-vines, trimming them in the wrong place, and is under the delusion that he is a farmer. That does very well if you have inherited or first made your fortune, and have an income of twelve thousand dollars a year, and you can afford to lose six thousand of it annually in experimenting with cows and chickens and unheard-of rotation of crops. But if we wanted our boy to come out an agricultural success, we would put him when very young in the furrow, and tell him to go ahead till he comes to the hay-stack, then turn round the hay-stack, and go back to the furrow.

BRIEF NOTES.

The special services conducted by Dr. Pentecost in Mussoorie, India, have been marked by much success. More than one hundred conversions were reported.

Mr. Spurgeon's works have been translated into the Norse language. At Christiania, Sweden, colporteurs have circulated upwards of 87,000 copies of his sermons alone.

Bishop William Taylor celebrated his seventieth birthday at Iondo, on the Coanza River, Angola, Africa, on May 2. The Bishop is hoping for another twenty years of work before he is called hence.

The New York Presbytery reports statistics for the year ending April 1, 1891, as follows: Elders, 514; deacons, 206; added on examination, 1,401; on certificate, 1,019; total of communicants, 24,077.

The Rev. Thomas Gallaudet, D. D., the friend and benefactor of deaf-mutes, expects to sail for Europe, July 4, to aid in church work among deaf-mutes in Great Britain and Ireland, and to attend a congress of deaf-mutes in Glasgow on August 3.

The Rev. Isaac Nicholson, Rector of St. Mark's Episcopal Church, Philadelphia, has been elected bishop of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of Milwaukee. He is a native of Baltimore, a graduate of Dartmouth, and studied theology in Alexandria, Va.

Rev. W. E. Needham of Germantown, Pa., is attracting very large congregations to his church on Sunday evening by a series of illustrated sermons. Mr. Needham was an artist before he became a minister and he is, therefore, able to make his own illustrations. On June 21, he preached on the life of Joseph, and in the course of his sermon drew five rapid sketches on paper illustrating the sermon.

The city of Janesville, Wis., has been moved, religiously, as never before, during the revival meetings conducted by Rev. B. Fay Mills. The gatherings were held in the Congregational church, that being the largest audience room in the place, and it was usually crowded. Business men cordially agreed to close their shops and offices at an early hour in the evening and also for certain hours on a given week day, a thing unheard of before in that town.

Mr. James H. Cannon, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Evangelist, began a series of revival meetings last Sunday at the Allen Street Memorial Church, New York, of which Rev. Wm. Hamilton, D. D., is pastor. This church seats a thousand persons and cost over $100,000. It is in the midst of a teeming population whose lives are sorely in need of all the help and consolation religion can give. Mr. Cannon asks for the prayers of the readers that the services may be abundantly blessed of God.

Rev. J. W. Turner of Chincoteague, Va., when in New York last week, gave a cheering account of the progress of the Baptist cause in the island. Only six hundred dollars remain to be paid on the new church, which cost three thousand dollars. Though the people are all poor, subsisting for the most part on the oyster fisheries, they have given liberally. One member who has nothing but what he gains from fishing gave $500. Mr. Turner is anxious to raise the remaining $600, and would be glad if some one would give a pulpit Bible. Any friend desiring to aid may remit to Rev. J. W. Turner, Chincoteague, Va.

The Rev. Goyn Talmage, D. D., an elder brother of the editor of this journal, died suddenly on Wednesday morning last. He was seen in his study until a late hour on Tuesday night and, when sometime later, his wife went to speak to him she found him unconscious. He was carried to his room and a physician was summoned. The seizure was pronounced apoplectic, and there was clearly no hope of recovery. He passed away within an hour. He was in his seventieth year and had been in the ministry forty-five years. Of late his health had been impaired and he had retired from active labor, residing in his native town of Somerville, N. J. We hope to publish a more extended notice next week.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

A Beecher Statue—Western Floods—A Christian Traveler—Sen. McDonald Dead, &c.

BROOKLYN last week unveiled a magnificent bronze statue to the late Henry Ward Beecher. It is placed in front of the City Hall Park, right in the business centre of the city, on a little triangular piece of sward, fronting the "Heights," where Mr. Beecher lived for so many years, and only a few minutes walk from Plymouth Church, the scene of his later activities. John Q. A. Ward, the famous sculptor, has shown the great preacher in a familiar attitude, and robed in a cape-coat or cloak, such as he used to wear in life. The figure, which is of colossal size, stands upon a pedestal of granite, the pedestal being flanked by bronze figures. On the right of the statue is the figure of a negro girl, reaching up to place a handful of palm leaves at its feet, while on the left are a boy and girl, the former supporting the latter, who is laying a wreath or garland of laurel on the top of the pedestal. The whole cost $35,000, every dollar of which was raised by popular subscription.

... PRINCE GEORGE, of Greece, who rescued the Russian Crown Prince from the assault of the Japanese fanatic in the suburbs of Kioto a few weeks ago, arrived in San Francisco last week. He intends to make a short stay in this country before returning home. The Czarowitch and the Prince are blood-relatives, the mother of the latter being Queen Olga-Constantinovna, Grand Duchess of Russia. George is a handsome young fellow, six feet two inches in height and well educated. He is quite modest concerning the adventure in which he figured so conspicuously by saving that life of the heir to the throne of Russia. He is 22 years of age. During his stay in the United States, he will visit Washington, the leading navy yards, and several other places of interest, but he will not go into society. He is of a serious turn of mind, and is not, like many princes, devoted to the fashionable frivolities that beset a young man of rank, while on his travels.

... ONE of the most energetic Christian ladies of the present age is unquestionably Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt of Boston, who returned to this country a few days ago, after an eight years' tour around the world. Mrs. Leavitt is a member of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and at the National Convention, in 1883, when it was decided to send out a "World Missionary," she was chosen for the task. Rejecting the Union's offer to pay all expenses of the trip and returning the $1,000 already subscribed, she started on her travels, declaring that "she was going on God's mission and he would carry her through." Since then she has visited the Hawaiian Islands, New Zealand, Australia, Tasmania, Japan, China, Siam, Straits settlements (Singapore and Malay Peninsula), Burmah, Hindostan, Ceylon, Mauritius, Madagascar, Natal, Orange Free State, Cape Colony, England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, Congo Free State, Old Calabar, Sierra Leone, Madeira, Spain, France, Holland, Norway, Sweden, Finland, Denmark, Germany, Italy, Greece, Egypt, Syria, and Turkey. She has organized eighty-six Women's Branches of the C. T. U., twenty-four Men's Temperance Societies, mostly in Japan, India and Madagascar, and twenty-three branches of the White Cross. She has held over 1600 meetings, travelled almost 100,000 miles and employed 229 interpreters, speaking in the aggregate forty-seven different tongues. That her faith was well founded is demonstrated by the fact that her entire expenses have been paid with money voluntarily given her at the different places visited. Mrs. Leavitt, whose portrait is given in this page, intends to shortly publish a book, describing her experiences abroad and the general scope and progress of Christian Temperance work all over the world.

... A VERDICT of acquittal has been rendered in the jury trial of that distinguished orator, social autocrat and statesman, Chauncey M. Depew and his associate directors in the New York, New Haven, and Hartford Railroad, who were sometime ago indicted for responsibility for the deaths of several persons in an accident on the road. After a collision, the cars caught fire from the stoves. It was claimed that the use of stoves was illegal. The jury found that the accused had been indicted for committing a crime vicariously and that such a charge could not hold in law. In obedience to explicit instruction from the judge, they gave a verdict for the defendants.

... FURTHER reports of cruelties perpetrated on the Hebrews in Russia are received from St. Petersburg. The persecution is extending to all foreigners in the Czar's dominion, especially Germans, Poles and Tartars, who are accused by the press of that country—which is under the immediate inspiration of the throne—of being secret enemies of Russia and the orthodox church. Prince Kropatkin, one of the Czar's most active agents in this persecution, recently signed secret orders expelling all the Polish engineers and employees engaged in building the Central Asian Railway. Frenchmen are now the only foreigners really tolerated in Russia. In Moscow, the large storekeepers have been compelled by ukase to dismiss foreigners in their employ. Meanwhile, Baron Hirsch's agents are pushing forward the arrangements for the early migration of the Hebrews from Russia in large numbers.

... CANADA is just now actively discussing a number of letters on the reciprocity question which have been submitted to the Dominion Senate at Ottawa, by the Premier. They were embodied in a message on the general subject of the extension of trade between the United States and the Dominion, and they review the proposals submitted by Great Britain throughout the entire controversy. It is shown by these letters that Mr. Blaine, in January last, put on record the opinion that an attempt to secure the appointment of a formal commission to draw up a reciprocity treaty would be useless, but that the United States would discuss the matter privately with Sir Julian Pauncefote and one or more delegates from Canada. He afterwards submitted the draft of a proposed treaty to Sir Julian. Mr. Blaine, in a subsequent letter, complains of the fact that correspondence which was intended to be purely confidential should have been permitted to become public to such an extent that Sir John Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper were enabled to refer accurately to the letters in stump speeches during the late campaign. The closing letter of the series states that October 12th, next, has been agreed upon as the date for a conference at Washington on the whole question, at which both countries will be ably represented.

... DISQUIETING news comes from China to the effect that serious peril threatens the foreign missionaries now in that country. As mentioned in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the persecution which began in the Wuchang district has spread to other sections, until now there is a likelihood of it becoming quite general. The lives of native converts are being made intolerable, their homes are looted and even destroyed by their heathenish fellow-countrymen and their lives are in danger. The French, English, and American Consuls at Shanghai have taken united action looking to the protection of foreign residents, but the mandarins, unhindered by the government, are urging on the work of persecution. Our fleet in Chinese waters is soon to be reinforced by the addition of two naval vessels to co-operate with the squadron under Admiral Belknap. We have only three vessels there at present and should American interests be threatened, this force would hardly be sufficient for the protection of our interests. The fanatics who are urging on the Chinese mobs to riot, incite them to fury by lying about the actions of the missionaries. Catholic as well as Protestant missionaries have suffered. The home of the Catholic priests at Wuhu was looted. The English Consulate was fired, and the Consul and his wife escaped by disguising themselves in native costumes and hiding in the Custom House. The Chinese gunboats and two companies of Imperial troops protected the foreign residents. The American Methodist missionaries at Wuhu were compelled to seek refuge on a gunboat where, with the priests and the refugees from different points, they remained till conveyed to Shanghai. All the maritime nations are strengthening their fleets in Chinese waters, and are even threatening bombardment unless foreigners are afforded protection.

... AUSTRALIA has paid a high tribute to the United States in framing the Constitution of the new Australian Federation after our own as the model.

The idea of federal union by the Australian Colonies was suggested as long ago as 1849, but did not then commend itself to the home government. Sir Henry Parkes, the premier of New South Wales, has done very largely for Australia, what the late Sir John Macdonald did for Canada, and has been a most active and prominent advocate of federation during the last decade. Two years ago he visited Queensland and conferred on the subject of a union for defense. Several years previous, an intercolonial conference at Sidney had discussed the question of federation and the outcome was the establishment of a federal council in 1883, which did not, however, include New South Wales. Sir Henry Parkes' energetic efforts resulted in a conference assembling at Melbourne last year, at which all the Australasian colonies were represented, when a constitution was drafted and a Federation Convention called for March, 1891. That convention, lately held, and of which Sir Henry Parkes was President, adopted the plan already outlined. The Federal Government consists of a Governor-General, a responsible Cabinet and two Houses of Parliament. Each colony has an equal voice in the Senate or Upper House, and in the Lower House, representation is in proportion to population. The autonomy of each colony is provided for, a uniform external tariff is adopted, and thus, with many of the distinguishing American features, the commonwealth of Australia is launched among the governments of the world. A portrait of Sir Henry Parkes is given above.

... THE week has been one of storm and flood in the Southwest. Kansas, especially, has been a sufferer. At Fort Scott, large dams gave way, flooding the bottom lands, wrecking many houses, and, it is feared, drowning many people. Whole families were driven to the roofs and even to the trees for shelter. A passenger train near Osceola was ditched by the flood; Emporia was submerged, in the lower parts of the town. A tornado wrecked a number of dwelling houses near Arkansas City, injuring several people. In Crittenden County, Arkansas, dwellings, barns and fences were leveled by the storm and several lives were lost. Similar reports of disaster by rain and tempest are received from Kentucky and Ohio. In Iowa the floods were appalling. The waters covered the farms in the Northwest counties like a sea. Over 1200 persons were driven from their homes in Cherokee County alone. Trains were blocked on account of many bridges being damaged or carried away. The loss of property reaches up in the millions.

... AN interesting announcement is made from the Department of Agriculture. Secretary Rusk has been testing the relative value of grasses, with a view to finding one that would flourish in localities where there is little or no rainfall. He has discovered a grass which it is believed will be the means of reclaiming a very large part of the desert section of the southwest. It is known as the "Brome Grass," and for thirty years it has been successfully cultivated in Austria and Hungary, and the hot, arid sections of Southern Europe, with unvarying success. The Secretary now hopes that the same results will be reached when it is introduced west of the Mississippi. It grows luxuriantly and surpasses our native grasses, being particularly desirable for pasturage. The benefit of a forage crop of this character would be incalculable to the West, especially when it is remembered that two-thirds of the great territory between the Mississippi and the Rockies is desert. Farmers and ranchmen will watch with interest the new experiment.

... LABOR strikes in Europe have been followed by rioting in several places. In Paris 6,000 striking bakers were stopped by the police while parading and, refusing to disperse, a collision took place in which a number of persons were injured. The strike leaders were arrested. The city, in consequence of the strike, is threatened with a famine, as the butchers, bakers and grocers are all involved. In Bordeaux, the striking horse-car men, after several hot brushes, won their fight for shorter hours. In Batonya, Hungary, a mob of laborers, headed by Socialists, attacked the town hall. The gendarmes fired on the crowd, killing four and wounding seven others.

... THE IRISH Parliamentary Party seems to have been unfortunate in its choice of a leader to succeed Mr. Parnell. It is now stated that Justin McCarthy's leadership has been a grievous disappointment and that he will shortly retire, in favor, probably, of John Dillon. There has been some trouble lately over the Campaign Fund, and it was openly alleged that there was a considerable deficit in the moneys contributed; but this is denied by the trustees of the Fund. Mr. Parnell is no longer talked of in connection with Irish Parliamentary matters.

... Two distinguished Chilians have arrived in this country, representing the interests of the insurgent or Congress Party of Chili. They are Mr. Pedro Montt, the head of the Congress Party, and Mr. Ricardo Trumbull, also an influential politician. It is understood that their object is to secure official sympathy and, if possible, recognition of the Congress Party by our government. They have visited Washington and had an interview with President Harrison on these matters. Hostilities in Chili are at a standstill just now, for the reason that the Congress Party, which controls almost the entire fleet, is short of ammunition and the Balmacedists have no ships. The two new cruisers, just completed in France, will not be delivered, owing to the dead-lock. It is the purpose of the insurgents to make an effort to secure the return of the 12,000 stands of rifles captured by the Charleston, when the Itata was surrendered some time ago.

... EX U. S. SENATOR Joseph Ewing McDonald, died at Indianapolis on the night of the 21st inst., after a brief illness. In the presence of his family and in the last moments of his life, he gave testimony to his faith in God's saving grace and partook of the sacrament. Senator McDonald, although for many years identified with Indiana in national politics, was born in Butler County, Ohio, his father being a farmer. His mother was a lady of culture and a clever writer. Joseph was educated in Wabash College and Asbury University. He taught school at Williamsport, Ind., and afterwards tended store in his brother's employ, meanwhile studying law, evenings. He entered politics in 1843, being elected Prosecuting Attorney of his county. His career afterward was steadily upward, and he was elected Attorney-General and U. S. Senator, the latter in 1874. While in Congress he was an active member, participating in almost all the great debates for a number of years and taking a prominent part in Democratic politics meanwhile. At the Democratic National Convention in 1880, he was mentioned as a candidate for President, and again in 1884. Few men were more popular with their party or possessed stronger judgment or more earnest convictions. Since 1881, he has resided in Indianapolis and devoted himself to the legal profession. Senator McDonald's portrait is given above.

HON. J. E. McDONALD.

A FOUL STREAM.

"Our fathers understood not thy wonders in Egypt; they remembered not the multitude of thy mercies; but provoked him at the sea, even at the Red Sea."—Psalm 106: 7.

OUR fathers! From them we derive our nature. We inherit our fathers' propensities; for that which is born of the flesh is flesh. As is the nature, such is the conduct. Hence the Psalmist writes in verse 6: "We have sinned with our fathers, we have committed iniquity, we have done wickedly." If we must mention our fathers' faults, it is not to screen ourselves; for we have to confess that our life's story is no brighter than theirs. It is not because the fathers have eaten sour grapes that the children's teeth are set on edge; for we ourselves have greedily devoured those evil clusters: "We have sinned with our fathers."

It may help us to escape out of the meshes of our natural depravity, if we look back and see the causes of our fathers' sins. To confess our personal sin will tend to keep us humble; and in view of the Lord's mercy, which has spared and pardoned us, a sense of our guilt will make us grateful. The less we think of ourselves the more we shall think of him whose "mercy endureth forever"; and if we see where our fathers' sins began, and how they grew, and what they came to, we may hope that the Spirit of God will help us to turn from the beginnings of evil.

I. Let us begin at the beginning. Want of understanding is
The Source of Sin.

The wonders that God wrought in Egypt were exceedingly great and instructive. The ten plagues were memorable master-strokes of God's judgment upon the proud, and notable displays of his favor to the oppressed. How Egypt staggered beneath the blows of Jehovah! Those tremendous judgments came one after another with righteous deliberation, and yet with terrible rapidity. Albeit, God had come out of his secret places, and had made bare his arm for them, yet "our fathers understood not thy wonders in Egypt."

We see this to be the case when we read the story; for at the first, when God began to work for them, they were so taken up with the present that they complained of Moses, for the cruel retort of Pharaoh. He had gone in unto the proud monarch, and had urged the demand of Jehovah; and the tyrant had replied, "Ye hinder the people from their works; get you unto your burdens." He increased their toil, by refusing to give the people straw to make bricks; and so their bondage was made bitter to the last degree, and they groaned as they saw "that they were in evil case." They are not blamed for groaning; but it was mean to blame their friends for the cruel fault of their enemy. How wretchedly have we also complained when God, in his gracious dealings with us, has caused us

An Inward Grief!

Further on we find Israel broken down by utter hopelessness. Moses spoke to them again, but we read, "They hearkened not unto Moses for anguish of spirit, and for cruel bondage." They had been so brutally crushed by the Egyptians, that they had lost all heart. They understood not that God could, by any possible means, deliver them from the gigantic power which held them down. Alas! this also has been the case with us; and perhaps is the case with some here at this moment. You are so sad and so depressed that you cannot believe in salvation.

Should not Israel have learned the royal sovereignty of the Lord God? What armies obeyed the call of that great King! At his word the river brought forth frogs abundantly. He spake, and there came divers sorts of flies, and lice in all their borders. "He spake, and the locusts came, and caterpillars, and that without number, and did eat up all the herbs in their land, and devoured the fruit of their ground." Jehovah's camp is very great. The waters were turned into blood, and the dust into creeping things; the heavens were set on fire, and the habitations of men were darkened. Would you not have thought that his people would have felt the force of his divine dominion, and would have bowed before his supreme will throughout

The Rest of Their Lives?

Beyond all question, they ought to have recognized Jehovah's love to them. By so much as the plagues were terrible to Egypt they were gracious to his people. Though the Israelites were a race of down-trodden slaves the Lord loved them. Alas! they understood not what the Lord was doing for them. To you, beloved, it may be that the same fault can be laid. God has done great wonders for believers; but, it may be, we have not yet learned his power so as to trust his might; nor his sovereignty, so as to submit to his will; nor his love, so as to rejoice in his faithfulness. Alas! we have but little understanding.

The tribes of Israel did not see in all this the claim which the Lord had upon them. As a people, they belonged to him. Because of the Lord took up a peculiar position to them, which he would have them acknowledge. Yet the favored people did not understand it; the truth was conspicuous enough; but they did not perceive it as they ought to have done; neither did they practically show that they were the Lord's people, and that he only was their God. The like slowness to take up our true position, we may see and mourn in ourselves. After all the Lord's wonders of grace toward us, we do not exalt him as our God.

The people did not see that their God by all his wonders was pledging himself to them. After having done so much for them, he would not leave them. Could he have brought them out of Egypt to kill them at the Red Sea? They even dared to say that this was their suspicion. Oh, the slanders of unbelief! But if they had understood his wonders they would have seen that he who had done such great things for them had bound himself to perfect his purpose, and to bring them into the land which he had promised to their fathers. "Ah!" you say, "they were very stupid." I do not defend them; but what about yourselves? Have we not been mistrustful? Have we not said in our hearts, "He will yet fail us, and our faith will be disappointed"? O, believer, learn this lesson well; and trust in your unchanging God: thus shall you understand his wonders in Egypt.

The fact is, dear friends, these people had no deeply spiritual work upon their hearts. "They understood not his wonders in Egypt," because their hearts were hardened by their association with a proud, worldly, idolatrous and yet cultured nation, and they had turned aside from the spiritual faith of their fathers. Wonders were wrought, and they saw them and were amazed; but they did not see beneath the surface, nor perceive the Lord's meaning in them. Beloved, I pray to God for you who are newly called out from the world, that the first working of grace in your souls may be deep, true, clear and lasting. I would have you not only know, but understand. Let us pray God that both in ourselves, and in those whom we bring to Christ, the work of grace may be deep and thorough; and may our faith in Jesus be sustained by a clear understanding of the gospel, and of our Lord's dealings with us!

II. Failure of memory follows upon want of understanding. Children

Forget What They Learn

unless they understand it. They may pass the School Board standards, and yet in a few years they may know very little. The capacity for forgetting in some children is amazing. Many even among grown-up people have splendid memories for forgetting. Alas! it is the case with certain of the Lord's people. That which we do not understand we readily forget. Mercies should be remembered. It is a great wrong to God when we bury his mercies in the grave of unthankfulness.

"They remembered not the multitude of thy mercies." That is to say, they did not remember these blessings permanently. They remembered the Lord's wonders a little, and then they sang; but when the song was over, their memories failed.

Hutton, Bishop of Durham,

was riding over the hills. He stopped, and, giving his horse to his servant, he went aside from the road to kneel down on a certain spot. He always did so when he reached that place: for in the day of his wealth and honor he had not forgotten that when he was a poor boy he had crossed those wild hills, without shoes and stockings, and had turned a cow out of her place that he might warm his feet with what little heat remained in the place where the creature had lain. He had become bishop of a rich see, and a man of renown; but he never passed that spot without kneeling down and praising God. May we have faithful memories for the goodness of our God!

They did not remember practically. Their lives were not affected thereby. True gratitude shows itself in acts and deeds. A gentleman had been the means of making a position for a tradesman; and by a misfortune he came to be himself in want of immediate help to tide over a season of great pressure. He called at the house of the person he had so successfully helped, and found the wife at home. He told her the case, and she answered at once, "My husband will be ready to lend you his name to the full amount required. He will hasten to you the moment you need him."

A Prudent Neighbor

afterward said, "But you may have to pay away all you have in the world." "Yes," said the grateful wife, "we do not mind that: he was the making of us; and if we have to lose everything for his sake, we shall do it very cheerfully, for we shall only be back to where we were when he first helped us." That is a form of gratitude which is rare enough in this world, though I have seen it here and there. Beloved, if the Lord were to take all away that we have, we should only be back where we were at the beginning.

In fact, the Lord's mercies ought to be remembered progressively. We should think more and more of his exceeding kindness. A Christian man's life should be like another Bible, and other Book of Chronicles. On our parts, sin and weakness and fickleness; have been conspicuous in our career; but on the Lord's part, grace and truth, and faithfulness and love, shine forth as the sun. Beloved, we must not let go the memory of the Lord's matchless kindness; but we must remember it more and more. The older we are, the more must we trust in him, who has not suffered one of his promises to fail.

III. I want a little time for the third head, which is, provocation followed their forgetfulness of God. Want of understanding begat forgetfulness, and forgetfulness brought forth rebellion. This imputation of cruelty to their faithful God provoked his sacred heart. The Lord is very pitiful, and his name is love, and therefore he is not easily provoked; but he declares that he was provoked by this

Display of Their Mistrust.

O brothers and sisters, after so much love as God has shown us, we must not fall to provoking him; let us far rather spend our lives in extolling him! To provoke him at any time is a wanton wickedness—unjust, ungenerous, diabolical. It is no common sin which thus provokes the long-suffering Lord. Let us shun this fault in the future.

But why did their transgression at the sea so greatly anger the Lord? Was it because it came at the outset of their existence as a nation? They had not gone many days' journey out of Egypt before they rebelled. How could they rebel so soon? They had scarcely reached the Red Sea before they began provoking the Lord with their dishonorable suspicions. O young Christian, if you provoke the Lord as soon as you are converted, your conduct will be black indeed.

To doubt the power of the blood of Christ when you have newly been saved to doubt the power of the Holy Ghost to keep you to the end when you have just been renewed—why, this is aggravated guilt! It is sadly common, but it is none the less grievous to the heart of God. He marks it down, and there stands the record—"They provoked him at the sea, even at the Red sea." This is a poor beginning of

A March to Canaan.

I must give one or two touches to complete the picture. This provocation of God was all the worse because they had only just done singing. What a song it was! Handel with all the majesty of his half-inspired music, can hardly set forth that wondrous song of Israel at the sea. "I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously: the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea." That was a noble anthem; but murmuring was a miserable sequel to it. "The Lord is my strength and song, and he is become my salvation," died away into mutterings of unbelief. Do you wonder that God was provoked? Have you ever acted so? Have you felt so jubilant that you could have snatched Gabriel's silver trumpet from his mouth that you might blow it with all your might, and have you before long been looking for a mousehole in which to hide your miserable head by reason of your unbelief? What fools we are!

Two Lessons.

Two things more, and I have done. Admire the patient faithfulness of our God. Jehovah, though provoked, still loves his people. Admire his love to ourselves; and especially that he should entertain such constancy of affection toward such wayward, fickle, unreliable souls as we are!

Next, believe God so as to cease to grieve him. Do not start aside at the next little puddle you see in the road: it is not an ocean. Doubt God when he gives you cause to do so; but not till then. O thou blessed Holy Spirit, strengthen the faith of thy people this day, and may that faith create in us perfect obedience to the will of the Lord, so that henceforth we may magnify his holy name, and walk with him until we see his face unveiled above! Amen.

THY WAY.

THY way, not mine, O Lord!
However dark it be;
Lead me by thine own hand;
Choose out the path for me,
I dare not choose my lot;
I would not if I might;
Choose thou for me, my God!
So I shall walk aright.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

UNCLE JOHN is Papa's brother. He has been a great traveller in his time and has seen many countries and strange peoples. To listen to his wonderful stories in the evenings is the delight of the children.

"Uncle John," said Ted, who had heard his father read something the day previous, "what is a locust?"

"A locust is a sort of grasshopper," answered his uncle, taking the little fellow upon his knee. "Men who study what is called entomology, that is the science of insect life, say that the locust is an orthopterous insect."

"A what?" exclaimed the children in chorus.

"An insect or small animal which has feathery wings and flies straight. Its wings are very pretty, seen under a microscope, and are of the same texture all over. When a locust hasn't any use for them he shuts them up."

"How does he do it?" interrupted fair-haired Milly, in open-eyed wonder.

"Why, he folds them just as mamma folds your dress, only he doesn't take them off. He can't, you see. They are made like a fan and so when he shuts them up, they don't take up much room on his back. They are very delicate, too, and he always carries a cover for them."

"Does he shut the cover up, too?" asked Ted.

"No," said Uncle. "The cover is much smaller than the wings and it lies between them when they are opened and slides over them when shut. But his mouth is the most wonderful part of the locust. It enables him to eat every green thing in his path and the countries through which the locusts pass are sometimes swept of every bit of green, not a leaf or spear of grass being left."

"Where do they come from and why are they so hungry?" asked the inquisitive Ted.

"The locust is known in almost every tropical country," replied Uncle John, "although I have seen them in the greatest numbers in Arabia. They never work in the night time, as they are then chilled by the dews; but the moment the sun rises, the locusts are busy and begin to destroy. Occasionally the sky will be darkened with the swarms of these insects, and the crops will be all eaten up, so that the natives must starve, unless they find relief. I read that the oases, or green places where trees and grass grow, in the Arabian desert, south of Tunis and Algeria, have been picked bare by the locusts and that those fierce fellows, the Touaregs, who are the worst robbers and marauders in North Africa, are packing up to come north, to escape starvation. Their crops are all gone and there is no longer any grazing for their horses and dromedaries. The locusts are leaving the oases as bare as the desert itself. A little while ago, a French traveller and botanist who happen to be overtaken by fatigue while in the suburbs of an Algerian town, fell asleep. While he slept, a swarm of locusts passed, lighting on him and awaking him. He rose, tried to drive them off, but they were so thick he was almost suffocated. Finally, he fell, overcome by his exertions. When found he was dying, and the locusts had eaten off nearly all his clothing and even his hair and beard."

"Are the dromedaries afraid of them, Uncle John?" said one of the children.

"Yes; the moment they hear the whirr of the wings they are terror-stricken. The Arabian locust is about as long as my finger and of a reddish-brown color. I have seen them eaten after being fried, although, I confess, I never felt a craving for such a dish. But the Arabs seemed to like them, and besides, you know, the Bible tells us that John the Baptist, Christ's forerunner, lived in the wilderness on locusts and wild honey. Now, right on the borders of Palestine, I have been struck with the immense numbers of young locusts that lay thickly heaped on these desert footpaths, to be crushed by the broad feet of our camels. Sometimes they are so thick that the ground is unseen where they lie. The Arabs catch them in sheets and bags, and I have no doubt that they have been used to some extent as food for many generations. Looking down at these swarms at my feet, I have often thought what a scourge they could become to the whole country near about within a few days. What they do not eat they infect with their breath. They die by millions and poison the air, causing a pestilence. So you see how great an evil may come out of a little thing."

Locusts are frequently mentioned in the Bible (see Exodus 1: 4; Deut. 28: 42; Psalm 78: 46; Chron. 7: 13), and generally as an agent of destruction. In the illustration, types of the locust now ravaging the crops of Algeria are shown; also the larvæ or eggs of the insect which are deposited on the earth in large numbers, thousands sometimes occupying less than the space of a square inch.

Girl Home-Makers.

WHILE the love of home is strong in all children, it is far more prominently developed in girls than boys. From the day she emerges from babyhood, the girl may be regarded as a home-maker. It is an instinct. With her dolls and doll-houses, she essays the first steps at house-keeping, and as she grows bigger it is the wildest dream of her ambition to be allowed by mamma to make up the beds or cook something that is really to be eaten. The evolution from mud pies to real veritable pastry is gradual but sure, and long before she enters her teens, if she is a bright girl, she can cook a simple dish. Her childish kindergarden lessons at housekeeping have not been learned in vain.

By and by she throws more intelligence into her household work and has her reward in the smiling approval of father or mother. But however much of a housekeeper she may prove to be, or however excellent a cook, that dear, delightful conviction of childhood can never be dispelled; she can never, never, cook like mother! There is no voice so sweet in song, or so soft in chiding; no prayer so tender at night, no kiss so comforting as mother's. And when the little woman grows into a household and cares of her own, it is the memory of that gentle mother, and how she would have done certain things, and borne patiently under domestic trials, that lightens the young wife's burdens. Happy child, with a mother whose training has made of her a home-maker in the best sense of the word—one who is herself able to guide the little feet heavenward and to train the tender hearts below for home-keeping in the blessed mansions above!

Home Customs in Holland.

"In the household, as well as elsewhere" writes a traveler, "things seem to go by opposites in Holland. The main entrance is by the back door; the sleds, such as our young folks use in winter, are used only in summer and instead of being pulled over the ice they are sent bumping by the little Dutch boys and girls over the street causeway. The big clocks, instead of striking the hour, chime it, playing part of some popular air. Mirrors hang outside of the houses and pincushions are hung by the door leading to the street.

But, in spite of all these and many other oddities, Holland is the cleanest country on the earth. There the housewives scrub even the bricks that form the sidewalks till they shine again. The linen is spotless, the interior of every cottage is as bright as silver. With them, cleanliness is indeed next to godliness, for they are a God-fearing, kind-hearted people, who make of their tidiness a virtue rather than a boast.

TEACH THE CHILDREN TO SING.

"Do you sing at home?" asked a gentleman of his neighbor.
"Sing?" replied the latter, "well—I can't say we do. You see, when I come home evenings, I am tired and then my wife has been busy all day long and she's tired, too; so really there's little chance for singing with us."

"But the children—don't they sing for you occasionally?"

"Bless you, no. I'm glad to see them off to bed so the house may be quiet."

"You miss a great pleasure," said his friend. "I don't know anything that affords us more real enjoyment at our house than to hear the children sing of an evening. We have come to regard our little concert as indispensable to the family happiness. I know, too, that mother takes a keen delight in leading them in the old tunes she used to sing when a girl. Occasionally a neighbor comes in and joins us. And frequently we have an evening of sacred song, which seems to sweeten the whole of the next day to us all. Take my word for it, a child will neither fret nor quarrel nor be sleepy when there is singing. Music, more than anything else in the world, lifts the childish heart to its Maker."

Whittier, one of the sweetest of poets, is a lover of child song. He writes, of the singing of his own little nephews and nieces:

Grateful, but solemn and tender,
The music rose and fell
With a joy akin to sadness
And a greeting like farewell.

With a sense of awe I listen
To the voices sweet and young;
The last of earth and the first of Heaven
Seemed in the songs they sung.

Warm-hearted People.

It is a pleasure to meet and to know a warm-hearted man or woman. There are some cold-blooded, narrow souls who take little interest in anything that does not immediately affect their own welfare; they seem to have been born beyond the Arctic zone, so tardily do they thaw out. Some indeed, are always frigid, like those icy streams we read of as running under the earth, and whose silent waters never catch a glimpse of the sun nor mirror the blue of the sky. But there are others who bring with them the sunshine and the smile of a kindly affectionate heart wherever they go. These are the unselfish ones, who find their own lives sweetened and their labor lightened by helping others. In the family, a helpful loving brother or sister is a jewel and a source of delight. No cold barrier prevents the expression of that love which overflows in the heart and springs to the lips and eyes. Such an one make the atmosphere sunny even on the dullest day.

Farmers' Wives' Trials.

MRS. H. W. H., of Gales Ferry, Conn., writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as follows: "When I read of the hardships of our working women, I smile and wonder if among all the 60,000, there is one who would be willing to change her lot in the city for a good home in the country, on a farm. I almost doubt it. I have been trying for over three months to find some one to help me. A gentleman, who undertook to get us a servant girl from Castle Garden, said 'the very poorest one among them would not look at you for less than $12 per month, and they don't want to go into the country.' Now, poor farmers cannot afford to pay such wages and they must go without help. We live on a farm very near a Methodist Church and school house, with neighbors close by."

From several other quarters, we also hear of a dearth of female servants, particularly in rural districts. The fact seems to be that young girls, who could find good places in homes, prefer to stay in the city and work in the shops or even in factories—resolutely keeping what they call their "independence," rather than submit to the dictation of domestic service. Doubtless, many of them find out their mistake later. Meanwhile a healthy influx of vigorous young women into the rural districts would be a boon to the overworked farmers' wives.

A lady in Oxford, Mass., writes in glowing terms of her success in rural life and of the pleasure she enjoys by contrast with her former life in the city. "I own two cows and seventy fowls and have just taken a house, which I hope soon, God willing, to pay for. It is a nice little cottage. We are far better off than if I had attempted to live the life of a sewing-girl in the crowded houses of New York or Brooklyn. I have given up many advantages but have in their places plenty of pure air and wholesome food."

About Trifles.

TRIFLES may be either all-important or unimportant, according to circumstances. Life and death may hang upon what would commonly be regarded as a mere trifle. It is of the seemingly unimportant trifles we would say a word at present; those dust-motes that rise in the social atmosphere of the Home and sometimes occasion serious quarrels.

Everybody knows the fable of the married pair who separated because they could not agree on the momentous question whether a certain mouse, that ran across the kitchen floor, came out of a hole by the ingie or a crevice beside the pantry. Both insisted and both denied. Weeks later, when they realized their folly and agreed to live amicably again, an unlucky reference to the same silly difference brought on another jar and this time they quarreled more bitterly than before.

The hasty word, spoken thoughtlessly, may seem a trifle, but it rankles in the heart and wrecks the home. Christian grace and a little common-sense would avoid these shoals and quicksands. The "grown-ups" should see to it that the little folks are early taught the importance of trifles and the evil of trivial disagreements. A sweet temper and mutual forbearance will go far toward keeping the family sky serene.

Michael Angelo, had finished a statue. He touched and retouched it, softening this feature and polishing that, and bringing out the expression. "These are trifles," said a thoughtless friend. "Ah, it may be so," replied Angelo, "but trifles will make the statue perfect."

A POSTHUMOUS NOTE of hand has given rise to a lawsuit on which a New York Court passed judgment last week. More than twenty years ago the daughter of a wealthy farmer was married. As part of her dowry he gave her husband a promissory note which read as follows: "Thirty days after death I promise to pay—fifteen hundred dollars with interest." About two years ago the farmer died, and his son-in-law presented his claim to the executors. They refused to pay, on the ground, amongst others, that the form of the note was defective, and that the farmer had undertaken the payment of the note himself, not making it an order on his executors. Judgment was given for the plaintiff by the court into which he carried it, and the decision has now been confirmed by the Court of Appeals. The decision is clearly right, the farmer having intended his executors to pay, though he did not say so. He knew he could not pay the note himself, though there are debts which men incur during life that they will have to pay themselves after death. The fact is often forgotten when the debt is incurred. (1 Peter 4: 4, 5.)

THE THIRD postponement of a wedding caused some surprise in Louisville, Ky., recently. A lady, well known in the city and a popular belle, has been engaged for some time to a young man whom she chose from among a number of admirers. It was given out that they were to be married on a certain evening in the Presbyterian Church. A large crowd assembled at the time appointed and the minister attended, but there was neither bride nor bridegroom. After waiting two hours the minister went home and the people dispersed. The minister then told a reporter of the Courier-Journal that he had been twice before engaged to perform the ceremony. On the first occasion it was fixed to take place at his house but the couple did not come. The next day after that, the young man called upon him and apologized and appointed another evening for the wedding. Neither did they keep that appointment, but again the young man called and said they had decided to be married in the church on the following evening. The notice was short, but the church was decorated with flowers and all was ready, but a third time the couple failed to appear. No reason had been assigned for the failure in either instance and the minister was unable to account for it. Whatever may have been the cause, both parties seem to have been cognizant of it, if they were not equally responsible. In that union of which marriage is a type the failure is always on one side only. Christ stands waiting to receive those who come to him, but many who make repeated promises postpone union with him and never fulfil them. (Hosea 11: 1-4.)

A DIMINISHED party of prospectors has arrived at Chilcott, in Alaska. The San Francisco Chronicle says that several weeks ago a large party set out to explore the valley of the Yukon for prospecting purposes; They met with no success, but, being reluctant to return with a confession of failure, they continued their quest until their provisions were nearly exhausted. When they did set out on their homeward journey every man was put on short rations and even then the supply of food soon failed. They became too weak to drag their boat, so they abandoned it and proceeded on foot. Cold and hungry they plodded on until they reached a region in which they were molested with noxious flies, like huge mosquitoes which stung their faces. Several of the party were so badly stung and their faces so swollen that they could not see. One after another sank down exhausted and died. The others, growing less in number every day, dragged along, no longer seeking precious metals but food. All would have died if they had not providentially found a quantity of dried salmon which they ate like famished wolves.

Before that, no man had touched food for a week. This nourishment revived their spirits and pushing on they reached Chilcott, but in a most deplorable condition. One of the survivors suffered so much in the horrors of that dreadful journey that his hair, which was brown when he started, is now as white as snow. They must have bitterly regretted protracting their prospecting search so long, and overlooking the fact that food was more essential to them than gold. It sometimes happens in the press of business life that men make an analogous blunder. Riches seem to be the supreme good, but there comes to all a time when everything is worthless but food for the soul. (1 Timothy 6: 10.)

A WOODSMAN'S narrow escape from a violent death is reported in a press dispatch from Williamsport, Penn. A man living in the Black Forest near to the region which was ravaged by fire in the spring, started out to his work accompanied by his young daughter. Although the locality is now infested with wild animals which fled from the fire, the man neglected to take any arms with him. They had not proceeded more than half a mile when they encountered a bear with three cubs. She instantly attacked the man with such vigor and promptitude that he lost his presence of mind and dropped his axe in his effort to escape. His daughter knew there was a bark-peeler's hut at a distance of a quarter of a mile farther up the mountain. She ran thither at her fastest speed to get assistance. Happily some of the men were in the hut and they hurried with her to the scene of conflict. They were not a moment too soon, for the bear had caught the woodsman and was tearing the clothes off him with her claws. They attacked the bear with their axes and killed her. The man was much bruised and lacerated but will recover from his wounds. Such a lesson as that the woodsman is not likely to forget. Knowing his danger by painful experience he will not leave his weapons at home when he ventures into the forest. It would be well if Christians would be similarly cautious when they go into the world where they may be assailed by the enemy of souls. They have weapons at their command, but just now, some appear to be inclined to dispense with the very effective one which is provided for them—"the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God." (Eph. 6: 17.)

THE GOLDEN GOPHER is thus described by a naturalist who recently visited Wyoming and found many specimens of the species in a chasm quaintly named by the early settlers "The devil's bite." The animal, he says, is very much like an ordinary rat in shape and its body is of the same color, but on its back is a stripe of brilliant yellow and its tail is of the same color. This tail is fifteen inches in length—more than three times as long as the gopher and is continually in action; which has no apparent purpose except that of display. That the little animal is vain-glorious of its tail there is but little room for doubt, for he has been seen to wrap it many times around his tiny body, transposing himself into a ball like burnished bullion, and then roll over and over, seemingly in perfect joy and delight." As the naturalist appears to have killed the animals whenever he could, while not troubling himself to kill the ordinary rat, it is evident that the brilliant tail of which the gopher is so proud, was frequently the cause of its losing its life. A still worse fate often befalls men who glory in their golden possessions. They preserve their lives but having made gold their god they lose their souls. (Mark 10: 24.)

THE CURIOUS influence of hymns on cattle was described by a ranchman of New Mexico to a traveller who visited the Territory recently and witnessed the singular phenomenon. He said that the heaviest losses a ranchman has, come from stampedes of the cattle. When a lot of cattle are gathered up there is always danger of a night stampede. The signs of an approaching stampede are familiar to every man who has been much on the trail. First a few cattle will begin to low, or rather to utter a sort of roar. All through the herd single animals will get up and begin to move around. The others become restless, and if something is not done to check them the whole herd will within a short time be rushing headlong over the plain. The most soothing influence that can be exerted is the human voice, and when these ominous mutterings are heard, everyone on night watch begins to sing. As soon as songs are heard the nervous animals become quiet, one by one they lie down, and soon all are at rest. A peculiar feature of the singing is that every cowboy, no matter how rough and lawless, knows a variety of hymns, and it is with church music that the stampede is prevented. It is much to be wished that men who are disposed to rush headlong into sin could be similarly restrained. But unhappily, as Elihu said, they are apt to forget to inquire, "Where is God my maker who giveth songs in the night, who teacheth us more than the beasts of the earth?" (Job. 35: 10-11.)

HOW LITTLE NAN CAME BACK TO THE GOOD PEOPLE AT ROCK HILL.

NO hotter spring was ever known in Western Missouri. Old Eben Bowditch, whom the good people of the little village of Rock Hill had always regarded as the best weather prophet in that section of the state, said it felt "just like real tornado weather, with th' wind like as not ter git its back up all of a suddint and do somethin' wild." For Rock Hill, taking counsel from past experience, had learned to guard against the dreaded visitor. Since the great gale of 187—, however, when Deacon Thomas' brindle cow was lifted up and carried "clean out of sight—nobody knowed whar," there had been no extraordinary visitation.

At the close of a sultry day in June, Mollie Kendall, the eldest daughter of Tom Kendall, a well-to-do farmer, sat in the little porch tending baby Nan, and watching the glowing colors of a vivid sunset. It was a pretty porch, too, overrun with flowers trained by Mollie's skilful hand, for she was reputed to be one of the smartest girls in all Rock Hill, either at tending house or about the garden. Nan was frolicking about to her heart's content on the grass plat in front of the house, screaming with delight as she viewed the antics of a pet rabbit which she tried vainly to catch, as it leaped around and sat off a little, sloping back its long, white ears and gazing at the child contemplatively from its big eyes.

Suddenly Mollie looked up and her face flushed. Her quick ear had caught the sound of hoof-beats coming down the steep hill road and she surmised who the rider might be. A moment or two later, a spirited bay, ridden by a young man, came across the bridge. Drawing rein as he cantered up to the gate, the rider gallantly saluted the girl by lifting his hat, displaying a face browned with the sun but prepossessingly frank and intelligent in expression.

"Evenin', Miss Mollie," he said gayly. "How's the mother an' the folks?" "Well, thank'ee Martin," replied the girl, shyly. "Been gone far to-day?" "No; only as far as Rushville. Been tryin' to get back before the weather clouds up, for it looks kinder squally an' I want to git the stock in."

"Any news over to Rushville, Martin?" asked the girl, with a woman's curiosity.

"Yes, some. They're goin' to have a fair there at the church, an' I thought, Mollie, it wouldn't come amiss if you was to go over with me—that is, if ye would feel like it, say on Thursday evenin'."

Pretty Mollie said nothing for a moment. "I know as Father Kendall don't like his daughter to be runnin' much after other church fairs, but seein' that my brother is to have the thing in charge, I thought you might like to have me bring around the carryall and take you and mother Kendall over for an hour."

"I'll tell her about it, to-night, Martin." "All right, Mollie; she'll say yes, never fear, and if need be I'll see Tom Kendall about it myself. Hi! hi! little one," he cried out to Nan, who had caught the rabbit and was executing a war dance, holding on to one of its hind legs, while the little pet tried to escape, "better let bunny go, or he'll think your worse nor a cyclone. By-by, Mollie," and with a wave of his hand and a parting smile, he dashed off down the road.

Mollie resumed her sewing which had been interrupted by the conversation. A few minutes later there was a call from within.

"Mollie! come here."

She entered obediently. Mrs. Kendall was laying a snowy cloth on the hard-wood table and making preparations for the evening meal.

"Wasn't that Mart Blake, who stopped on the road a moment since?"

Mollie admitted that it was, and she told her mother about the proposition to drive over to Rushville the following Thursday.

"Well, I'm not so sure about it," said the cautious dame. "Seems to me Martin is poking around here a good deal, when he might be busy on his own place. Not that he isn't a likely young man, but you know your father don't take to him very kindly. But we'll see about it. I do wish Tom would come home," she added, going to the window and looking out anxiously. "He's later than usual to-night."

At this moment, the stifling calm of the atmosphere was rudely broken and a gust of wind shook the farmhouse. A second and third followed in rapid succession, and then there burst upon the dwelling a roar so sudden and terrifying, that the women stood still in dismay. The windows rattled, the air grew black and the building rocked and swayed as though it had been grasped in the hands of some gigantic force that threatened momentarily to demolish it.

"Nan! Oh, Nan!" shrieked Mrs. Kendall, making a dash for the door, followed by her trembling daughter.

As they lifted the latch, the wind tore the door from their hands and slammed it wide open with such violence as to throw them backward. Outside all was blackness. The little patch of lawn was invisible; the porch creaked and seemed ready to fall about their ears.

"Nan! Nan!" they called to the darkness. But there was no response. Now the wind had risen, in these few minutes to the violence of a full gale, and above all was heard—nay, felt, in the trembling and quivering of the solid ground beneath their feet—the dreaded warning of the approach of that most terrible of all visitors, the tornado!

Both women clung to the frail door-posts and looked at each others white faces, which they could barely distinguish by the flickering light from the kitchen.

"God have mercy! Spare my child!" cried Mrs. Kendall in agonizing tones.

A prayer rose to Mollie's lips which was but half uttered when the crash came. The tornado, blacker than all the surrounding darkness, closed in upon the little home. Timbers creaked as though they had been made of paper and held with pins; the air was full of debris, whirling and shrieking and crashing, as it rained on the roof and sides of the farmhouse. A hissing sound, like a mighty steam-escape, came from the vortex of the great cone of clouds which, like an inverted funnel whirling around on its centre with inconceivable rapidity, sucked up all that lay in its path.

At last there came a burst of fury stronger than any that had preceded it, and the mother and daughter were flung to the ground, where they lay bruised and unconscious.

An hour late Tom Kendall bending over them and bathing their white faces with water from the well. His own face was tear-stained, for he had already surmised the worst about Nan. Yet he dared not ask his poor wife about the child, lest he should precipitate an even worse disaster.

"My baby! My little Nan!" faintly cried Mrs. Kendall, as soon as she regained consciousness.
